COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he quite understood the advice given to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) not to divide the Committee by the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill). The noble Lord was an independent supporter of Her Majesty's Government; and although, no doubt, he liked them to get a lesson now and then, he thought that, as they had been beaten twice last week, it was hardly fair to beat them on the present occasion. He (Colonel Nolan) believed that if the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) were to go to a Division it was very likely that he would get a majority; certainly he would if there were any Conservatives who really valued the efficiency of the Service more than the interests of their own Party. The Committee to which the hon. Member for Preston referred was not one on which he (Colonel Nolan) served; but he could quite understand, from his experience on other Committees, that the speech of the hon. Member for Preston was very much within the facts. Now, he took a much broader view of this question than the hon. Member for Preston. The defective supply of saddles and accoutrements was only a small part of this question. Again, saddles and accoutrements were put out to some sort of competition. Would the Committee believe that out of the £1,500,000 worth of stores there was hardly a single item put out to competition, but that the lists were drawn up by Mr. Nepean? Mr. Nepean was a man who had a great fancy for a restricted list of contractors; certainly he had declared he would like to retain the list, but he had never gone in for open competition. Pressure, too, was put on him by the Superintendents of the different departments in Woolwich to have restricted lists. It was only proper that all the stores should be bought in the open market, and until that was done the country would spend 20 or 30 or 40 per cent more than the value of the articles it received. Frequently, if they bought in the open market, they would get goods at 20, 30, or 40 per cent below cost price, because manufacturers must manufacture, must keep their establishments going, hoping to make something out of the country in time of war or of great pressure. An enormous saving on this Vote would be effected if the principle of open competition were adopted. Of course, in the case of machine guns, there ought to be some reward given to the inventor, and such things he would exempt from the principle of open competition by order of the Secretary of State. But take the case of such a rough article as coal. It was proved to Lord Morley's Committee that a large part of the coal in the Arsenal was not bought in the open market; there was one kind which was submitted to open contract, while there was another kind which was not. Pig iron, steel, and other rough articles supplied in the factory were never put up to open competition. Sometimes there was a long list of contractors, and sometimes a very short one; it was a notorious fact that a number of contractors argued that it was no use to get on the list; certainly there would be no economy until they adopted the simple plan of having open contracts in all cases, except where a reason could be given by the Secretary of State why it should not be adopted. There was a tremendous tendency on the part of the War Office to narrow the contracts in every way. Take the case of steel. The manufacture of steel had been set up in the Royal Arsenal almost surreptitiously — that was to say, the War Office did not exactly forbid the authorities to set it up, but simply closed its eyes to their action. But the moment they succeeded in manufacturing steel in the Royal Gun Factory they were met with the objection—"We have promised eight or 10 contractors to give them for the future the greater portion of the steel supply for the Royal Arsenal." He (Colonel Nolan) believed that a sort of promise had been given to some steel manufacturers. It was said in the House that there was encouragement to be given to certain manufacturers to set up steel works, and that this encouragement would take the shape of giving them the orders of the future. He (Colonel Nolan) remembered rising in the House, and saying that what was proposed would lead to a tremendous monopoly and tremendous profits to the manufacturers of steel. The War Office now contended that they had only given a half promise to six or eight people, and that there was another list to whom they had not given a promise at all. There was not the slightest doubt, however, that the War Office had gone out of its way to create a monopoly in steel, which was to be the chief material used in the manufacture of the guns of the future. There was only one remedy for that state of things, and it was for this reason that he wished the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) would ignore the advice of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), and go to a Division. The whole system of contract in this country required thorough overhauling; and until the country was more awake to the fact that stores were not put out to open contract, but were given to different people as a sort of favour, the War Office would be strong enough to enforce itself against the principle of open contract. It was not that the men concerned got any advantage out of the present system, the most they got was a little power or influence in being able to distribute these contracts. Mr. Nepean, the Director of Contracts, assigned the contracts, but the Superintendents were able to recommend contractors. A Superintendent certainly could not safely recommend anybody during his first two years of Office; and, therefore, what he had to do was to go to the manager—the manager was very often advised by the foreman, and, consequently, the manager and foreman had really the giving of the contracts. The Superintendents, although they got no pecuniary advantage out of the present system, incurred enormous responsibility. Certainly, if the country paid 20 or 30 per cent more for an article than it was worth, it was pretty certain they would get a good article, though they would not get value for their money, and there would not be the same trouble in inspecting it as if they went into the open market for it. Superintendents argued that they did not like the system of open contracts, because they were not sure of a good article. It seemed to him, however, that they did not care to take the trouble or to incur the responsibility of inspecting the articles, or else their contention meant that they could not tell a good article from a bad one. Now, Lord Morley's Committee recommended certain economies; they recommended

there should be an inspecting Staff, and the Secretary of State had gone so far as to appoint an inspecting Staff at a cost of £8,000 a-year. Surely, if they were to have such a Staff, they ought to get some value out of it. He had not the slightest doubt that if they threw upon that Staff the responsibility of judging whether materials supplied were good or bad they would certainly save more than £8,000 a-year. If this responsibility were not cast upon them, then £8,000 would simply be added to the other expenses of the country. As Lord Morley's Committee had been more than once referred to, he desired to ask one or two questions in respect to its recommendations. That Committee reported in favour of civilian heads at the Arsenal. He (Colonel Nolan) signed the Minority Report which was opposed to that recommendation, because he thought the Secretary of State ought to appoint the best men he could get, whether military or civilian. The Committee also thought there should be one mechanical engineer at the Arsenal, and that struck him as being a very good suggestion. He would like to know whether that portion of the Report had been carried out; indeed, there was nothing to which the Committee attached such importance as that there should be one first-class mechanical engineer at the Royal Arsenal to advise. He saw that in the Vote £3,000 was to be taken for new buildings. As he said, Lord Morley's Committee were very anxious to secure economy, and they made recommendations which he thought, on the whole, tended greatly to economy. Yet the very first thing they saw, notwithstanding those recommendations, was that new buildings were to be put up. He (Colonel Nolan) had a very good knowledge of Woolwich Arsenal, and it struck him that many of the old buildings could be utilized for the accommodation of the clerks and Commandant. If they wanted to spend money in putting tramways in the workshops, or in building new and improved workshops, well and good; but he scarcely saw the necessity of expending the £3,000 in the way now proposed. The Secretary of State (Mr. E. Stanhope) seemed to think he had instituted a good many reforms during his comparatively short tenure of Office. On the whole, he (Colonel Nolan) really thought the right hon. Gentleman had done good work in the cause of economy; certainly, the right hon. Gentleman was about to effect a change which was of the greatest importance. He was going to take power to carry on the money over the financial year. Now, that was of importance, because, to a great extent, matters of finance in that House were managed by men who were at the Treasury. A great many hon. Members had passed through the Treasury, so that it might really be said that one-half of the men who voted on this question were connected with the Treasury, and that they looked at these matters from a Treasury point of view. They consequently wished all money that was left over on the different Votes to be surrendered into the Treasury, and to go to the Sinking Fund. Now, in the opinion of many people, all the money which was left over at the end of the financial year was wasted, so that pressure was brought to bear on the Superintendents and managers at the Arsenal to spend all the money which was noted just before the end of the financial year. Lord Morley's Committee received a large amount of evidence upon the point, it was shown that the Arsenal Authorities used to go into the market and get articles; whereas, if they had waited a few months longer, they could have got them much cheaper. The plan suggested by the Secretary of State, by which the money could be carried over the 31st of March, was one of great practical importance, and, in his (Colonel Nolan's) opinion, would lead to considerable saving. Some of the officers who gave evidence were in favour of a settlement every four or five years, but that was not assented to by the Committee, because it was felt that in that case Parliament would virtually surrender control over military matters. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman had decided to carry over the money for three or four months. There always must be, at the end of the financial year, an accumulation of money in the hands of the Department, and for the very good reason that if the Department spent its money at the beginning of the year, and the Secretary of State came down towards the close of the year with some urgent demand, they would have no money out of which to defray the cost. They, therefore, must have some money in hand to meet any sudden requirement of the Secretary of State. As the year came to a close, however, they were anxious to spend the money, and frequently they did spend it almost recklessly. He was exceedingly glad the Secretary of State had taken some steps to remedy that state of things, by which remedy he (Colonel Nolan) did not hesitate to say the country would gain £40,000 or £50,000 a-year.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he could not help thinking that if the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) accepted the advice offered to him by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) the Committee would stand in a very lame and impotent fashion before the country to-morrow. The charges made were very specific; they had been dealt with, he quite agreed, with perfect frankness by the Secretary of State (Mr. E. Stanhope); still he reminded the Committee that when the present First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) was Secretary of State for War it was his (Mr. Bradlaugh's) duty to submit to him some similar charges in relation to similar matters, and yet, although the same things were constantly recurring, no one had been punished. The contractors, in some of these cases which had been mentioned, must have been guilty of fraud; if the statements alleged were true, they must have been guilty of deliberate and intentional dishonesty. Although it was perfectly true that to press this matter to a Division would put a number of Members who sat on the Government side of the House in an unpleasant position, because they would then have to vote against the Government they supported, yet he ventured to suggest that there was another view of the matter to be taken. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) said that if there were a majority in favour of the Vote they would endorse the arrangements the Secretary of State had stated he had made in order to prevent these things happening in the future. But, on the contrary, he (Mr. Bradlaugh) submitted they would be putting on record a very distinct protest against people being allowed to escape who ought to have been punished, against, in fact, people absolutely being rewarded, notwithstanding their neglect of duty. He certainly was of opinion that upon this question the Committee ought to go to a Division. He knew that they were largely in the hands of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment and those who co-operated with him as to what kind of expression of opinion there should be; but the country would read the names given in the Division List, and would understand how far Members carried their adherence to the true interests of the country as against their allegiance to the Government. He maintained that there ought to be no allegiance to men in the position of Messrs. Ross. One could not be sure that the adulteration of leather was not going on at the present moment. He did not pretend to say the Government were not taking steps to check it, but he did allege that when Motions of this kind were brought before the House, time after time, only to be withdrawn, the country would regard them as simply trifling with matters of this character. The adulterations were so skilfully contrived that the contractors must have paid skilled people to effect them. Poor people who defrauded the nation were sent to the place where fraudulent persons received punishment, but not so with wealthy contractors. He maintained that the Government, in not taking proceedings against the contractors, and punishing all those upon whom responsibility fell, while they admitted the chief counts of the indictment, were merely stultifying themselves. As far as he was concerned, he was certainly strongly disposed to challenge a Division when the Question was put from the Chair. He thought that everyone ought to vote for the Motion, as a protest against the system which allowed, year after year, these things to go on, because these things were the same in 1882, when our soldiers' lives were lost by them, and they were the same even before then. As long as no example was made, as long as Motions of this kind were simply introduced to be withdrawn, so long would these things be repeated.

MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, that if the Committee would bear with him he would like to make a few comments upon this matter, especially as he had some practical knowledge of the subject. He was rather surprised at the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), practical man as he was, taking such a strong view with only one side of the evidence before him. It was not like the hon. Gentleman, upon such insufficient evidence, to say that there had been shameful and disgraceful fraud on the part of the contractors. He (Mr. Lafone) thought that he would be able to show that there was not the slightest justification for any such statement. It must be borne in mind, in the first place, that Messrs. Ross and their immediate predecessors had been contractors for the Government for the last 40 years, and that, without exception, they had, before the present charges were made, carried out their contracts in the most admirable manner. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had made statements founded upon evidence contained in the Blue Book; he had taken the evidence corroborating the charges he had made; but if the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to look at the Blue Book, he would see that the statements he relied upon were not made on oath. Those statements were made by Messrs. Dunn and Moody, and other people who gave evidence. In the first place, there was a charge made before the Royal Commission of gross and wilful corruption in the Department at Woolwich. For that there was not the slightest foundation; there was no evidence whatever in support of it; indeed, all the evidence was in a contrary direction. One or two witnesses, in giving their evidence, stated that it was utterly impossible that the corruption such as was spoken of could pass at Woolwich without detection. There were 50 viewers and 6 overlookers, and the viewers examined the goods in pairs, so that it would be absolutely necessary to bribe two, if not more, of the viewers. Then, again, the question was, whether certain viewers were not so interested by previous knowledge of certain contractors that they passed goods they should not have done simply to favour such contractors? Reference had been made to the appointment of Mr. Spice. He was not going into the question whether the appointments were judicious or not, but all the evidence tended to prove one thing, and that was that Mr. Spice was a thoroughly competent person for the position to which he was appointed. But it was almost impossible for Mr. Spice to do the whole of his work in a proper and satisfactory manner. What were the real facts of the case relating to what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hanbury) called collar-hides, but which were really collar-backs? The goods were delivered hurriedly, and it was stated that they were not properly examined. There were 1,120 hides to be delivered for the purpose of completing the contracts. Of these 240, not 159, as the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) stated, were rejected as not being up to the standard; 120 of the hides sent back to the contractor, after, of course, being injured in the process of examination, were sold at the rate of 1s. 7d. per pound. The fact of the matter was that the Government got good value for their money. They could not expect to get hides of the value of 2s. per pound for 1s. 6½d. per pound. The best collar-backs were sold at 2s. 3d. per pound, and those of the second quality were sold at 1s. 10d. per pound. But the Government wanted the contractors to deliver such goods at 1s. 6½d. per pound. At the same time, they did not give either the contractors or the viewers a fair chance, for the specifications, sealed pattern, and the contract pattern were all different. The question therefore was, whether the viewer or the contractor should take the specification, or the sealed pattern, or the working pattern to guide him as to the delivery? He (Mr. Lafone) did not hesitate to say, as an old leather manufacturer, that no one could possibly deliver such goods as those described in the specification under 2s. or 1s. 11d. per pound. As he had said, the Government expected the hides to be delivered at 1s. 6½d. per pound. Unquestionably they got value for their money, and the best proof of that was that the hides which were rejected by the Government were sold afterwards in the open market at 1s. 7d. per pound. What was the process to which they were subjected? Instead of being laid in bulk, with grease put between them to keep them in proper order, they were all rolled up, and exposed to the air. The result of treating leather in this way, more particularly leather of this description, was that the quality was deteriorated. The grease became absorbed, and the leather became quite hard. That was the appearance of the goods when they were seen by the Judge Advocate General nearly two years after they were delivered. Now he came to the question of glucose. The hon. Member for Preston used the term very glibly. The Judge Advocate General gave at the end of his Report the result of an exhaustive analysis made by Mr. Wright on the subject of glucose: Mr. Wright very properly said that it was a new field of investigation for him, and that he was not at all certain of the results. He carefully guarded himself, and very properly so, because his results were entirely fallacious, and that he (Mr. Lafone) could prove to demonstration, for he had in his possession an analysis made by men who knew all about the subject. It had been said that it was very easy to detect glucose in leather; but he could take hon. Members to a warehouse with 5,000 hides, and defy them to say whether there was glucose in the leather or not. It was very difficult to detect the presence of any foreign material in leather, for the purpose of giving weight, without a chemical analysis. No such analysis was made at Woolwich, neither was it expedient that there should be. But it would be easy in the future to prevent differences between the specifications and the sealed samples. Reference had been made to the pack saddles which were made for Egypt. The contractors had not time to make the saddles according to the specifications, and the result was they were obliged to make them as near to the pattern as they possibly could. The person who supplied the hair, supplied it on condition that it passed Government inspection, and it was proved in evidence that the proper quantity had been sent in, delivered, and paid for. The Government had not time to pass the saddles; they were obliged to ship them on a certain day, and to take them as they were delivered. One of the misfortunes of the time and of the system which now existed was that this House and the country had hot and cold fevers. At one time they had a fit of economy, and would not keep the stores up to a proper height. In the time of the Crimean War his firm had to go into the market and buy 40,000 or 50,000 hides, at an extra cost of between £8,000 and £10,000, to supply the denuded stores of the Government. It was utterly impossible, when men were working day and night manufacturing stores, that the stores could be of the very best description. The question of sweating had been introduced. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had made a great use of certain wild statements made before a Committee of the other House by Mr. Dunn and Mr. Wright. Mr. Wright had, fortunately for himself, put the sea between him and this country. He had made statements it was utterly impossible for him to substantiate. When he (Mr. Lafone) spoke of what took place at Bermondsey, he spoke of a place with which he was most intimately acquainted, and he did not hesitate to say that, instead of sweating going on there, there was nothing whatever of the kind. He had been in the so-called sweating rooms. They were large and lofty rooms; 15 or 20 young women and girls worked there with machines and by hand. He asked them, one after another, what wages they were earning. One young woman, who had just commenced the business, said she earned 8s. a-week. There were people there who had been 12 and 15 years in the trade, and they would not take any other employment when there were no contracts out, because they were continually hoping that the work would return. The oldest hands were making 12s. and 14s. a-week. Having regard to the allegation made in the Committee that these people worked excessively long hours, he asked them what their hours of labour were. They told him they came to work at 8 o'clock in the morning and left at half-past 5 in the evening, an hour being allowed for dinner. Therefore, he said there was no foundation whatever for the statement made by the hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury), at least so far as Bermondsey was concerned. He could not help thinking that the contractors had been hardly dealt with. The Secretary of State for War had scarcely done them justice. They had had to labour under great difficulties, for they had been required to deliver the goods under great stress.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Sir WILLIAM MARRIOTT) (Brighton) said, he had no intention of detaining the Committee at any length; but it would be hardly right, considering the part he had played in the matter, if he did not offer a few observations. Perhaps it was as well that he should say what was the origin of this matter. The Committee of Inquiry went down to Woolwich, and, by mere accident, saw some hides. They asked a man casually concerning them, and his answer was so unsatisfactory that their suspicions were at once aroused. Sergeant Hawkins' name had been mentioned; but it was right to say that he was in no way responsible for these hides. He (Sir William Marriott) examined the man, and formed the opinion that he was a person who under no possibility could tell the truth, or perhaps he ought to say give satisfactory answers. That seemed to be the character the man possessed at Woolwich. At the same time, he was an excellent worker, and that was the reason why his services were retained. The Secretary of State for War, however, was quite right in keeping him out of any position of responsibility. It had been said that goods had been received which ought never to have been received, and that therefore the money paid for them had been wasted. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) went further, and stated that officials had been rewarded who had been guilty of negligence, and who ought to have been punished. He (Sir William Marriott) was not aware that any officials who ought to have been punished had been rewarded. He knew there were many people who always thought that someone must be hanged. This reminded him of a common practice in the East. If a crime was committed there, half-a-dozen people must be punished, it being quite a matter of detail whether the right man was punished. But we could not do here what was done in the East. If a person was found to be really guilty, then he ought to be punished; but it was very improper to lay blame on the wrong person. Now, corruption had been charged against the Establishment, and against certain manufacturers. That was the main charge which brought about the inquiry. But throughout the inquiry, however, there was not one word of corruption uttered against the Establishment or the manufacturers. The very accusers themselves—Mr. Dunn and Mr. Moody—were asked if they had any proof. Mr. Moody said that he never said that there was any corruption, and Mr. Dunn said it was only a suspicion upon his part. The charge of corruption certainly failed, both against the manufacturers and against the Department. Then came the question whether any individuals were to blame. The evidence undoubtedly went to prove that it was the system which was at fault. The system was extremely bad; but if they asked him who was responsible for the system he should say it was the House of Commons. It was very well for hon. Members to say they were not to blame. They were responsible. They were responsible for the Government, and the Government were responsible for the system. Take the case of these hides. In 1885 there was a panic, and there was a great demand for public money. Up to that time the stores had been kept very low, far lower than they were ever kept. Who was responsible for them? In his opinion, the House and the Government of the day were responsible. All at once a large number of goods were ordered. The Establishment at Woolwich had a sufficient number of viewers for ordinary times; but upon this occasion so many goods were coming in that they had to put on extra men; that was why Mr. Dunn was put on. As a matter of fact, these hides never were inspected. The officials said they had not time to inspect them, and not even time to count them. There were certain rules of the Treasury which necessitated some pressure. Millions of money were voted by that House, and the Departments felt that they must spend the money before the 31st of March, whether they wanted goods or not. They felt that, whether they could get good or bad articles, the money must be spent. It would be seen, therefore, that it was the system which was to blame, and not individuals. They must not expect men to do impossibilities. If they put upon them more than they could do, they must not blame them; they must blame the Government and Parliament. The contractors themselves complained, in writing, of the hurry; and that ought to be borne in mind by an impartial Assembly. Then, with regard to Mr. Spice. Mr. Spice had done his work well. He had had extra duties put upon him without extra pay, and it was only fair to him to bear in mind that when those extra duties were put upon him he had asked for extra assistance to enable him to cope with the work and did not get it. He (Sir William Marriott) did not know who was to blame individually for this state of things, but to speak generally it was the War Department of 1883 that was responsible. If the House chose to pass a Vote of Censure upon the Administration of that year well and good; but they must always bear in mind that such Vote of Censure could have nothing at all to do with the present Administration. As to the charge that Mr. Spice had appointed as viewers men who were connected with Messrs. Ross and Company the contractors it had broken down entirely at the inquiry, and it was there shown that though they had worked for half-a-dozen different firms, and though they might have been employed by the sub-contractors under Messrs. Ross and Company, that they had never been in the employ of that firm at all. As to Messrs. Dunn and Moody, they had unquestionably done good service by calling attention to these matters. Dunn, for himself, did not claim that high inspiration which the hon. Member who had moved this Amendment (Mr. Hanbury) had suggested. The cause of Mr. Dunn's action was unquestionably disappointment, and Mr. Dunn himself had admitted it. What happened was this—in 1885, when all this extra work was put upon the Department, several people were taken out of the collar shop, where they received £1 2s. 6d. a-week, and made viewers at wages of £1 13s. rising to £2 a-week. Amongst the men taken out of the collar shop and made viewers by Mr. Spice were Messrs. Dunn and Moody. These men viewed for a whole year, and no doubt they had done there work very well. They were very good men and very intelligent, as he (Sir William Marriott) could vouch, having had to examine them. No doubt, they were very excellent viewers; but when new viewers had to be appointed as permanent officials, Mr. Spice, instead of appointing Mr. Dunn or any of the others who were taken out of the collar shop, brought in men from outside. Mr. Dunn and the other men were naturally very much disappointed, and had said so. They had thought that if new viewers were to be permanently appointed they ought to have had the appointments. Personally, he (Sir William Marriott) thought that Mr. Dunn ought to have had one of the appointments, and that the fact of passing him over was a great error of judgment on the part of Mr. Spice. Moody was a much older servant, he had seen a great deal of service, and soon after retired from the Department, so that the mistake was not so great in his case, although both of them had a fellow-motive, and there was no evidence whatever of corruption in what Mr. Spice had done. He (Sir William Marriott) certainly thought that those men ought not to be punished, but rather rewarded in some way consistent with the well-being of the Department, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was of that opinion also. That was all he had to say on the matter. There were, no doubt, great evils in the system which had been in existence at Woolwich, but, in his (Sir William Marriott's) opinion, the Secretary of State had taken every possible step to remedy them.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton W.) said, he should like to call the attention of the War Office to a matter to which their attention had already been directed, but with regard to which he thought the Committee had a right to ask for some further assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State. The subject to which he referred was this—it had been admitted by the Secretary of State that there had been disagreement between the specifications, sealed patterns, and samples. The Secretary of State stated that he was so much struck by these remarkable differences that he had called the attention of the late Commissary General to the matter, and had obtained from him some explanation of what was going on. With reference to some remarks which had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), he (Sir William Plowden) trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would allow the inquiry to go somewhat further. It was quite clear, from the evidence which was taken at the inquiry, that they ought to be able to lay their hands on the various officers in the Department who were responsible for what had occurred. It was admitted in the evidence—which he had very carefully read—by the Commissary General and others that the responsibility rested upon them; but though the Commissary General, on page 82, remarked that he himself was responsible, yet he pointed distinctly to subordinate officers who had the immediate charge of this duty. It seemed to him (Sir William Plowden) that in late years immediately preceding those in which these unfortunate circumstances occurred, there must have been instance after instance where specifications, sealed patterns, and samples were made use of, and that there must have been some responsible officer capable of acting with authority in the event of there being any serious discrepancies in these things. He (Sir William Plowden) sincerely trusted that before that discussion closed the Committee would have an assurance from the War Office that they would not allow this matter to drop, but would attempt to bring home to all those who were responsible the errors which it was admitted that somebody in the Department had been guilty of.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) said, he desired to supply what appeared to him to be an omission in an observation which had been made with regard to the chemical test. He had listened with great interest to the debate on this point, as it very closely affected some of his constituents, and the point to which he would draw attention was that on the inquiry an analyst was called upon to give a certificate as to the quantity of glucose that had been put in the leather for the purpose of increasing the weight. He had been told that it was hardly fair to expect the viewers to judge by the mere appearance of the leather, or even by the face upon it, of the amount of glucose which was in it, and that viewers were not furnished with any chemicals in order to make an efficient test. Now, he thought that the Government might learn two lessons from the inquiry which had been held. One of these lessons was that the present method of testing was not sufficient in order to detect the presence of glucose in leather, and that unless a chemical test were adopted the same evil which was discovered at the inquiry would happen again; and the next lesson the Government should learn was that they ought not to adhere to the foolish system of insisting upon a lot of orders being executed at the latter end of March. The orders should be given earlier. If the goods were wanted they might just as well be ordered earlier, and if they were not wanted they should not be ordered at all. At the end of the financial year it did not matter whether the "remain" were goods or money, so that in the latter case, at least, another three months were allowed for its expenditure. He entirely concurred with the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He felt sure that the men had been thoroughly exonerated, and that it was the system—although he did not know under what Government, perhaps under many Governments—which was responsible. The reduction of the present Vote would only prevent improvements which had been already initiated from being carried out. Therefore, the Amendment was illogical, and he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) would withdraw it, considering the interesting discussion they had had.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr) said, that he held a contrary view to that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down, and hoped that the hon. Member for Preston would not withdraw his Amendment. If the hon. Member should withdraw his Amendment the observations he had made and the cases he had substantiated would be utterly futile. He (Mr. Molloy) thought it was desirable that the House of Commons should give some expression of its opinion with regard to the management of some of these public Departments. Now, for some years past—and this was his only excuse for intervening—he had taken considerable interest in these questions, and he would point out to those who were inclined to think that it was not desirable to take a Division upon the Amendment, and that any defence which might be set up was sufficient, that he and one of his Friends some time ago had drawn attention to the evils existing in one of the Departments, and had been met with constant denials on the part of the Government, and yet, during the following Session, an examination having been made into certain matters in the Department in question, the result was that everything he had stated was absolutely proved, and certain gentlemen in the Department were turned out of the Service.

He had listened to the defence made by the Judge Advocate General, and he was bound to say that anything weaker he had never heard. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's interesting story on Untruthful Tommy, who was turned out of the Service for his questionable veracity and then admitted into the Service again because he was a competent workman, might be altogether put aside. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that he had judged men by looking at them, and in that way had come to the conclusion that there was no corruption in the Department—a most extraordinary thing for a Member of the Government to say in the face of the overwhelming evidence referred to by the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment. To get up and offer such a statement as that it was possible to judge of the corruption of officials by looking at them, in the face of the declaration of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), was utterly unworthy of one holding the high position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General. Not to detain the Committee too long, he (Mr. Molloy) would draw attention to what appeared to him to be the only defence raised that night as against the charges made by the hon. Member for Preston, and that was by a Gentleman sitting on the Government side of the House, who, as far as he (Mr. Molloy) could understand, had spoken on behalf of a certain contractor. He (Mr. Molloy) had no particular charge to make against the contractors by name; but what did the evidence amount to? Here was one fact—it was notorious in the trade, and in commercial circles—that leather, like linen goods and many other materials, was loaded when it was sold by weight. Glucose was largely used for this purpose, and the hon. Gentleman who spoke in defence of the contractors said—"No; there is no glucose in the leather; but some chemical reaction takes place in the leather itself and forms sugar—5 or 10 per cent." So that it practically came to this—that anyone desirous of exercising economy in his domestic arrangements had only got to take a piece of leather and stir his tea with it to obviate the necessity of buying sugar. Could anything more ridiculous be imagined? It was said that the only chemical used upon the leather was used for the purpose of washing it and obtaining a surface, that chemical being sulphuric acid, one part in ten, they were told, being used.

MR. LAFONE said, his contention was that the sulphuric acid was used for the purpose of giving a finish to the leather, and that the effect of its use was to produce a chemical change in the substance of the material, portion of this change consisting in the formation of sugar in the leather.

MR. MOLLOY said, that the hon. Member's interruption was perfectly unnecessary, as it had not in the least corrected anything that he (Mr. Molloy) had said. A face was put upon the leather in order to deceive the buyer. Chemicals were used, in spite of the fact that they injured the leather, in order expeditiously and cheaply to produce a face which could only be produced genuinely by a proper system of tanning. Let the hon. Gentleman go into the market, and endeavour to purchase leather cured in the old way, and not in the modern way, and let him mark the difference in price that he would have to pay for it. He would pay much less for the leather cured by chemical process, for the curing was effected much more quickly, there was a readier return, and consequently a larger profit made. The effect of this chemical process, which involved the use of sulphuric acid, was that the quality of the leather was seriously deteriorated, and that in use it was found to rot after a very few months wear. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen who disputed that had only to go into the office of the gas works and look at the leather backs of the books there. They would find to what a remarkable degree the leather rotted away owing solely to the amount of sulphuric acid in the air, combining with the moisture of the atmosphere and soaking into the leather—a solution which was much more damaging to leather than the mild wash put upon the material by the manufacturer in the old process of tanning. He trusted that the Amendment would be pressed to a Division, and looking at the weak nature of the defence which had been offered, he hoped that every Member of the Committee would consider it his duty to support it.

Mr. Molloy

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, that there was no doubt that in the past stores had been passed into the Service which should not have been passed. There was also no doubt that the examination had not been properly conducted, and that our soldiers had suffered in consequence. He himself had on several occasions called attention to this matter in the House, as the hon. Member for Preston and other independent Members had done, for they were as desirous as possible that there should be efficiency in the Army, and that our troops should have their accoutrements, arms, and equipments, and everything necessary of the best and in perfect order. But the present Secretary of State for War had inaugurated a system which he believed would conduce to that end, and much as he (General Goldsworthy) found fault with what had been done in the past, he felt it his duty to go against anything that was likely to embarrass the Secretary of State in his efforts to put matters to rights. The system of the administration of the Army had in every respect for years past been defective; but he believed that the country was now fully alive to the fact, and was determined that the Government, the Commander-in-Chief, the Adjutant General, and all other responsible authorities, should remedy the existing evils, and do their duty in regard to the Army. If a Division was taken, he should not go against the Government, and in taking up that position he believed he would have the support of his constituents, and of the people of the country generally. He was not afraid of putting the Government in a minority when he believed that circumstances demanded it. He had helped to do so before, and if the necessity should arise he would do so again. He believed, however, that there was no necessity on this occasion, and he could not think that the Government would be in a minority, as he was sure the common sense of the Members of the Committee could be depended upon. He was bound to say that when the Government was doing its best to put matters to rights, and when they had a Secretary of State for War who was unceasing in his endeavours to perfect the equipment and organization of the Army as was admitted even by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, it would be unfair to pass any thing in the nature of a Vote of Censure on them.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) said, he quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend (General Goldsworthy), who had just spoken, that little was to be gained by putting into a minority a Government which was simply endeavouring to remedy defects which it had found to exist, and for which it was in no way responsible. There were one or two points which had been raised in the course of this discussion which it would not be courteous to those who had raised them altogether to ignore—points which were, perhaps, not as germane to the subject immediately before the Committee as they might be. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan) had spoken of the advantage of extending the system of open contracts. Well, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was fully alive to the desirability of extending the system of open contracts in every way they could. It had been mentioned that coal was now largely obtained by open tender. Hitherto, he was aware that for the three classes of best gas coal there had been limited competition, but the system of limited competition had been abandoned, and in the present year the supply was obtained by open competition. Then with regard to the inspecting Staff that had been created. It was true that it had been created at some additional cost to the country, the present Estimates bearing a charge of something like £5,000 a-year—not £8,000, as had been mentioned—for that Service. The Service would henceforward be put into a state of efficiency, and the weapons put into the hands of the troops would be properly inspected and tested. Then the hon. and gallant Gentleman had said that mechanical engineers should, in accordance with the Report of the Committee, be appointed at the Arsenal. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had appointed mechanical engineers in the Ordnance Department, and that, he thought, would meet the views of the Committee. The Government were as anxious as the hon. and gallant Member could be that new buildings should be put up at the Arsenal, in consequence of the new arrangements and developments which had been there effected, and he thought that they had now the means of making an increase in the Staff. If he might say a word before he sat down as to the appeals which had been made to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) to press his Amendment, by the hon. Member for the Birr Division of King's County (Mr. Molloy) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), he would say only this—he would venture to ask the Committee to consider the remarks which had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) as to the necessity for receiving with great consideration the views put forward by the Secretary of State respecting the individual liability of those concerned, which remarks had not been rebutted by any Member of the House. If they asked the Government to make examples, and thought they would get justice by making examples, he would submit to the Committee that they would do more harm than good if they committed a gross act of injustice to any individual in condemning the system which had been set up. In regard to all the officers in question, it had been abundantly proved that they were over-laden by the task put upon them. Not only as to Mr. Spice, but as to Colonel Rawnsley and other officials, it had been shown that they, from time to time, had made reiterated demands in the Department for additional assistance, and Colonel Rawnsley pointed out in his Report that he was working until 12 o'clock at night, or 1 in the morning, and sacrificing his health in order to get through the business. The difficulty was that the Department was not sufficiently strong to cope with the strain put upon it, and at the War Office they had not men to send to supplement its strength, and he could not believe that the Committee would proceed to condemn officers because, in the face of a very great pressure and difficulty, they had struggled on to the best of their ability, and had endeavoured to perform their duty so that the Service of the country might not be brought to a standstill. He would submit that after an inquiry of a judicial character, in which fraud had been found to have been committed by none of the officials concerned, it would not only be a strong thing on the part of the Committee, but also a very dangerous precedent, if they were to proceed to pass a censure, akin to a judicial censure, on those officials who had been exonerated after a fair and impartial trial.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I would ask the hon. Gentleman whether he does not think the supply of adulterated leather by a contractor is fraud?

MR. HANBURY said, he thought no one would suppose if he did not take a Division that he was swayed by other motives than those of hon. Gentlemen sitting below him. It was not from a fear of putting the Government in a minority that he should refrain from going to a Division if he thought they were in the wrong. If they only had before them, in reply to his Motion, the arguments of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he should certainly go to a Division, because he believed that the hon. Member's speech had weakened the statement made by the Secretary of State for War. As an independent Member, he did not bring the question forward to put the Government in a minority, but to put the Government officials in a proper state of mind, and he was bound to say that, as regarded the Secretary of State, he believed his Motion had had that happy effect. They did not wish to punish people for what had happened in the past, if any apology or excuse could be offered; but what they did intend by this Motion was to put Government officials into the position of admitting that what had been done in the past was wrong. No attack upon anyone was meant when Motions of this sort were brought forward. One reason which would induce him not to press the Motion, he must confess, was the very candid speech of the Secretary of State for War. Unlike some officials, the right hon. Gentleman had not thought it part of his duty to defend everything which had been done in the past. If the right hon. Gentleman had done so, he (Mr. Hanbury) should have thought it necessary to go to a Division; but the right hon. Gentleman told him, as Secretary of State, that there might have been evils, but that he was doing his best to remedy them; and, under those circumstances, he was bound to believe the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, he did not intend to press his Motion. At the same time, he (Mr. Hanbury) was not one of those who liked to run away when he had placed a Motion before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had not gone far enough to satisfy him; and, though he should ask the permission of the Committee to withdraw the Motion, in common honesty, were it pressed from the other side, he should feel bound to support it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he should like to say just one word in regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Preston. He could make no complaint of the hon. Member for having brought forward the Motion and being desirous to vote upon it; but he (Mr. Smith) wished to say that the Government welcomed the assistance of hon. Members in any part of the House in pointing out evils that they were able and which it was their duty to remedy. That was not the first time that he had said so in the House. Last year the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) had desired the appointment of a Committee to investigate certain matters; and he (Mr. Smith), on behalf of the Government, had cordially accepted the proposal, in the confident belief that good would result from an examination of the Estimates by a Committee of the House of Commons. In the same way he had cordially welcomed from hon. Members in all parts of the House assistance in pointing out abuses which were discovered and enabling the Government to remedy them. The Government upheld the principle of personal individual responsibility on the part of servants of the State, and they were prepared to enforce that responsibility to the utmost of their ability; and he could assure the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the Motion and the Committee at large that they desired, when a system was shown to be bad, to effect a remedy, and they accepted the full responsibility which belonged to the Government in the effort to do so. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had frankly and fully acknowledged the evils which belonged to the system they were discussing. The Government desired to cast no blame upon their Predecessors.

The system was one which had grown up in the course of years, and one for which Secretaries of State in the past must have been responsible, as all State servants were responsible for the condition of things which existed in their Departments. But there was a difference as to the character of the responsibility. A man was responsible for that which he had authorized or knew and had brought about; he was also responsible if he shut his eyes to the facts which were brought to his knowledge. Well, the present Government had thought it their duty to open their eyes to all the facts brought to their notice as to the defects in the Public Service, and to do all they could to remedy those defects, and to punish the people who were guilty, if guilt could be brought home to them. He thought the discussion which had taken place had been of great advantage to the Public Service. It would tend to strengthen their hands in enforcing responsibility, and he thought it would act as a valuable warning to public servants that if they were in any degree guilty of neglecting their duty by an absence of vigilance, or of absolute corruption, they would be called to account, and probably punished most severely. He was glad the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment was satisfied with the reply he had received from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) thought that a Division upon the subject would be more likely to work for evil than for good, as the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington had pointed out. If there was a majority against the Motion, it might possibly be claimed in future years on the part of someone as a sanction of a bad system by a majority of the House. The Government entirely deprecated such a conclusion or result. They acknowledged that the system was a bad one, and regretted that the evils connected with it had not been discovered before, and they would do their best to grapple with those evils now, and prevent any repetition of them in the future.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn? ["No, no!"] The Question is, That the Item "A," £90,763, Pay of Establishments and for Inspection and Proof of Stores, be reduced by the sum of £1,000.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to ask a question as to the sum of £327,000 for the manufacture of small arms. Could the right hon. Gentleman opposite give them any approximate date when the Magazine rifle would be issued to the troops? The question was one of great importance, inasmuch as foreign Armies were becoming familiar with the use of these magazine rifles, and because they could not only fire eight or 10 shots to the minute, which was double as fast as the ordinary breech-loader, but had a trajectory which enabled them to hit twice as many men at 500 yards as the best rifle in use in the Service now, in addition to which it was said that a much better aim could be taken with the new arm. From these facts, and also from the fact that the Bell rifle was being issued in such enormous quantities, the Committee would see the importance of the subject. He was aware that it was necessary to institute experiments before it was safe to order large quantities of a new weapon, but these experiments ought not to be carried too far in point of time. Experiments had been going on for a year and a-half. When he had gone down to Enfield, he had heard that they had been on foot for a considerable period—experiments had been made, in fact, for over two years. In the United States it was a fact that after guns were ordered no less than six months elapsed before any of them were delivered, although when they did begin to arrive they poured in. He desired to know if the construction of the magazine rifle would take place at once?

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he wished to ask two questions. He endorsed what had been said by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan); but he would like particularly to ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War how many of these new Magazine rifles were now being manufactured; when it was possible that the First and Second Army Corps would be armed with them; what was the class of ammunition that was to be used; would that ammunition be available for any other weapon besides the Magazine rifle; and did the right hon. Gentleman propose to arm as speedily as he was able the rest of the Army as well as the Reserve Forces with the new weapon? These subjects were at the present day matters of very great and very grave importance, because if it should happen that we should be called upon at a moment's notice to take the field, it was necessary that we should be absolutely prepared to do so. Obviously, then, it was of the greatest importance that we should know that we possessed the best arm of any Service in the world, and that we were issuing it to our troops as quickly as possible. The other question he would like to ask—because he did not like to detain either the Committee or the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for this Vote any longer than could possibly be helped—was whether the Artillery, both Horse and Field batteries, were to be armed with the new gun—that gun which was said to be the very best of all the guns which had yet been issued to any troops in the world? Even if we had a large number of batteries armed with those guns, still we were told on high authority that others were armed with the very worst arm which any troops could possibly possess. He was, therefore, specially anxious to ask his right hon. Friend how soon he thought our Horse Artillery and Field batteries would be armed with the gun which was supposed to be the best that could be produced? He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give him some satisfactory answer.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, with regard to the Artillery, six batteries of Horse Artillery were armed with the new 12-pounder gun. There were besides at the present moment 14 field batteries armed with that gun, and 14 more were armed with the 13-pounder gun, which was also an exceedingly good weapon—he believed a better arm than any in Europe, except our own 12-pounder gun. He might inform the hon. and gallant Baronet that they were pushing on with the manufacture of the 12-pounder gun as rapidly as they could, and that he was in very great hopes, if the hon. and gallant Baronet would have patience for 9 or 10 months longer, that he would see that enormous steps had been taken in advance with regard to arming all the Field batteries at home with the new 12-pounder. With regard to the new rifle which the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Nolan) had inquired about, he should like to say that, upon the whole, he was satisfied with the results which had been obtained. They hoped to be able to issue a certain number of weapons for final trial on Monday next, and it was hoped that these final trials would result in their coming to a conclusion as to whether there were any details, and, if so, what they were, in which the weapon required improvement. [An hon. MEMBER: How long will the final trial last?] He could not answer that question. It might be that some alterations would be required. They expected to receive the Reports of those conducting the investigation very soon, and he had every hope that the time required for the final trial would not be a long one. [Colonel NOLAN: Two or three months?] Yes. They were making every preparation for the manufacture of the rifle as soon as the final selection was made. They had a large number of machines which they were ready to put in order, and which would be prepared to start the manufacture when the pattern was settled. The fact was that there might be many details which might require a little alteration, and it was necessary that they should adopt such alterations as were beneficial. The main details were already settled, and he was confident that they would be able to commence the manufacture of the guns within a reasonable time. The hon. and gallant Gentleman knew that a certain time was required for this work. It was necessary to fit the machines to the precise kind of rifle required, and they could not get their outfit at once. They intended to manufacture not only at the Government manufactory, but they were also going to ask the trade to assist them, and they confidently expected that in that way they would have a large number of the rifles in use soon after the pattern was settled. As to the ammunition, it was proposed that at first it should not contain chemical powder. It was proposed that the first ammunition should be compressed powder, but he hoped that at a very early date, after the issue of the rifle, they would be able to see their way to the use of chemical powder. As the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) knew, there were many difficulties connected with this question of ammunition. It was true that some foreign countries had succeeded in adopting chemical powder, but that powder had never yet been tested under conditions such as powder served out to the British troops would have to be subjected to. We had to send our ammunition into different climates, and the Government would not be justified in sending it out until they had thoroughly tested its keeping powers.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had spoken about the Home Artillery being supplied with the new 12-pounder gun. Could he give the Committee any information as to the extent to which it had been supplied to India?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the necessity for having the gun was not so great in India as at home, for in all human probability our Army in India would not be called upon to operate against a European enemy. A less effective weapon, at any rate for some time to come, would meet the purposes of the Indian Army.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman could give the Committee any information as to the large increase which appeared in the Votes under the head of Sub-Marine Mining?

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN asked, whether it was not the fact that the Indian Government had expressed a desire to have all its batteries re-armed?

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered those questions, he should like to know in what condition we were in with regard to new gunpowder for the larger guns? Many statements had been made as to our having no means to supply ourselves with powder of that sort, and as to our being obliged to go to foreign countries for it. It would be satisfactory not only to the Committee, but to the country at large, to know that we were in a position to supply ourselves with powder of this description.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was obliged to the hon. and gallant Baronet for putting this question to him, as it enabled him to assure the Committee that we were proceeding very satisfactorily indeed in regard to the manufacture of powder, and that we were able to get the supply we wanted in this country. It was quite true that some years ago there was some doubt as to whether the supply we wanted could be obtained here; but he was now happy to say that all doubt had been removed on that point. As to the question which had been put to him with reference to the increase in the Votes under the head of Sub-Marine Mining, that was entirely owing to the attempt which was being made to put our military and mercantile ports into a satisfactory condition of defence.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, he had heard with great satisfaction the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with reference to the new Magazine rifle. He trusted that the Government would not be precipitate in determining upon a pattern before they were perfectly satisfied that they had obtained the most satisfactory weapon they could get. He very much questioned the wisdom of the precipitate resolve which was come to some time ago with regard to the Enfield-Martini rifle. Enormous expenditure had been incurred in consequence of the decision to adopt the Enfield-Martini pattern, as machinery had to be altered for its production, and had to be re-altered when it was decided to re-convert the weapon to the old pattern. He trusted that we should not have a repetition of this experience. He believed the responsibility of the hasty determination in the case he referred to was due to the action of the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman had jumped at the conclusion that we had arrived at a satisfactory arm, and had caused a great expenditure to take place all to no purpose. He (Mr. Woodall) trusted that in the selection of a new rifle now the Government would act with deliberation, so that when they had made a final selection it would prove satisfactory and they could rest content with it.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he must deny the accuracy of the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Woodall) that the expense in connection with the Enfield-Martini had been to no purpose.

It was true that the Enfield-Martini had been abandoned as the weapon for the defence of the country; but all the weapons had been utilized at a small cost. They were in use by the troops until the Magazine rifle was introduced.

MR. WOODALL asked, whether it was not true, that all the small-arm machines at Enfield had to be altered to produce the new gun, and then had to be altered back again, when the pattern was changed?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that was so; but he wished to correct the hon. Member when he said that the expenditure was to no purpose. The 100,000 rifles which had been converted were most useful.

MR. WOODALL said, as he understood it, those weapons had been re-converted.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, they had been re-bored from 04 to 045. The essential point was to decide the boring of the new rifle. If they found it was necessary that some modifications would have to be made, that would determine the character of the machinery; but so long as they had the same boring as that for which the machines were fitted, there would be no difficulty or delay in turning out the weapons.

MR. WOODALL said, that as they were about to adopt what would be comparatively speaking a permanent arm his hope was that the right hon. Gentleman would carry out the policy intimated to the Committee, and would be sure of his pattern before incurring large costs in the alteration of the machines in the Government factories.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would disregard the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Woodall). They should decide first the boring and then proceed to the manufacture of the guns, and the case cited by the hon. Gentleman had not the slightest analogy to the changes which might be thought necessary to introduce into the arm about to be adopted in the Service. Whatever the decision arrived at as to the use of chemical powder might be, it did not bear upon the question of the arm; and, a pattern once decided upon, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State would allow nothing to stand in his way in putting as large a number of these rifles, which were undoubtedly the best in the world, in the hands of our troops. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's answer as to the use by the Artillery in India of the new 12-pounder, it did not seem to him (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) to be as satisfactory as it might have been. He did not think anyone could say whether the new gun was likely to be required first in India, or in any other part of Her Majesty's Possessions. It seemed to him, indeed, far more likely that the necessity for a large supply of the new arm would arise in India before it could arise in this country. He doubted whether Sir Frederick Roberts and other Indian experts would agree with the view of the right hon. Gentleman in the statement he had made.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if India should order the guns and pay for them there would be no difficulty in supplying them.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince) said, he believed that if we had had the Magazine rifle long ago our history in Egypt and South Africa would have been a totally different one. However, all European nations had hesitated considerably in adopting the new rifles, and he did not think the Government were to blame for the delay which had taken place in changing from the Martini-Henry. It was a serious step to take; but he trusted that now that it had been decided upon the work of manufacturing the new arm would be pushed on with all possible rapidity, and that not only the Army but the Reserve Forces would be armed with it.

(3.) £32,400, Staff of Military Prisons.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £30,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Ordnance Factories, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889."

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, he rose for the purpose of moving a reduction of £500 on this Vote, and his only object in doing so was to call attention to a matter on which he had questioned the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in April of the present year, and which had relation to the discharge of an engineer artizan in the Royal Arsenal in January. The engineer in question was engaged in making very delicate machinery in connection with gun boring. The complaint of this engineer was that he was discharged because he would not work in company, or take shifts bout and bout, with a man who worked this machinery, who was not an artizan and not an engineer; but who was, in fact, an unskilled labourer imported into the workshop through the influence of some of the leading men there, foremen or managers, in order to teach him the trade. The engineer concerned was wanted to spend his time imparting his knowledge to this labourer. Now, that was a matter which might appear to the Secretary of State one of not very great importance; but, as a matter of fact, it was a question of very great importance indeed. This man refused to do the work under the circumstances. He was discharged from his employment because he refused, and not only discharged from that Department in the Royal Arsenal, but prevented from being employed in any other part of the works. Now, that was a matter which he must ask the Secretary of State to pay some attention to, and, if possible, to give him some further assurance that investigation would be made more than that which had been conveyed to him (Mr. Broadhurst) in April last. The right hon. Gentleman had told him that this engineer was discharged for disobeying orders, or for refusing to obey orders; and in some correspondence which the right hon. Gentleman had permitted him (Mr. Broadhurst) to have with him on this question, he reiterated the reply which the right hon. Gentleman had made to these serious allegations. Well, no one had denied that for a moment—that was not his (Mr. Broadhurst's) point. The man undoubtedly was discharged for disobeying orders; but the point was, whether those orders were not orders which he was justified, amply justified, in disobeying. He (Mr. Broadhurst) contended that they were. This case was only one of a series of cases where men in certain positions in the Arsenal, and in other places of the kind, had imported non-skilled relatives and friends into the Government Service, using Government mechanics, Government time, and Government wages to teach poor unskilled relatives a skilled trade, if it was possible to do so. Now, that was rather a serious statement to make; and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State would admit that after what they heard that night in the earlier part of the proceedings, this case should obtain a larger share of sympathy and attention from him than it otherwise would have received. He (Mr. Broadhurst) had with him three distinct statements. The first was the case of a man named Joseph Vaughan, who was brought into the Government employment to do the work of an engineer—an engine artificer. The former employment of Joseph Vaughan was that of a house painter, but he was brought in to assist in the delicate and difficult process of gun manufacture. Here was another case—and he trusted the Secretary of State would listen to these cases, because it was impossible for the Committee to be satisfied with a mere denial of these things from the right hon. Gentleman. The next case was that of a man named Walter Copeland, who appeared to be a nephew of Henry Gardner, a principal foreman. Well, up to the time of Walter Copeland being employed in the Public Service, his business was that of a Thames waterman. A Thames waterman employed in boring guns and in setting this important work in motion! The next case was that of George Green, who was alleged to be brother of Henry Green, a foreman, and who, up to the time of his apprenticeship, was a general labourer. The next case was that of Thomas Jennings, also a general labourer. These were a sample of the cases where men had been taken into the Royal Arsenal workshops at Woolwich, through the influence of relatives who were formerly managers in the works, and put amongst the engineers to learn the trade. He wanted the Secretary of State for War to remember that the work of a skilled artizan engineer was very important; it was work to which he had devoted the whole of his life from boyhood, his parents in all probability having paid a very high premium for him to be taught the trade; he had probably devoted five, six, or seven years to his apprenticeship, and he (Mr. Broadhurst) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought it reasonable that such a man should be placed in the position he had described—that skilled artizans should, at the sweet will of the manager of the Gun Factory, be required to teach unskilled men their trade. He had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman in April last on this subject, and he was bound to say that he had not been at all civil not only in regard to the text of his reply, but with regard to the manner in which he delivered it. The letter also which the right hon. Gentleman had written on the subject was very curt; he simply contented himself with the declaration that orders must be obeyed. Of course, they knew that discipline must be enforced; but the orders in this case were such that no man with a spark of self-respect, or respect for his trade, would for one moment obey, and anyone who did obey them would render himself unworthy to associate with his fellow-craftsmen. The case in point was where the labourer had been brought in to assist in the boring of guns. They had heard a good deal about gun explosions; that guns burst at various parts, and no one could tell how it came about; he would not be surprised if some of the Thames watermen, labourers, and others who were employed in the Gun Factory were the origin of these accidents. He hoped the Secretary of State for War would be able to give him an assurance that there would be further investigation into this matter. It was a serious allegation, as affecting the safety of the men in the Service of the nation and of the enormously expensive guns for which the taxpayers of the country had to pay heavily, and he said they ought to have some assurance that no men should be employed in the manufacture of these expensive weapons who were not capable of doing the work of manufacture and especially the work of finishing. He had in his hand a record of the whole proceedings. The statement was one that could be very well vouched for, and the right hon. Gentleman would see that it bore the stamp of an authority which would not permit its stamp to be affixed unless the facts stated therein had been thoroughly verified. He asked at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman a proper consideration of the grave injustice and wrong done to the skilled artizans at Woolwich in the circumstances which he had stated, and in order that the Committee might mark its sense of the proceedings he would move that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,500, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Broadhurst.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said, he was extremely sorry that the hon. Member should have thought him in any way discourteous, because that was far from his intention. In his reply to the hon. Member, he had aimed at brevity, because he thought there was not much to be said in the case; but, as he had stated, he offered his apology to the hon. Member, if he thought that he had been in any way discourteous. It seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman's contention was that they ought not to employ unskilled workmen to do work which, in the opinion of the manager of the Factory, might be done by unskilled workmen. If, in the opinion of the head of the Factory, certain work could be done by men who were not specialists, he thought they were bound to employ unskilled and not highly skilled labour. He had said before that in a factory orders must be obeyed. He did not think he was going too far in saying that the Committee would agree with him that it was utterly impossible to carry on the work of a factory, and much more so when in competition with private manufacturing establishments, unless the authorities were left a perfectly free hand with regard to labour. That being so, they would be obliged to insist that in the future, as in the past, the orders of the managers should be carried out. The hon. Member had handed to him a table of certain cases which, he said, ought to be inquired into. He would readily assure the hon. Member that he would inquire into the circumstances, with a view to seeing if there was anything in them to induce him to alter the decision at which he had arrived, and he would give the hon. Gentleman an answer on a future occasion.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he rose to move that the Chairman do now report Progress. He did so on the ground of the understanding which had been come to by the First Lord of the Treasury and himself at the commencement of the proceedings, and which had not been adhered to. He had then stated that the evidence taken before the Royal Commission, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, on Votes 2 and 3 and some of the other Votes put down for that evening, had not been circulated. The First Lord promised that these votes should not be taken until the evidence was in the hands of hon. Members. Relying on this assurance he left the House for two hours, and on his return he found that the Committee had passed Votes 2 and 3, in regard to which important evidence had been taken, but not circulated—more especially Vote 3, involving the whole of the cost of military prisons. Yet, in the absence of many Members who were known to take an interest in this question, the Government had obtained the Votes under circumstances which he had described. He therefore felt it his duty to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman and the Committee that there had been no intentional breach of any understanding arrived at. He was not present when the engagement was made. That, however, did not absolve him from any responsibility; but he might point out with regard to Vote 2 that all the evidence had been given.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would allow him to correct him. The last evidence reported was Question 1,327, and in the marginal note to the Report on this Vote reference was made to Question 1,370 up to 1,486, or more than 100 Questions in advance. Reference was also made to Questions 1,415, 1,399, and 1,495. Upon Vote 3, the whole of the evidence, beginning with Question 2,500, was referred to in the Report. The last number circulated was 1,372.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was fully under the belief that the evidence in regard to Vote 2, which they considered important, had been circulated; but it was not so with regard to Vote 3. Under the circumstances, the Government would undertake that an opportunity should be afforded on Report for a discussion of the Vote; and he, therefore, hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to withdraw his Motion.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, it was much to be regretted that the statement as to the course of Public Business made by the First Lord of the Treasury at half-past 4 should be departed from in any way; because hon. Members had regulated the whole course of their attendance during the night on that statement. There were many hon. Members who had gone away on the understanding that certain Business would not come on for discussion. He could not too strongly express his regret on the subject of the agreement entered on by the First Lord of the Treasury in a very solemn manner; but he would say that if there were no further discussion on Vote 3, he should look upon it as a great public misfortune, and to some extent he blamed hon. Members for not having remained in the House and trusted to their eyes, rather than relying on the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury. However, the mischief had been done, and it was not his own intention or that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to interfere with the course of Business. It was obvious from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that there had been an unfortunate omission when the Vote was taken, in not abiding by the precise words used by the First Lord of the Treasury. But the right hon. Gentleman had offered to give an opportunity hereafter of discussing the matter, which promise he hoped would be carried out, and, in these circumstances, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman opposite, though perfectly justified in calling attention to the matter, would not press his Motion, but trust to the good faith of the Government to remedy the mistake and, to some extent, their own short-sightedness.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire S.W., Ince) said, the First Lord of the Treasury stated that he would not bring forward any vote which was objected to, but when the Vote was put from the Chair, no objection had been raised on the front Opposition Bench.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, if he were guided by the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member opposite, he would certainly divide the Committee on his Motion. But he apprehended that he was the only Member on the opposite Benches who would take that view of the case. If it had been denied that a distinct pledge had been given, he should have been obliged to take the sense of the Committee on the Motion for Progress. But as he took it to be the admission of the right hon. Gentleman that a mistake had been made, and as he understood that an opportunity would be given for discussing Vote 2, and also the very grave questions connected with Vote 3, he would ask leave to withdraw.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BROADHURST said, as he understood that the right hon. Gentleman undertook that further inquiries should be made into the matters of which he had complained, he was not desirous of pressing his Motion for the reduction of the Vote. But he might point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he and his hon. Friends did not complain of unskilled labour in unskilled work. It was their deliberate statement that unskilled labour had been imported into skilled work. They complained that skilled artizans had been compelled by the managers at the Arsenal to teach unskilled men and to make them skilled workmen.

Original Question proposed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he had taken great interest in the purchase of Sparkbrook at Birmingham a short time ago, and at the time he had asked the First Lord of the Treasury, then Secretary of State for War, what he intended to do at the works. He had impressed on the right hon. Gentleman the fact that having got so central and advantageous a position, they had a good opportunity of making in the locality in question a central Arsenal. He had pointed out that skilled labour could be obtained close to the factory, and also that in case of difficulty and danger a central Arsenal, in the position he recommended, would be less liable to attack than either Woolwich or Enfield. In reply, the First Lord of the Treasury had stated reasons why Sparkbrook had been purchased, and had indicated that a certain amount of work was to be done there. He saw by a Notice on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) that he thought an injustice had been done to Sparkbrook, the injustice being that some machinery had been taken away from that place and sent to Enfield. He asked the right hon. Gentleman for information on this subject.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it was quite true that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had placed a Notice on the Paper, and that he had also communicated with him (Mr. E. Stanhope) on that subject. He was very anxious to press forward the manufacture of the new rifle as quickly as possible in the interests of the country; and, that being so, the Government had decided that it was desirable to manufacture a certain number of the rifles at Sparkbrook.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, he thought the Secretary of State for War had come to a wise decision. The Committee knew that Enfield prided itself upon being able to make a rifle cheaper than Birmingham. The National Small Arms Factory succeeded, after some years of acute contest with the Sparkbrook establishment, in extinguishing it as a private concern, and since then there had been no rival in Birmingham which could at all compete with the Small Arms Factory in the manufacture of rifles. He had been able to prove by figures that, at Enfield, where labour and material had to be imported from a distance, the Factory had been able to produce a cheaper article than Birmingham, whose labour and material were close at hand, and it, therefore, looked as if the private manufacturers were making a far larger profit than was right out of the Government. It was clear that if the Government intended to make rifles at Sparkbrook they ought to be able to compete with and undersell the Small Arms Company. He was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman had acceded to the representations made to him, and he hoped he would reduce the Ordnance Factory Vote by the amount taken for the removal of machinery from Sparkbrook to Enfield.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was afraid he could not promise that the Vote would be reduced. He would consider the question. He was very anxious to press forward the manufacture of the new rifle.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he understood that a certain sum of money was taken in the Vote for removing the machinery from Sparkbrook to Enfield. [MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes.] He now understood that the machinery was not to be removed, in consequence of the decision to which the Secretary of State for War had arrived.

MR. E. STANHOPE explained that he had to order some machinery at Enfield to be taken to Sparkbrook.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that although the action of the right hon. Gentleman might turn out for the good of the public, it seemed to raise a very serious question. The right hon. Gentleman, in the statement which had been laid on the Table of the House, undertook to do certain things, and he then proceeded to execute changes before the House of Commons had consented to their being made. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought it a very serious thing that the public, having been called upon to pay for the removal of machinery from Sparkbrook to Enfield, should now have to pay for new machinery, in order that the plan of the right hon. Gentleman might be carried out. That was a lax way of doing business, and especially serious when taken in connection with other subjects that had been brought before the House.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if the noble Lord would look at the Estimates, he would see that the cost of removing the machinery was very small. He had ordered machines for Enfield, and he was now going to place them at Sparkbrook with the object of facilitating work which appear to him very necessary, although a little more cost might be involved.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, that the noble Lord, although not approving all the steps taken by the Secretary of State for War, had put before the Committee an ingenious argument in defence of the policy the Government had adopted with regard to the Sparkbrook factory. That policy, stated in naked terms, was that they were going to set up another factory for small arms at Birmingham in addition to that which they had already at Enfield. He was one of those who had been, from the first, very suspicious and very doubtful about the advantage of acquiring the Sparbrook factory. It was quite true that Birmingham was the great centre of the gun trade; but if the Government wished to encourage the trade of Birmingham, or to procure rifles at a cheaper rate than they could be manufactured at Enfield, the proper course would have been to give orders to the trade at Birmingham, and trust more largely to private factories and much less to Government establishments. If the noble Lord found fault with Enfield and the great growth given to it of late years, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) was entirely in accord with him. Still Enfield existed—they had it as a legacy from the past with all its machinery and plant—and, therefore, he was in favour of retaining the Establishment and of keeping it up on the smallest possible scale consistent with the efficiency of a Government Establishment. But if they wished to give a great impetus to the manufacture of rifles, the Government, as he had said, should go to the private trade, and not set up a second factory at Birmingham.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the only check on the cost of private manufacture was to set up a factory at Sparkbrook, and it was for that purpose that the plan was advocated.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the idea of the noble Lord was very ingenious; but he repeated that they ought to look to private manufacture for their rifle supply. It came to this—that they were going to have two small-arm factories instead of one. He did not think that that was quite in accordance with the understanding which had been arrived at with the House of Commons when it was first proposed to establish the Sparkbrook Factory—namely, that that factory should only be used for the repair, and not for the manufacture, of small arms. He had been against this proposal from the first; but he thought, at any rate, that it would have been more consistent not only with the understanding entered into with the House of Commons, but with the general interest of the public, if Sparkbrook had only been maintained for the purpose of repairs. The factory at Enfield had been increased a few years ago at considerable cost, and so much money having been spent upon it, he was obliged to express his regret that the Government had not stood to their original proposal, and that they should have been led, in a very plausible and ingenious way, he admitted, into a course which might lead to the establishment of another small-arms manufactory.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, Her Majesty's Government were as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman himself to encourage private trade, and, as a matter of fact, they were going to utilize private manufacture as much as possible. It was, however, absolutely necessary to issue large numbers of the new rifles to our troops within a reasonable time, and the Government were bound to manufacture these small arms themselves, as well as place orders with the private trade. They were desirous of putting out as much work as they could, and if the right hon. Gentleman would look into the matter, he would see that they were employing private firms to a larger extent than had formerly been the case.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he wished to point out that neither the Government nor the private manufacturers of small arms ought to be handicapped in the matter of the price of the weapons.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, the office of Surveyor General of Ordnance had been created by Statute passed shortly after the Crimea War. Recently two Royal Commissions had reported fully on the position of the Surveyor General of Ordnance, and although each Commission had approached the subject from a different point of view, both had come to the conclusion that the Office of Surveyor General of Ordnance should not be abolished. They both thought that the Office should be filled, not by a civilian, but by a man of high military position, who should not be a Member of Parliament, and should not go out of Office with the Government of the day. But in face of those two Reports, the Secretary of State had seen fit to adopt a totally different course. He had abolished the Office of Surveyor General of Ordnance, and had substituted a new Office in its place. The Committee which was presided over by the noble Lord, had reported on the increase of cost to the public which had resulted from the new organization—and he need hardly observe that all changes in our Departments were attended with an increase of cost. The evidence upon which that Report was founded was not yet before the Committee; and he was, therefore, not in a position to allude to it. He thought it was due to the Committee and the two Commissions which had considered this question that the right hon. Gentleman should state the reasons which had led him to adopt a course totally opposed to their recommendations. There was another point to which he desired to refer, and which might, perhaps, be regarded as one of detail. In their investigation upstairs, the Committee found that the accounts of the Ordnance Department were—he scarcely knew what adjective to use—in a discreditable condition. The Committee, therefore, called in two professional accountants to investigate the accounts, and although they were in a position to submit the Report of the accountants to the Committee, their evidence had not yet been circulated. Under the circumstances, it would be a violation of the understanding arrived at if the Vote were taken before the Committee had an opportunity of discussing the Report. The accounts of the Department which had just been laid on the Table of the House were two years old—that was to say, they were the accounts of 1885-6. The Committee had before them the evidence of the Accountant General of the Army to show that the preparation of those accounts, which were valueless and illusory, had cost the country from £15,000 to £20,000 a-year. He hoped the Government would not press the Vote on that occasion, in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity for full discussion. He thought the Committee, the Royal Commission, and the public, had some reason for asking why the right hon. Gentleman had determined to re-constitute the Ordnance Department in the manner he had done, and what reasons had induced him to disregard the recommendations of the Commissioners?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had made such a statement as the Committee had just listened to. For his part, he was perfectly ready to consent to Progress being reported at the time the Motion was made, and he was now ready to repeat that offer. There were, however, one or two remarks which he had to make. One was that the right hon. Gentleman had made, if he might say so, a grossly unfair statement as regarded the Report made by the accountants upon the accounts of the Ordnance Department.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, the right hon. Gentleman charged him with making a grossly unfair statement. He had made no statement whatever with regard to the accountants. He merely said that the accountants had given evidence, and that that evidence had not been circulated.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the right hon. Gentleman had gone far beyond that. He had said that the accounts were in a discreditable condition.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he pledged himself that he had merely expressed his own opinion on the evidence. He had never said that that was the accountants' statement. He repeated his statement that the accounts were in a discreditable condition.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had read the first paragraph of the Report referred to, which was to the effect that the accounts of the Manufacturing Department of the Ordnance were kept with care and accuracy.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he must ask the right hon. Gentleman to read the whole of the statement in the Report.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the right hon. Gentleman must not dictate to him what to read in a matter of that kind. The portion of the Report to which he had referred showed, as clearly as possible, that the main object had been attained, and that the House had been told the cost with sufficient accuracy. Undoubtedly, there were minor defects in the accounts which deserved and which were receiving consideration. But that did not affect the general system on which they were made out. The right hon. Gentleman asked him why there was no Surveyor General of Ordnance at the present time? His reply to the right hon. Gentleman's question was, that he saw no reason for continuing an Office at a cost of £1,500 a-year which was, in his opinion, unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that two Royal Commissions had reported in favour of continuing the Office of the Surveyor General of Ordnance. It was true that Lord Morley's Commission had gone out of their way to recommend the continuance of the Office; but he thought he was right in saying that the second Commission, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, considered the question of the continuance of the Office as outside the scope of their inquiry, and, although they had most carefully inquired into the organization of the Department, they had expressed no opinion upon it. He thought it was a great source of weakness that the men who were to use the weapons supplied were not the men responsible for them. The reason, therefore, that had induced him to abolish the Office was that he thought it would be the best course to make the Military Authorities responsible, and that view he believed was in accordance with the best opinions that had been expressed on the subject. It seemed to him that the best course was to abolish the Office and make the Military Authorities responsible for the weapons they used, and he believed that that would tend not only to economy, but to efficiency, in the Public Service.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, the right hon. Gentleman had made a personal attack upon him, and, therefore, he hoped the Committee would allow him to quote one or two passages from the Accountants' Report which, it was quite evident, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State had not taken the trouble to read. The accountants reported—

“The last completed accounts of the Departments available for our examination were those of the year ending 31st March, 1885, which, though ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 13th April, 1886, were not completed and ready for distribution until August of that year. It is to these, therefore, relating to a period which ended considerably more than two years ago, that we have had to direct an examination.”

He asked mercantile men who were Members of the House what they thought of accounts two years old which had to be examined? Let them see what were these correct accounts of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke. The accountants said that these accounts—

“Consist of the balance sheets with the accompanying schedules and capital account printed in the Blue Book, described briefly in paragraph 10. . . . The term ‘Balance Sheet’ is incorrectly applied to these accounts. They are not statements setting out the balances of the books, but accounts showing in a somewhat confused manner the whole transactions of the Department for the year. They give on the one side the stores and semi-manufactured stock in hand at the beginning of the year, and the materials, wages, stores, obtained from various sources, and other charges which make up the total cost of the articles manufactured during the year. On the other side are inserted the total manufactures completed and services performed, and the value of the stores and semi-manufactured stock in hand at the end of the year. Any capital outlay is passed through the same account. Balance Sheet No. 1 contains no charge for interest or depreciation. Balance Sheet No. 2 contains both. The books do not agree with either balance sheet, inasmuch, as they omit interest, but contain depreciation, which, however, is not added to the cost of manufacture, but is charged to the account of the Secretary of State. The ledger accounts also fail to work up to the figures shown in the balance sheet.”

When he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) had an opportunity, he should call the attention of the House to some of the evidence as to the way in which the “Balance Sheets” were made to square.

“The ledger accounts also fail to work up to the figures shown in the ‘Balance Sheets,’ for there are no separate accounts for the items of timber, fuel, metal, &c.; nor for the various classes of production detailed in the schedules which accompany the annual accounts. It is only with considerable difficulty that the various items in the ‘Balance Sheets’ can be traced, and then only with the help of subsidiary books.”

They went on to say:—

“The Annual Statements of Accounts as at present drawn up in the ‘Balance Sheets’ submitted to Parliament are in our opinion defective. They do not agree with the Appropriation Account, and they do not state clearly what has become of the manufactures of the Departments. They are also confused, inasmuch as they include items of receipt and expenditure on Capital Account in the same statement with the items composing the cost of their manufactures.

“The same minuteness,” they said, “of control is exercised here as elsewhere, over expenditure. For instance, many signatures and much labour were bestowed upon the trivial amount of twopence. A full statement of the inquiries as to this item has been prepared, as an illustration, and can be laid before the Committee if desired.”

All he asked was that as they had spent several thousands of pounds in employing accountants to investigate the accounts, time should be allowed in fulfilment of the pledge given by the Government for the consideration of the Accountants’ Report before this Vote was taken.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, there was no doubt whatever that it was perfectly competent for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton to extract passages from the Report of the Accountants, either in favour or greatly damaging to the administration of the Government manufacturing Departments. After all the question of accounts was a most important one, inasmuch as there was a large annual expenditure involved. There was a most remarkable fact about our accounts. Not only were the accounts of the £2,000,000 expended not presented to Parliament until more than two years after the money had been spent, but the accounts could by no ingenuity be made in any way to coincide with our great Magna Charta of finance—the Appropriation Act. The House of Commons seemed to him to be at the present time perfectly useless, so far as financial control was concerned, and that was a matter he recommended very seriously to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen). It was quite impossible to cast any blame upon either side of the House or upon any official. The system had grown up somehow or other that the £2,000,000 was expended, and the House had no notion how it was expended until two years after it was spent. The accounting, which cost £15,000 a-year, was worthless, and the appropriation accounts were useless. These were remarkable statements; but he was certain that no Member of the Government could controvert them. This showed that the question of accounts was extremely important, and one which was worthy of the careful consideration of the Committee and of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) asked the Government to give more time for the consideration of this part of the Vote. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought that the right hon. Gentleman only made a reasonable appeal, and that the Government would do well to accede to it. With regard to that position of the Surveyor General of Ordnance, he had absolutely no remarks to make. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, supported by his Colleagues, had abolished that important, and, to some extent, ancient Office. They had yet to see the result of that change. No doubt, £2,000 had been saved in salary; but he (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought that this would be found to be more than counterbalanced by the other appointments that had been made in consequence of the abolition of the Office. They had yet to see whether the transferring the control of the Government manufactures from the hon. Baronet the Member for Exeter (Sir Stafford Northcote) to the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was an important public change. He himself fancied it would be found to be as broad as it was long, and that things would go on very much in the old way. There was no doubt whatever that the Surveyor General in his last appearance in the House was most useless. Whether his place had been taken by other officials equally useless remained to be seen. The Committee upstairs went into the subject, and the result of their recommendations to the House was that they should wait until next year before they ventured to express any opinion in the matter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) that time alone must decide the question of the advantage, or otherwise, of the abolition of the Office of Surveyor General of Ordnance. Even the Committee over which the noble Lord presided had been unable to express a definite opinion upon the matter. The Government, however, hoped that the new Department would present most satisfactory results to the country. Now, there was no objection whatever to report Progress, if it was desired by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H.

Fowler) to discuss this Vote further when the evidence was before the House. In fact, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War offered, even an hour ago, that Progress should be reported. He (Mr. Goschen) had only to say, with regard to the very animated speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that one would have thought from his utterances that for years he had been contending against this monstrous system of accounts at the War Office, and had been thwarted in his effort at reform by some recalcitrant officials. But it was only after the efforts of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) had revealed the deficiencies of the accounts that the ex-Secretary to the Treasury, who had himself been conversant with the accounts, had risen to the conviction that these accounts were in a state of the greatest confusion. If that was so, and if these accounts were a disgrace to the nation, as, judging from the right hon. Gentleman's very dramatic speech, one would be inclined to believe, why did the right hon. Gentleman not take the matter in hand? It was mainly due to the efforts of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) that the question of these accounts had been thoroughly gone into, and the Government had accepted with great alacrity the proposal to submit these accounts to professional accountants. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) had said that they revealed a disgraceful state of things.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he had not said the accountants had said so.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; that the evidence revealed such a state of things. He did not think that was the opinion of the accountants, because they said, in the first place, that the accounts were carefully kept, and that they showed the cost of the manufactures. The great charge which had been brought against the accounts, and which was a serious charge, and which the Government would investigate, not only because of the challenge of the noble Lord, but because they were anxious to simplify the accounts, was that the accounts were too formally kept, that there was too much red-tape about them, that there were too many items, and that, on the whole, they were not sufficiently business-like. But that was a very different thing from saying that they were in a discreditable state. There had been too much elaboration and too little care to make all the accounts agree with one another. There was no person more thoroughly convinced than he was that the great value of accounts was that one set should tally with another set. Nothing was more confusing to hon. Members, if they had to work out a great arithmetical difficulty, than a difference between the forms of various accounts. But the confusion in the accounts was due, in part, to hon. Members who had a mania for calling for different accounts and Returns. Every Member who was seized with some statistical fanaticism thought he had got a particular form of accounts which was particularly valuable, and a soft-hearted Secretary to the Treasury gave him his Return. That puzzled the next person, who was equally anxious to make statistical investigations, and so it had arisen that they had various sets of accounts, and it required the facility of an accountant to be able to reconcile all the different Returns. The Government would undertake to endeavour, to the best of their ability, to introduce more and more simplicity into the accounts. They would try to do without the duplication of accounts, to which the accountants called attention. It was the mass of accounts, quite as much as the want of accounts, which confused the brain of the country; and he undertook, on behalf of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, and on behalf of the Treasury and the Government generally, that they would endeavour, as the Admiralty had endeavoured, to bring before the House of Commons the cost of all articles in the most simple and business-like form they possibly could. He thought that all Governments and successive Parliaments were more or less responsible for the form of accounts they had got at present in the Ordnance Departments and in other Departments. The right hon. Gentleman was scandalized at the fuss which was made over twopence. He (Mr. Goschen) believed that there was no business firm in the Kingdom who, if their books did not agree, did not hunt to find the cause of the smallest mistake, because the smallest divergence might not mean simply a small error, but might be the result of an enormous set of errors. He trusted that they might now report Progress on this Vote. He assured the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) that they would be animated by as great warmth in this cause as he had shown this evening, and that they would do their best to assist the House of Commons by reducing the accounts of the country to such a simple form that the taxpayers could understand for what they had paid their money. He begged to move that Progress should now be reported.

THE CHAIRMAN: Perhaps it would be better to move to withdraw the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Motion be now withdrawn."

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it very clever to attack him with a tu quoque. No one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman that the accounts of the Ordnance Department no more came under the notice of the Treasury than the accounts of the London and North Western Railway Company. No Secretary to the Treasury could by any possibility see these accounts, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that as well as he did.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he certainly did not know anything of the kind. He should consider it his duty as Chancellor of the Exchequer to remonstrate with the Secretary of State if he thought the accounts were not satisfactory.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER asked, if the right hon. Gentleman had ever seen these accounts?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had examined the expenditure.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER asked if the right hon. Gentleman had ever seen these particular accounts. He was not going to allow this matter to pass without another remark or two. These accounts cost the country £15,000 a year. They were presented two years after they were made up. Those Members of the Committee who were present half-an-hour ago heard the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) describe what they were. In far stronger and better language than he could use, the noble Lord described how absolutely incomprehensible the accounts were. They were so incomprehensible to the mind of the noble Lord that, with the full concurrence of the Government, the House was asked to appoint two professional accountants to try and make out what they were. There were on the Committee Gentlemen of considerable commercial and manufacturing experience, and they gave up the examination of the accounts in hopeless despair and concurred with the noble Lord in asking for the appointment of professional accountants. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in the House when the discussion commenced. No one had attacked the present Government. No one had attacked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State. This was a question of the permanent officials of the Department, for whom he did not hold the Secretary of State or the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Financial Secretary in any way responsible. The accounts had been investigated, and all he asked for was that the evidence taken should be placed before the House before they were asked to take the Vote. He very much regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—not for the first time—should have taken the opportunity of making a personal attack upon him simply to serve a mere personal and political purpose.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would not retort on the right hon. Gentleman by saying this was not the first time in which he had addressed him in a menacing tone. He rose not to justify himself, but to repudiate the view the right hon. Gentleman had expressed that the Parliamentary Chiefs were to put the responsibility for this state of things upon the permanent officials. The right hon. Gentleman said it was the permanent officials who had been attacked. Personally he held that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury for the time being were responsible for the permanent officials, and his point was that the right hon. Gentleman might have discovered that the accounts were not satisfactory. But the state of the accounts had been brought to the notice of the country, not by the indignation of the right hon. Gentleman, but by the acumen of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. The right hon. Gentleman said that he (Mr. Goschen) was defending the present Government. He never thought the present Government was attacked, but he contended that the Parliamentary representatives of the Departments had no right to shift the whole responsibility on to the permanent officials. If abuse went on, and if there had been such abuse in the keeping of the accounts as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, all successive Governments, Parliamentary as they were, were responsible, and they could not throw the blame upon the permanent officials. The present Government would do their best to remedy the defects which had been pointed out. The right hon. Gentleman said, because he was a little angry, that he (Mr. Goschen) had justified the present accounts. As a matter of fact, the whole tenour of his speech was that the present accounts were far too complicated, and that they were defective in many respects. The Government were perfectly alive, as alive as any portion of the House, to the defects of the present system: they wished to do their best to rectify them, and in their endeavours they would be glad of the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman and, indeed, of every Member of the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was very anxious, as it was quite possible the newspapers might call them in question over the item of twopence, and as the keeping of the accounts was a matter of vital importance as one bearing on the changes which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had made, to show that the Committee was alive to the defective state of things. Question No. 1,340, which was put to Mr. Knox, was—

“Now let us pass to the other principal items of their recommendations; passing to the matter of delay, what do you say?”

And the reply of the Accountant General of the Army was—

“As regards the delay in rendering the accounts, I certainly think that that is a thing which not only ought to be avoided, but must be avoided; in fact, the new arrangement of the Estimates, under which the Ordnance Factory is separated from the Army Estimates, and under which the Navy and the Army will pay that establishment for the work it turns out for them, absolutely requires that the balance sheet shall be made up a very short time after the conclusion of the financial year”— and, mark this—

"And before the Appropriation Account of the Army and Navy is completed. I feel sure that unless that is done the system will break down, and all our energies are turned in that direction to ensure that we shall have the accounts very much earlier than we have had them hitherto."

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, that as a business man, he never expected that we got in a Government Department more than 15s. worth for every £1. The very conditions of working made this inevitable, and the moral he drew was, that it would be for the advantage of the country and the credit of the Government if they would curtail instead of being continually extending the Government Manufacturing Department. He had no doubt whatever that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was under the impression that he was doing the country good service by pushing the manufacture of rifles in the Government Manufactory, rather than extending the manufacture to the trade. But the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) showed how utterly unreliable and fallacious were the figures upon which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Stanhope) had proceeded. Every private establishment put as a charge on the business the interest on the capital employed, but this was not taken into account in the Government Manufactory. There was also the depreciation of the premises and machinery, and in a matter involving continued change it was necessary that a very large percentage per annum should be set aside for depreciation. The depreciation figures were given as a matter of account, but they were not made part of the charge of the establishment and part of the cost of every rifle made. Furthermore, a thorough system of inspection was carried on in every establishment in the country, and such a system ought to prevail in the Government Departments.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the things which the hon. Member had mentioned were taken into account in estimating the cost to the country of rifles, and all the accountants said of them was that they found fault with the form of the accounts.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that 10 per cent was allowed for depreciation of machinery, and 5 per cent for the depreciation of buildings, and to a great extent this rendered unnecessary the calculation of interest on capital. As to the question of costs, the cost of keeping the accounts in the factory had been positively extravagant. One reason was that there were too many Departments. The articles were priced every year. It stood to reason that if they were priced every four or five years, the cost of keeping the accounts would be very much less. In his opinion the Government ought to have factories to furnish a standard by which other works should be tested.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £956,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victualling and Clothing for the Navy, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889."

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, that this was a very important Vote, and he did not think it was fair that it should be taken at this time of the night. If it was taken, he hoped that some Member of the Committee upstairs would offer some explanation of the Vote. He should have thought that the Army Estimates were quite sufficient for this evening; and, certainly, if they did not hear some explanation of the Vote, he should consider it his duty to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Dr. Tanner.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, he was surprised at the course the hon. Gentleman had taken, as he was a Member of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Navy Estimates. A special Report was made by that Select Committee on this very Vote. That Report was favourable to the manner in which the victualling of the Navy, to which the Vote related, was conducted. Therefore, he did not see why the Committee should not come to a rapid decision on this Vote. The actual words in which the Select Committee reported upon the Vote were—"The general arrangements appear to be business-like and satisfactory." Under these circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member would see the expediency of withdrawing the Motion.

DR. TANNER said, he was not present when the Select Committee drew up their Report, though, of course, it might be said that that was his own fault. He did not pretend to be a very great adept in criticizing naval accounts; but there were many Members of the Select Committee who showed a great deal of knowledge of naval matters, and who certainly did not express themselves in that happy way, as regarded this Vote, which the noble Lord evidently wished the Committee to believe. He was under the impression that there was shown to be a certain amount of friction between the two branches of the Admiralty who were mainly concerned in completing these Estimates. Accordingly, he thought he was only doing his duty in preventing this Vote passing in silence.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, that, of course, there was no reason whatever why the Committee should not discuss this Vote that night. He, however, hoped the Committee would not be led away by the fact that a certain Report had been handed in by the Select Committee. At the time the Committee agreed to its Report, he protested strongly against the inadequacy of the evidence upon which the Report was based. Here they had a very large Vote for the victualling of the Navy; but would the Committee believe that the only two witnesses connected with the Victualling Department who were called before the Select Committee were an official of the Admiralty—who, he believed, never went near the Victualling Yards—and the Director of Contracts for the whole Navy? There was no one called who was in any way directly connected with the Victualling Establishment, and therefore, so far as the Report of the Select Committee related to this particular Vote, it was really no guide to hon. Members.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, he was not surprised the hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had made these observations, because in the Select Committee he was one of a small minority which took the line he had now adopted. There was no doubt a great deal connected with the account-keeping in the Victualling Department which had yet to be inquired into by the Public Accounts' Committee; but he certainly thought the Select Committee received enough evidence to justify the Committee in giving the Admiralty the money now asked for. It was a matter of notoriety that the victualling work of the Navy was, perhaps, the best done of any work in the Public Service of the country.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.) said, he hoped the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) would not press the Motion to report Progress. He did not think that any Member who sat on the Select Committee would say that he was an agreeable Member of that Committee. When he (Lord Charles Beresford) was at the Admiralty the victualling was directly under his own charge. He did not for one moment wish the Committee to think that for that reason he was satisfied. There were several things directly under his charge with which he was most dissatisfied. But, as far as his private knowledge went, he believed that the victualling of the Navy was about the best Service we had got. The country certainly got, in regard to victualling, value for its money. It was perfectly true, as the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had said, that there were very few witnesses called before the Select Committee in respect to this Vote. The reason of that was that the Committee got all they wanted to get out of the witnesses who were called. The evidence was most satisfactory, and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) had just told them that the country got value for its money—

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: In respect to this Vote.

MR. CREMER said, he should like the noble and gallant Lord to tell them whether the Report was true that men were to be found who lived by buying surplus stores of vessels?—

THE CHAIRMAN said, that at present the Motion before the Committee was to report Progress. This Vote could not be discussed until that Motion was withdrawn.

DR. TANNER said, that, after the request made by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford), he should certainly ask leave to withdraw the Motion. At the same time, he hoped that the Committee would thoroughly understand his motive in making the Motion. That, in his opinion, was a Vote of great importance, and it was as well that it should not pass without comment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CREMER said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) what was done with the surplus stores of vessels when they returned from sea and were paid off? The allegation current at our chief naval stations was that there existed a class of men who lived by buying from the Government the surplus stores of vessels, such stores, for instance, as wine, spirits, beer, and tinned meats. It was said that, instead of these goods being transferred to other vessels, they were disposed of at a half and sometimes two-thirds less price than had been paid for them, that they were retained for a time by the men who made a living in this way, and then re-sold to the Government for victualling other ships at the prices originally paid for them. He wished to know from the Government whether this system really did prevail in our naval depôts, because, if it did, he could not concur in the statement just made that the nation got value for its money? Any commercial firm that had to make purchases and found surplus stores in vessels coming home would transfer them to other ships. That, however, did not seem to be the case with the Government, and he had frequently heard it stated at the Portsmouth and Plymouth Stations that there was a class of men who lived well, and sometimes realized large fortunes, by the purchase of stores under the conditions he had mentioned.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.) said, that, as a Member of the Committee on the Navy Estimates, he should like to say a word upon this Vote. He had paid great attention to the evidence given, and was satisfied with it. He looked at the result, and it was with an experienced eye, for he was a shipowner himself and knew something about the cost of victualling men. He did not hesitate to say that the victualling was done by the Government on most economical terms. The cost to the Government was 1s. 1½d. per man per day, a result which he, as a private shipowner, never hoped to arrive at. It was a result which he was sure could only be arrived at by the exercise of the greatest economy in the purchase of stores, and in the manner in which they were used. He had particularly noted the evidence as to the manner in which the accounts were kept, and the comparison drawn as to the amount of stores served out for the men and the actual consumption, and he could only say that he was perfectly satisfied with that evidence. Any system which gave such a good result as that which he was describing was one which ought to give unmitigated satisfaction to the taxpayers of the country at large.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) said, he was always glad to hear when there had been any economy effected in the Service; but he was bound to say that economy in the matter of victuals given to the men—economy in provisions—was not always very wise. He did not say that the Government had not been prudent in this matter; but he should like to have some explanation of one or two particulars of this Vote. He found that there were large savings made in the amount for victualling the Fleet. There was a reduction of £53,000 upon the provisions supplied to crews, and of £59,000 for seamen's clothing, soap, and tobacco. There was also incidentally a reduction of £3,000 in the amount of relief given to men in hospital. So that under the headings of provisions and clothing in the Fleet and hospitals they had a reduction of £115,000 this year over what it was last year. He did not see any explanation of that in the Estimates. These Estimates were framed in rather a new way, and he (Captain Price) and others had not yet been able to grasp their peculiarities. In view of the fact that the number of men in the Fleet was reduced by only 100, he should like to know what this reduction for provisions and clothing meant? Though there was this large decrease in the cost of provisions and clothing, there was a satisfactory increase in the amount paid to the men in lieu of provisions not taken out. How were they to reconcile these two facts?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, that in reply to the question of the hon. Member for the Haggerston Division of Shoreditch (Mr. Cramer), he could assure the hon. Gentleman that the course pursued was this. When vessels returned from their commissions, the stores on board were examined by a board of officers to see if they were in such a condition that it would be wise to put them on other vessels going away on long commissions. The stores of themselves might not be actually unserviceable, but they might be in such a condition that it would not be wise to put them on vessels that might be going on long voyages in tropical seas; therefore, those stores which were not considered fit for re-shipment on examination by the board of officers were sold. The prices realized for these stores were very often very good prices. For example, biscuit which cost about 10s. 6d. per cwt., now sold in the way he described at 8s. or 9s. per cwt.; but the stores so sold were never bought again into the Service. It was much more economical to sell out stores which would not stand a long sea-voyage, than to put them on board outward-bound ships, because they might become worthless abroad. It was better to examine them at home and consume them at home than to sell them abroad where they might be, perhaps, of the very smallest value. Then, as to the question raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Captain Price), there was considerable reduction, as he pointed out, in the clothing and food; but that arose from the fact that they had a larger stock than usual on hand at the end of the last financial year. After making allowance for the increased stock they were able to buy out of the economies of last year, there was no necessity for such large purchases to be made this year as there was last year.

MR. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire) said, he did not rise to offer any observations as to this Vote; but he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) to the fact that a great many of the items of this Vote were under the control of the Accountant General of the Navy. They had had some difficulty in Committee in ascertaining what the duties of the Accountant General of the Navy were, and he (Mr. R. W. Duff) wished to inquire what steps the Navy intended to take to carry out the Report of the Committee?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the Report alluded to called attention to the different interpretations put by themselves and the Navy on these duties. The Report suggested that the matter was one which should immediately occupy the attention of the Government, and that the Government should, as soon as possible, come to some decision upon it. Well, the question was under the consideration of the Government, and in a very short time a final conclusion on the points at issue would be arrived at. The Vote was under the control of the Junior Naval Lord.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he referred to the first item, Salaries and Allowances.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, yes; the administration of the Vote was under the Junior Naval Lord.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, as he understood it, the Government were endeavouring to bring about a solution of that question. Did the noble Lord hope soon that a final conclusion would be come to?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD asked, would the noble Lord give the Committee a definite assurance that the position of the Accountant General in the Navy—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question is quite irrelevant to this Vote.

DR. TANNER said, he thought that the Committee should be enlightened on one or two points—upon points which happened to be under discussion in the Committee upstairs on those days when he happened not to be present. He might say, for the purpose of putting himself right with the Committee, that he found great difficulty in attending the meetings of the Select Committee. The main difficulty was that he was on another Select Committee which sat on the same day and at the same hour, and hon.

Gentlemen would admit that Members were not now-a-days, like Sir Boyle Roche's bird, able to be in two places at one time. There were some points which deserved special consideration, notably item "I" for beer money. They all knew the great partiality of the present Government for beer, and when anyone took up these Estimates and looked into them, they found that their liking for beer and their desires in favour of the people who produced beer took a practical shape. They found that the beer money allowed to the Marines on shore amounted to £7,250, which was an increase on the Vote for last year. He found in every other item that, wherever there was any possibility of cutting down, the Department had cut down. It was only this individual item—and to this he wished to direct the attention of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—which had increased, and the addition this year was some £250. What followed? Why the very next item, the excess account for bread and meat—which he supposed were necessary commodities even to Marines—beyond the 4½d. a day charged for the combined ration, was £2,700, although last year it amounted to £4,850. He thought some explanation of these items was absolutely necessary. How did they come to be set down in this way? Were the men to be starved in order that the publicans might prosper—were they to get less meat and bread in order that they might have extra rations of porter? He hoped hon. Members in that House who had forced Her Majesty's Government to drop the Licensing Clauses of an important Bill now before the House would take this matter up and demand an explanation. They would get that explanation just as they had very righteously got the Licensing Clauses dropped. He could not understand how the peculiarity in the Votes to which he called attention occurred. If the Government fed their sailors and marines on beer and porter, the men would not be good fighting men, especially if at the same time the Government cut down what was absolutely necessary for them—namely, bread and meat. If he did not receive a satisfactory explanation from the noble Lord, he should find it necessary to move the reduction in the excess money spent in this way.

Dr. Tanner

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he should like to have a satisfactory explanation of these differences. The amount of stores used afloat and ashore was about the same this year as last year; but he understood they had a decrease of £115,000 in the charge. They had bought £115,000 worth of stores less this year than last year. That was a large sum, and he trusted that the Committee would hear that that was a satisfactory state of things. He hoped it did not arise from any depletion of the authorized establishment, though that might account for a large decrease in the amount of stores purchased. They had heard before of such things as stores being depleted in order to show a saving in the Estimates.

MR. FORWOOD said, they had savings last year in the matter of stores and clothing, and concluded the year in possession of excesses over the authorized establishment. That fact obviated the necessity of their having to buy the customary quantity in the coming year. During the coming year they would maintain the establishment.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked what was the authorized establishment? There was nothing in the Estimates to show it. There was no stock-taking, and nothing, therefore, to show what stock the Government had last year and what they had now.

DR. TANNER said, that perhaps it would be of benefit, in connection with this Vote, especially to help the House to understand the amount of stock in hand, if these Votes were arranged somewhat in the method of the Army Votes which had been under consideration that evening.

MR. FORWOOD said, stock was taken every year to ascertain the quantity of victuals in hand; but it had not been customary for some years past to place a value upon that stock. However, he was in hopes that by the arrangement recently made they would be able to show, not only the quantity of stock in hand, but also its value.

CAPTAIN PRICE: In the Estimates?

MR. FORWOOD: Yes; in the Estimates. Then as to the authorized establishment, that varied according to the Victualling Yards, and according to the demands of the Service. The amount of stores was provided upon a regular basis according to the consumption and the number of men maintained. The increase in the item for beer was due to the increase in the number of men receiving beer money.

DR. TANNER said, he should like to understand this matter. Did he understand the hon. Member to mean that there were more Marines?

MR. FORWOOD: Yes; on shore.

DR. TANNER: More Marines on shore this year than there have been before?

MR. FORWOOD: Yes.

DR. TANNER: And, therefore, you have an increase in this money?

MR. FORWOOD: Yes.

DR. TANNER: Then, in respect to the reduction in the item for bread and meat, is it due to a falling-off in the price of those commodities?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the beer money was for the Marines who would be on shore. Last year the amount was estimated at £7,000, and that estimate was more or less correct. This year there would be an increase in the number of Marines on shore, and consequently there was an increase of £250 put down in respect of the increased amount of beer they would consume. As to bread and meat, the falling-off in this excess expenditure was owing to the contracts made for supply, these being lower this year than they were last year. This decrease accounted for the difference between £2,700 and £4,800.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, that as to the answer given by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) just now, when the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) asked a question as to the reduction in the charge for victuals in the present year's accounts, he was informed that an abnormal quantity had been purchased in the previous year, and that that purchase had been effected by using certain savings. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) desired to ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty whether those savings were obtained upon the Naval Vote, or whether they were obtained upon other Votes, because if they were obtained upon the Victualling Vote of the Navy it was clear that the Victualling Vote must have been largely in excess of the requirements, otherwise there would not have been an abnormal amount of stock in hand at the end of the financial year. And then, if the savings were made upon other Votes, they came upon an important question as to the financial administration of the Admiralty. If the Navy was to be allowed to obtain for any one of half-a-dozen different purposes or services money which was not required for those services, and was to be able to divert the money so obtained without the knowledge of Parliament to the purchase of stores in excess of the amount which the Department had claimed from Parliament in the first instance for the purchase of these stores, he contended that the control of Parliament over this expenditure was shown to be altogether illusory. The question of the application of the savings on these different Votes really did involve the question of the financial arrangements of the Department generally. He would ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would be able to supplement the answer given by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty by saying whether these savings were obtained from the Victualling Vote or from other Votes?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that a certain proportion of the sum in question was from savings on this particular Vote, and a certain proportion was under other Votes; but as the hon. Member was aware that no appropriation of savings under any Vote could be devoted to a purpose other than that for which it was originally asked, except with the consent of the Treasury, therefore care had been taken to obtain that sanction. He admitted that if the practice of asking for more money than was required in order afterwards to obtain the sanction of the Treasury to devote the money to other purposes than that of the Vote were countenanced proper control over the money voted would not be exercised by Parliament. But the hon. Member would see that no Department could exactly estimate its wants at the beginning of the year. Very often great waste occurred when a Department was forced to surrender a considerable amount of savings at the end of the year over which it should have control. When they had to purchase stores for ships in the course of construction the optional power which the Treasury exercised of giving sanction from time to time to the use of savings was very much to the benefit of the Public Service; but the matter always came under the cognizance of the Public Accounts Committee and the Comptroller and Auditor General. The Committee might rest assured that ample safeguards were adopted in these matters.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it was true that very long afterwards there was made to the Public Accounts Committee a report of the savings under each head of the Estimate, and of the excess also under each head, and that there was a balance struck which showed the total excess or saving on each particular Vote; but that was so long after the event that for all purposes of practical control it was worthless. What he would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty to do in the present instance would be to show, or to give to the House figures showing, the amount of savings on large Votes that were drawn upon for the purpose now under discussion, and what was the amount saved under the Victualling Vote itself. It would be perfectly clear to hon. Members, if they would reflect for a moment, that if the transfer of savings on different Votes was to be made merely on the sanction of the Treasury—on permission given in a general form—there was nothing to prevent a Department from appropriating money voted by Parliament for a purpose or for purposes which could never be properly traced in the Parliamentary accounts. It was all very well to say that the Comptroller and Auditor General brought this question before the notice of the Public Accounts Committee, but he did not do it in such a way as to show what were the specific items in regard to which the expense had been incurred—he merely reported as to the total expenditure, what were the original items and which were the new items he was not concerned with, and the Public Accounts Committee never knew. If they were to have a proper control over the funds of the Admiralty or the War Office, it was absolutely necessary that before the consent of the Treasury was obtained for the appropriation of a saving effected under one head of expenditure to another head of expenditure, the reason of the excess and the manner of the saving should be set forth in detail, and those details should be laid before Parliament. He did not think that was too much to ask, and he was sure the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty would not object to this so far as his Department was concerned.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was afraid he could not give the exact saving on this particular Vote last year, but if the hon. Member would put a question to him on Report he would be very glad to give him all the information in his power.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that, however satisfactory the answer of the noble Lord might be to the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), he did not think the Committee at large would hold it to be satisfactory. He thought they had a right to ask that the details of these savings should be set before them before they voted this money in Committee. Hon. Members were sent there as guardians of the public purse, in order to see that these accounts were correct. He had long ago come to the conclusion that the Army and Navy Estimates were, as was once said, "things which no fellow could understand." They had heard, at all events, that night, that those best qualified to judge did not know anything about them, so that it was useless for him (Mr. Conybeare) to endeavour to fathom those mysteries. At any rate, it would be still less possible to understand those Votes if the noble Lord, and those responsible for them, did not give them all the information in their power. It seemed to him in the highest degree essential that such information should be forthcoming, and that the Committee should not be told to wait for it until the Votes were passed and the Report stage was reached. He was not going to follow his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) into the general question of waste; but he would like to ask the noble Lord in charge of the Vote one or two questions about some matters which had been brought under his own cognizance. In the first instance, with regard to the question of the waste of stores. He could only say he believed, from the enormous quantity of material, whether in the form of boots, clothing, accoutrements, or equipments for the Army, which he had seen exposed for sale in this country and elsewhere—and seemingly not in respect of the faulty character of the articles—that there must be enormous waste, and he would ask the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty whether he could throw any light on the matter? He wished to know how it was that such enormous quantities of articles which had evidently been issued for Government yards could find their way into the shops—such enormous quantities as he had seen offered for sale in the course of his journeyings in Southern parts? It could not be said that these articles were second hand—they had every appearance of being new, and of having got out of Government yards in some mysterious fashion into the Kaffir stores and some other strange quarters in South Africa, and, he supposed, in other parts of the world also. The question of boots had come under his notice especially in connection with this point. They were able to purchase these Government-made boots at a ridiculously small price in all sorts of places. He knew a shop, not far from where they were now sitting, where they could purchase any number of these boots. He had happened to come across a gentleman some little time ago who was able to throw some light upon this subject, and this gentleman had told him that one reason for this extraordinary and abominable waste of articles of clothing supplied to the Army and Navy was the faulty character of the inspection. There were inspectors who might be appointed because they knew everything or because they knew nothing in connection with the supply of boots and shoes in the Navy, and he believed it was the same in the Army. These men would go round and declare, in the most superficial manner, whole tons of fairly good articles condemned because, perhaps, they might not be made exactly according to their particular fad or fancy—because the seam of a boot was a little too much to the right or to the left, and such like reasons. Everyone who understood anything about boot-making knew that when they were made in wholesale quantities they were made exactly the same, and it seemed to him absurd when they got them at 6*d.* a pair—as they had been led to believe lately that some Boards of Guardians procured them—those boots should be thrown upon the market and wasted for no earthly reason but because they had not happened to square with the particular view of the individual who was given the control of the whole matter, and who very likely knew nothing whatever about boot-making. There was another question, in reference to beer money, which had been referred to. He thought this beer money was money supplied to the men in lieu of beer. He should like to know if he was right or not? From what was said just now it appeared to him that this money was supplied to the men to provide them with extra beer. If that were the case he should certainly object to the item, and in order to elicit further information on the matter he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £250.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £956,150, be granted for the said Service.”—(Mr. Conybeare.)

MR. FORWOOD said, that this was money paid to the men in lieu of beer. As to the remarks which had been made with regard to the waste of stores, it would be satisfactory to the hon. Member to learn that the total loss of stores by waste and condemnation in the Navy had not amounted to more than 1 per cent without deducting the proceeds of the sale of old stores. It was impossible to put a full statement before the House as to the past year, because the accounts had not yet come in from all parts of the world. It took six months for them all to come in, and they could not be known till the end of September. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the Motion.

DR. TANNER said, that he also would appeal to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion, as there was another item which he (Dr. Tanner) would like to get some explanation of.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he did not wish to stand between the Committee and the Vote, but he had a very important question relating to a matter upon which he had questioned the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty upon another Vote. It was in regard to the Island of Ascension—and he saw here an item for live stock in that Island. The noble Lord would remember that he (Mr. Conybeare) had abstained from going into that matter on the last occasion. He would now claim the right to put before the noble Lord certain facts—

MR. AIRD (Paddington, N.): I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith) (Strand, Westminster): Looking at the hour (one minute to 12), might I ask that the whole Vote be taken now? Any information the hon. Member desires can be given on Report.

DR. TANNER said, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £3,000 in respect of the cost of the Island of Ascension. He would move this reduction in order to give full facilities for discussing the question.

MR. AIRD: I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is that the Question be now put.

DR. TANNER (seated, and with his hat on): Might I ask you, Sir, what is the Question to be put? I have moved an Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is impossible to hear the hon. Gentleman seated, except on a point of Order.

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

MR. CONYBEARE asked, when the Government proposed to take the next stage of the Vote? In asking that, he wished to point out the exceedingly shabby manner in which he had been treated.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order!

MR. CONYBEARE continued: He had been distinctly asked, when he raised the question of the Island of Ascension, to postpone discussion to this Vote; and when the Vote came on, and he was about to place his views before the Committee, the question was promptly closed. Before that the Government professed themselves willing to give ample time for the discussion of the subject, and he now asked if the Government would give an opportunity on the Report stage, taking that stage before 12 o'clock?

Mr. Conybeare

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, it was intended to take the Report stage on the following evening, but if it was not reached before 12 o'clock it would be postponed to a later day.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, before the Bill was read a second time he should like to know something about it. The Consolidated Fund appeared to be a mysterious entity, which had always perplexed the minds of Members. Whenever they asked to have some control over Bills in relation to it, they were told they were unable by Rule to have such control. The present Bill proposed that the sum of £5,500,000 or more should be issued out of the Consolidated Fund to meet the expenses of the Services for the year ending March 31, 1889, and it also gave borrowing powers to the Commissioners in relation to the said sum. It was important that the House, in view of the growing practice of the Government to take upon themselves to closure discussions on the Votes in Committee, when a Bill of that kind was brought forward, should exercise the right of requiring some explanation, and, if need be, of criticism.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, a few words should satisfy the hon. Member. The Bill merely gave effect to the Resolutions already passed, and enabled the money already voted by the House for the service of the year to issue from the Consolidated Fund. It was one of the necessary stages of these financial transactions on purely formal matter; but he would be doing an injustice to the hon. Member if he were to assume that the hon. Member was not perfectly well acquainted with that.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL
[Lords.]—[BILL 228.]
(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred till Thursday next."

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, he desired to know if there was really any intention of taking the Bill on the day mentioned? It presented a subject in which a great number of Members were interested, notably Members connected with the Medical Profession.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth) said, he did not understand that there was any contention on the question of principle. He hoped to bring the Bill upon Thursday, or, at all events, to find another opportunity then.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, many questions arose in relation to the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
(IRELAND) ACT (1887) AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL 281.]
(Mr. Chance, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Maurice Healy.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chance.)

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) objected.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the indulgence of the House to be allowed to say that the Bill, which was agreed to by the Government, was simply an Amending Bill to remove a technical difficulty which placed the Court of Appeal in Ireland in a somewhat ridiculous position, and there could be no reasonable objection to it. He only asked that the formal stage be now taken.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, so far as the Government were concerned, there was no objection to this stage.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT (1887)
AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith.

Lords Amendments considered.

Page 1, line 10, to leave out from "consent," to "notwithstanding," in line 16, in order to insert "has been established by evidence satisfactory to the Court," the first Amendment, read a second time.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, there was one suggestion he should like to make, to add, after the word "evidence," the words "by repute or otherwise." The words "legal evidence" might be open to great differences of opinion. He thought the words of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) were much better, and that the Court should have that discretion it would have if these words were inserted, "by repute or otherwise." He admitted it involved a nice legal point.

Amendment proposed, after the word "evidence," to insert the words, "by repute or otherwise."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the words standing were, "evidence satisfactory to the Court." He did not pretend to be a lawyer; but he thought that all that was required was that the evidence should satisfy the Court. One effect of inserting the Amendment would be to delay the measure, and that he was anxious to avoid, for he knew that in view of the Bill many appeals had been held over.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said, the answer to the hon. Member was that evidence before the Court must be legal evidence, and on that ground evidence by repute should be admissible.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) said, he did not think the usual rules of evidence should be altered for one particular Statute. The Lords' Amendment appeared to him to be quite right; it required that the evidence should be satisfactory to the Court—that was to say, evidence that would ordinarily be received in a Court of Justice. He did not think that they ought to insert a provision altering the ordinary Law of Evidence on the point.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) said, he thought the point in question ought to be satisfactorily settled, and to give the opportunity for that he would suggest a postponement.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Murphy.)

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, it would not be with his consent the debate should be adjourned.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) appealed to the hon. Member (Mr. Murphy) not to insist on that Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, from the respect he had for the hon. Member, he would recommend the withdrawal of the Motion.

MR. MURPHY assented.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Proposed Amendment to Lords' Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Further Amendment, in page 2, line 2, to leave out "equitable," and insert "under such equitable assignment," read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

MR. T. M. HEALY said, it was a most unsatisfactory course that these Amendments imported into the Bill by the Lords should be moved without there being any opportunity of judging the effect. He had always protested against such a course, and thought some little explanation of this Amendment was due to the House.

MR. MADDEN said, the Bill was in charge of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell).

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, for his own part, he could not see that the Amendment made any change whatever; it seemed to him just a difference of phraseology.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he thought it was a valid objection that had been raised. For his own part, he always objected to taking Lords' Amendments at such an unearthly hour; they were always alterations for the worse. He had never known the Lords improve a Bill. ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he might mention that he communicated with the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) during the afternoon, and it was with the assent of the hon. Member that the Amendments were now taken. As to the Amendment itself, it was for the House to judge.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, it was true the hon. Member showed him the first Amendment, and he said he would raise no objection to it, and he had kept his word; but, as regards this second Amendment, he never heard of it before, and he could not even gather what it referred to. Further, he did not know that there was a Member in the House who knew anything about it. Was it worthy of the House of Commons to pass a matter of the kind blindfold?

MR. SPEAKER: I may remind the hon. and learned Member that if he continues to object, the debate, of necessity, must be adjourned.

MR. MADDEN said, the Bill was in charge of the hon. Member opposite, but the phraseology of the Bill as it left the House, and as it would be with the Amendment, was present to his mind; and though he would give what explanation he could, if the House desired, it was a technical matter, and if there was a wish to postpone it for consideration the Government did not object. ["No, no!"] The clause, as it stood originally, provided that the word "assignment" should include an equitable assignment for the purposes of the Bill, and then went on to provide that the word "lessee" should include the person equitably entitled to the interest under the lease. The Amendments of the Lords left the first part untouched, providing that an equitable assignment should be included for the purposes of the Bill, and then went on to provide that the word "lessee" should include the person entitled under such assignment. Instead of the words "equitably entitled to the interest of the lease," they should be "entitled under such equitable assignment."

Amendment agreed to.

Another Amendment, in page 2, after "1888," insert, "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, shall be read as if this Act were incorporated therewith."

MR. MADDEN said, he thought there would hardly be any objection raised to this.

Amendment agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

INDIA — HINDOO MARRIAGE LAW — RUKHMABAI'S CASE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE asked the Secretary of State for India, with reference to the case of the Hindoo lady Rukhmabai, Whether it was coming home by way of appeal to Her Majesty's Council from the Government of India, or whether the Government of India was taking any steps with regard to it? The case involved a very broad question which affected not only the unfortunate lady herself, who had been put into prison because she refused to live with her husband, to whom she was betrothed when a child, but also the happiness and domestic life of all Hindoo women. If the noble Viscount could give any information on the subject, it would be very acceptable.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): We have no recent information regarding Rukhmabai's case. The latest, which is taken from the proceedings sent home by the Government of India, relates to the issue last year of a letter from that Government to the several Local Governments as to proposed amendments of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882, in its provisions relating to the execution of decrees for restitution of conjugal rights. We are not yet aware whether replies have been received from the Local Governments.

CHURCH PATRONAGE (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1874.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF MINTO, in rising to call attention to the composition of the electorate to which the appointment of ministers to vacant parishes in Scotland has been entrusted by Parliament under the authority of the Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 37th and 38th Vict., chap. 82 (1874); and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the provisions of the Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874, and whether some part of the responsibility for the appointment of ministers to vacant parishes in Scotland might not properly and advantageously be extended to the parochial public by means of 'the heritors of the parish (being Protestants) and the elders,' or the heads of families, or committees of the ratepayers, or otherwise," said, that although this subject might be uninteresting to their Lordships, he felt more than justified in asking them to listen to him for a few minutes, and to consider whether certain provisions of the Patronage Act of 1874 were not faulty and did not call for amendment. That was a disfranchising or disabling measure, as well as an enfranchising one. The system of patronage existing at that time was then abolished, and a new system substituted by the creation of a totally new body of patrons or electors. The Patronage Act was, he contended, based on principles utterly unprecedented in Scottish parochial history. It furnished the first instance of any Protestant patrons or electors being placed under statutory religious disabilities in the nomination of ministers to the congregation of a vacant parish. For the first time in history it enfranchised females wholesale, and, also for the first time in history, it bestowed the franchise on minors. When he affirmed that these things were novel and unprecedented, he meant unprecedented not only in Acts of Parliament, but in Acts of the General Assembly also. Church membership was the basis of the new electorate. It began at about the age of 15. It signified in its very nature religious disabilities. Outsiders of all sorts and kinds were kept at arm's length, though many of them were deeply interested on their own account, and in behalf of the parish, in the appointment of the best possible man for the place. Under this Act, the electorate consisted, first, of all persons, without regard to sex or age, who were on the Communion roll; and, second, adherents above 21 years of age. An electorate built on these foundations naturally presented strange results. The Scottish population, as shown by the Census tables in 1881, was 1,799,475 males and 1,936,098 females, being a female preponderance of 136,623. The Return of communicants in Scotland in 1874 showed 197,592 males and 262,074 females, or a female preponderance of 64,482. From a House of Commons' Return in June, 1874, it appears that there were in Ayrshire 12,644 male and 16,661 female communicants; in Bute the respective figures were 201 and 413; in the county of Edinburgh, 15,504 and 23,714; and in Forfarshire, 16,933 and 24,644; the total showing a female preponderance of 20,150. A House of Lords' Return, issued in 1877, of communicants and adherents in parishes in which elections had taken place under the Act of 1874, showed that there were in these parishes 14,505 male and 23,019 female communicants, and 1,055 male and 688 female adherents, giving a female preponderance of 8,147. The juvenile portion of the electorate—those under 21 years of age—were, perhaps, 10 or 15 per cent of the whole, and the female element preponderated here also, in consequence of the early age at which girls received the Communion. The history of the two franchises was curious. As to the female franchise, he was unable to trace the origin of the idea. The fathers of the Scottish Church and of the Free Church had no such ideas. Dr. Chalmers wished the "male heads of families in full Communion with the Church" to be electors. The General Assembly of 1842 made male communicants of full age electors for the appointment of elders. As to the minor franchise, it was the result of accident or oversight. He proposed in his Motion some modification of the principle of exclusiveness, and he had authority for that in the Act of 1690, establishing the heritors as the electors—the only condition being that they were Protestants; and he had also the authority of the General Assembly, who petitioned in 1874 that the legislation of the year should proceed on historical precedent, and that the heritors ought to be among the constituent bodies who were to elect the minister.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the provisions of the Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874, and whether some part of the responsibility for the appointment of ministers to vacant parishes in Scotland might not properly and advantageously be extended to the parochial public by means of 'the heritors of the parish (being Protestants) and the elders,' or the heads of families, or committees of the ratepayers, or otherwise." — (The Earl of Minto.)

LORD BALFOUR said, he wished to say a few words upon this question before the noble Marquess the Secretary for Scotland replied on behalf of the Government. When he first saw the Notice on the Paper he had grave doubts whether it was intended as a proposal for serious discussion, but as the noble Earl had brought it before their Lordships he supposed it must be treated seriously, and that some considerations should be placed before the House upon the other side. It was, however, somewhat remarkable that, so far as he could learn, there was no one but the noble Earl himself who was in favour of the proposal, and in a letter written to a newspaper a few weeks ago the noble Earl himself admitted that the proposal would be opposed by the friends of the Church, by those who wanted Disestablishment, and that the general public were absolutely indifferent in regard to it. If that were so, he should like to know in whose interest the proposal was really made? They would also notice that the Motion had been somewhat ingeniously altered since it first appeared on the Paper. As it originally stood it was "the heads of families or committees of the ratepayers or otherwise," but it had now been altered by the addition before the words "the heads of families" of these words, "the heritors of the parish (being Protestants) and the elders." Anyone who knew anything of the question knew that those words were a quotation from the Act of 1690, which was known in Scotland as the Revolution Settlement. From the Notice and some parts of the noble Earl's speech the House would be led to believe that the heritors (if Protestant) and elders had power to appoint ministers; but that was not so. The only power given to elders and heritors was that they should propose a person for the parish, who should be approved or disapproved by the congregation. The noble Earl had raised the question whether the electorate in those days was composed of men or women or both. He supposed in those days the congregation was composed of females as well as males, and, therefore, they had a right to assume that the object of the Act of 1690 was to put the power of appointment into the hands of the whole congregation. That system worked well while it existed, but it was disturbed by an Act of Queen Anne passed in 1712, imposing patronage on the Church of Scotland. He would tell their Lordships that for nearly a century the Church had never ceased to protest against the passing of that Act and the manner in which it was passed, and claimed the restoration of what they regarded as the right of the Church in the appointment of ministers. His contention was that the Act of 1874 introduced no new principles whatever into the election and appointment of ministers, but simply restored to the Church what it had, from the time of the Reformation downwards, always claimed to be her simple birthright. The idea which lay at the root of the organization of the Presbyterian Church was that its government was a government by the whole body of its members for their own benefit. The election and appointment of ministers was only one part of the government of a Church, and there had always been in the Presbyterian Church three conditions in the election of a minister—first, the examination of a minister's qualification by the Church; next, the election, or, at least, approbation, of the people amongst whom he was to minister; and, thirdly, the admission of the minister by the Courts of the Church to the benefice. Any system outside that was always regarded as alien to the idea of the Church. One essential condition upon which so much store was set by the Church was that the gentleman who sought to minister to the people must have the approbation of the people to whom he was to minister. He thought the idea embodied in the noble Earl's Notice was simply an attempt to revive the law of patronage in another form, and in a form which possessed all the disadvantages and none of the advantages, such as they were, of the previous system of lay patronage. There were still some parishes in Scotland in which there was, if not a majority, at any rate very nearly a majority, of Roman Catholics. He thought it quite likely that their good sense and good feeling would lead them to abstain from interfering in this matter, even if they were let in under the head of ratepayers; but he was afraid there were some people in Scotland, perhaps a small minority, who were so keen to do all they could to harm and injure the Church that they would make use of the power which the noble Earl would give them for the simple and sole purpose of bringing in confusion and increasing the difficulties of the Church. But the point he wished to bring before their Lordships was that if the heritors of the parish and the heads of families showed any desire whatever to be connected with the Church, and to attend to its ministrations, they had the simple right to qualify themselves as adherents, and nobody could say them nay. The definition of adherents was, he thought, as wide as it could be made, and he had never heard any complaint of the way in which it had been carried out. The roll of the electors for the appointment of ministers included all communicants, and it also included as adherents only such other persons being parishioners who were not 21 years of age. If heritors and heads of families did not wish to be connected with the congregation, he was at a loss to know why they wanted to deal with the election of a minister. When they talked of admitting rate-payers, he would like to ask the noble Earl if he had ever heard of a church membership founded on what might be called a ratepaying qualification? The noble Earl knew as well as he did that the Church was not merely a mob of people who were supposed to hold certain doctrines. It was an institution and organized society with certain conditions of membership; and he ventured to say that it was absolutely impossible to impose upon a Church any purely secular terms for making qualification for membership. To do that would be absolutely intolerable to any Church which had a particle of self-respect; and he ventured to say that there was hardly a Presbyterian in Scotland, whether belonging to the Established Church, the Free Church, or the United Presbyterian Church, that would not scout the idea embodied in this Motion. He believed the noble Earl was perfectly friendly to the Church, and that he thought this would make it more comprehensive; but he ventured to tell him that if this proposal was to be carried out, however little prospect there might be of Presbyterian union at the present time, he would certainly relegate it to a dim and distant future. He understood the noble Earl to complain that the electorate was largely made up of persons under age. He thought the noble Earl greatly overestimated the number of those persons. Communicants under 21 years of age in any congregation must be a very small proportion indeed, and adherents must be over 21 years of age. He submitted that no case had been made out for disturbing the existing arrangements, which had worked extremely well for the past 14 years.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I waited to see whether any other Member of your Lordships' House connected with Scotland would interpose before the reply of my noble Friend who represents the Scottish Office. The somewhat languid interest which this House has shown in the speech of my noble Friend who brought this subject forward shows how little the consciences of most of your Lordships are aroused to the great principles which are at stake in this Motion. It may seem to many of your Lordships a mere local question affecting Scotland; but it affects principles which some day at least—perhaps sooner than many of your Lordships expect—may be discussed with regard to the Church of England. It affects the largest and deepest principles touching the nature and constitution of the Church of Christ; and the terms on which it is lawful for that Church to become connected with the State. What is the history of this question? So far as I know, during the Middle Ages there was no difference between the practice in England and the practice in Scotland in regard to the lay patronage in the Church. The origin of the lay patronage of the Christian Church is closely connected with the origin of tithes, and those who originally endowed the Church acquired the privilege of nominating to the priesthood in many cases. There was no difference, so far as I know, up to the Reformation between England and Scotland in that respect. The Reformation, your Lordships know, was in the nature of a democratic movement rather than of an aristocratic and legal one. The movement was from below and not from above; and from the beginning of the movement in Scotland in 1560 up to the present time the spirit of the Reformed Church of that country has been to invest the government of the Church as a whole in the great body of its own people, which at that time might be assumed to be the great body of the nation. Early after the Reformation a great feeling arose in Scotland that lay patronage ought not to be unlimited. By the Act of 1500, the principle was clearly established that the stipend belonged to the State and the appointment of ministers belonged to the Church. Such was the state of the law down to 1712, when, under a very reactionary Government, it was determined to restore lay patronage to the Church in its full vigour, without any reference to the congregation. This was a monstrous violation of the feelings of the people of Scotland, and a departure from the revolutionary settlement. Then came 1832, with a great movement in the minds of men which was not merely political, but also religious and ecclesiastical. That movement was spread over the whole of Europe and gave rise to the French Revolution, and, later on, to the Oxford movement. At last the General Assembly took a step on its own authority—the General Assembly is a body not composed of ministers and clergy alone, but representing, to a large extent, the whole body of Scotland—and enacted that the presbytery in every case should take the opinion of the people where a presentee was presented, and that if the people vetoed the presentee he should be rejected. This was appealed against in the Civil Courts, and it was decided that the veto was ultra vires. At the last moment, after the secession took place, an Act, called Lord Aberdeen's Act, was passed. It was a confusing and bungling piece of legislation, and no human being could tell whether under its terms the mere dissent of the congregation could be accepted as a veto on the appointment of a presentee. I have myself the honour, or the misfortune, to be—with the exception of Lord Orkney and the Crown—one of the largest and most extensive patrons in Scotland, and I have had some experience of the working of Lord Aberdeen's Act; and before the year 1874 I had come to the conclusion that it was full of dangers to the Church. Nothing could be more objectionable than the state of things under it. Every man in the parish was encouraged by law to come forward and state objections to the personal qualifications of the candidate. They might object that they thought his manner was stiff, that his language was not strictly scriptural; and, of course, the best men in the Church gradually became unwilling to face such an ordeal. The objections were stated against them before the presbytery, which could not tell how far they could give effect to them or not. The result of my experience was that it was hopeless to present a man to a parish who had not the approval of a large portion of the population; and my practice habitually was to ask the congregation to appoint a committee, and when the congregation were likely to agree upon a man, unless I saw there were great objections to him, I presented him. The system was one of popular election by the members of the Church, subject to the veto of the patron. The system could not go on. There were repeated attempts to bring the question again before the Civil Courts, and great dangers arose lest, under an adverse decision in the Civil Courts, the Church should again be bound hand and foot and fettered by the State. It was under these circumstances that the Conservative Government of the late Lord Derby came to the conclusion, in which I entirely agreed, that it would be wise to make a new law giving that power to the congregation, recognizing that popular right which practically they now hold in their hands, and which, if they were violated, would probably bring calamities on the Church. The Conservatives of that day thought they were in this taking a conservative step; and I fully concurred in their determination, and I avow my share with my noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) who is not now present, in the drafting of that Bill. I understand that the noble Earl's present Motion is intended chiefly for the purpose of bringing in to the election of ministers men who are not members of the Church at all; but a great part of his speech was against women.

THE EARL OF MINTO: I did not say so.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: No; that is what I object to. Great part of the noble Earl's speech was directed against women, and yet his Motion does not propose to exclude them. Are we to gather from his speech that women and young communicants are to be excluded? The question arose in drafting the Bill of 1874 whether Parliament should define the constituency by the terms of the Statute, or leave it for the Church. It was proposed at one time that the constituency should be specified by the Act of Parliament to be the communicants. I myself had and have an insuperable objection to Parliament attaching qualifications to the taking of the Holy Communion. We all now look back with wonder and amazement at the fact that a very few years ago not only Conservatives, but a very large part of the Liberal Party, were willing to maintain a system in England by which partaking of the Holy Communion was made a necessity for civil office. I have an insuperable objection to Parliament re-entering on that course of legislation. It is not our business to interfere with who does and who does not take the Communion. That is the business of the various officers of the Church, and, therefore, I suggested to the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) that, instead of taking the word "communicants," or, in addition to that word, we should put in the word "adherents." I did so because in the old documents connected with the Church of Scotland the word used was never "communicants," but "congregation." Of course, it was assumed in former days that all the congregation were communicants; but "congregation" was the word; and the nearest approach to that that we could make was that we should say communicants and adherents. A large number of patrons in Scotland were members of the Episcopal Church, but many of them attended, and still attend, the services of the Established Church of Scotland. They are almost universally warm friends of that Church and generous and liberal supporters of it; and I wish to leave the authorities of the Church free to consider them and other persons of a like character to be adherents of the Church, even though they be not communicants. So far from departing from the ancient principles of the Church of Scotland as my noble Friend represented, that Act was passed strictly in consonance with those principles. If he asks me the question whether I do not think that at times there are instances in which it may be a failure—whether there has never been a minister appointed whom I myself should never have voted for, I cannot deny the fact that this may be so; but what has that to do with the case? Under any possible system you would have some black sheep. Under the whole system of patronage you would have plenty of drones, and the popular party complained that the majority of the ministers appointed by the patrons were drones. That was an exaggeration; but under any system there will be men appointed by an electing body of whom my noble Friend or I myself would not approve. One may take a very narrow and insular view of this matter. It may seem to many Members of this House almost absurd that ministers of religion should be appointed by their people; and I dare say that many Members of this House think it would be inconvenient, and perhaps almost absurd, to give parishioners in England the power of appointing their clergymen. Yet there can be no doubt of the fact that in the early Church that was the general and universal practice. Nay, not only pastors, but the highest dignitaries of the Western Church, have been elected in the great assemblies of the people. We all remember the celebrated case of one of the greatest names in the hierarchy of the Christian Church who was elected by a great popular assembly, and that, too, at a time when he not only was not a priest, but was not even a baptized member of the Church, but was a Roman soldier. I remember one Member of the Episcopal Bench, and one of its most admirable members too, who, not many years ago, was a military officer, but who afterwards became a priest and a valued minister in a great parish, and whose administrative powers are well known. When Ambrose was elected a Bishop there was no such experience in regard to him; yet he was nominated in a great assembly at Milan; and yet this is the man whose words we hear every Sunday in one of the noblest hymns of Christian worship when we sing the Te Deum Laudamus. I can tell my noble Friend that during recent years we have come to have new ideas in respect to the powers and qualifications and rights of women; and I challenge him to bring forward a Motion to refuse to women the rights enjoyed by male members of the congregation. Women are more pious and more disposed to reverence than men; and I should trust the opinions of many women in such matters better than those of men. Then I come to another point. My noble Friend, in substitution for this constituency, which I maintain has acted fairly, would introduce—whom? The ratepaying class. My noble Friend has not told us to what Church he himself belongs, and I have no right to ask him. I believe that he is a supporter and in a high and good sense an adherent of the Church of Scotland. I believe that he wishes to strengthen its foundations; but he evidently does not believe in the existence of such a society as the Church of Christ. I can understand the view of our excellent friends the Quakers, than whom no section of the Church has ever carried more sincerely into the combat of life and into politics the great doctrines of Christianity. But it has no settled ministry and no settled service. I can understand the view of the Congregationalists, who say that a unit of the Church of Christ is a separate congregation, and that they have a right to appoint their own ministers and to conduct their own service. I can understand the Presbyterian view, which is a parity of pastors, but a subordination to a common law. I can understand the Anglican view, which is a parity of Bishops, although not of pastors. I can understand the Catholic view, which denies parity to pastors and Bishops too, subordinating the whole to one central government representing the supposed authority of Christ. All these theories I can sympathize with and understand to a certain extent; but the view of my noble Friend I cannot understand—that the Church of Christ consists of the same men who select the surveyors of roads and inspectors of nuisances. I tell my noble Friend, as a member of the Presbyterian Church, that if the proposition to elect ministers by the ratepayers were carried to-morrow I should immediately go for Disestablishment and Disendowment. I should be ashamed to belong to any spiritual body which pretended in such circumstances to represent any portion, any branch of the Christian Church. That, I am sure, would be the feeling of the great majority of this House, who think of the possibility of the application of such principles, such degrading principles, to the Church of England. In conclusion, I will only repeat that my noble Friend speaks, as far as I can understand, as a solitary individual. This is a crotchet of his own. There is no party in Scotland, there is no section of the Presbyterian Church, there is no section of the Episcopalian Church, which would venture to make such a proposal; and I trust that this House will never consent to appoint a Committee even to consider so preposterous a proposal.

LORD DENMAN said, he hoped the Government would not grant a Select Committee. He regretted that the late Lord Panmure had said that the abolition of patronage would not lead to the union of all Presbyterian Churches. In fact, all communicants, from any portion of the Church, including women, might occasionally take the Sacrament and vote for a minister in the Established Church, and all the clergy exchanged pulpits occasionally; and in Haddington the minister of the first charge had first been appointed by a patron to the second charge, and since 1874 had been chosen for the first charge by the vote of a majority of the communicants. It was absurd to complain of Church and State, for Kings and Queens might, according to Scripture, be nursing fathers and nursing mothers of the Church of Christ; and where there was no difference of doctrine all Christians should unite, and show that the Church was one.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): I think your Lordships will not be surprised, after the eloquent speech to which you have just listened, if I reply at once to the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government do not see their way to grant the appointment of the Committee asked for. I must express regret that the noble Earl has placed his Motion on the Paper, because he seemed to be unaware of the delicate ground on which he was treading; and if a Committee was granted, results of a more far-reaching character than the noble Earl appears to anticipate would follow. But after what has occurred, I do not regret that the Motion has been made, as it has afforded the House an opportunity of knowing what the real causes were which led up to the Act of 1874, and the part which the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) took in the framing of that Act. I carefully considered the terms of the Motion, and I confess that, after reading it over, I was at a loss to understand what the direct object of the noble Earl was; and, even after listening attentively to his speech, I am still at a loss to understand what object would be gained by the granting of the suggested Committee. The main object of the Motion appears to be that no one under the age of 21 shall be entitled to have a vote for the election of a minister of a parish, and that the Select Committee shall take into consideration the inequality between the sexes in Scotland. Those, I think, are the two principal points; but there is the further question of allowing heads of families or committees of the ratepayers and others to take part in the election of ministers. These two points, I think, were sufficiently dealt with by the noble Duke, so that your Lordships will forgive me if I do not go into the matter in detail. It is proposed to extend the right of election in various ways. First, that "the heritors of the parish (being Protestants) and the elders" should take part in the election, which means that those who are not members of the Church should have the power to vote in the election of a Minister. The same remark applies to the "heads of families," as they already have the power of voting if they are connected with the Church. I will not go into this matter further. I must point out, however, that there has been no dissatisfaction whatever expressed with the working of the Act of 1874. There are about 1,300 parishes in Scotland, and in over 700 of these elections have taken place since the Act came into force; and, generally speaking, the working of the Act has been extremely satisfactory. Of course, in some cases the ministers appointed were not, perhaps, exactly ideal parish ministers. But, on the whole, my opinion is—and I believe it is also the opinion of Scotland—that the Act has worked extremely well, and no injustice has been done. What the noble Earl seems to desire is really the appointment of a Committee to reconsider the settlement of 1874. But if any dissatisfaction had been shown with the working of the Act it would be in the power of the General Assembly to consider the subject. The regulations under which the elections are now carried out were framed by the General Assembly in 1888; and within the limits of the Act it was in the power of the General Assembly to make new regulations, should it become necessary or expedient to do so. I feel certain that if the Government were to grant the Committee asked for the noble Earl would find that not only would the results be different from what he expects, but they would inflict a great injury on the Church of Scotland, which I am certain my noble Friend does not desire.

THE EARL OF MINTO said, his object was simple in the extreme. It was to endeavour to take steps whereby the Church of Scotland should not be treated as a close Corporation, and that those outside the Church should not be entirely excluded from all management in its affairs. The Church of Scotland, in his opinion, made a great mistake when it tried to draw the lines within such narrow limits. The true policy of the Church of Scotland was to make itself more comprehensive than it was, and to trust people outside the Church much more than was done at present. He disagreed with the opinion that there was any danger likely to result from the

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, replying to a question by the noble Earl (the Earl of Minto), said, that minors who were interested and were upon the Roll of the Church ought to have a vote in the election of a minister.

CORONERS BILL.—(No. 36.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1 (Appointment of coroners to be made by the Lord Chancellor).

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he begged to move, as an Amendment, to except the appointment of County Coroners from the operation of the clause. He objected to give to the Crown the patronage of an appointment paid out of the County Rates.

Moved, in page 1, line 5, leave out ("coroners for counties").—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, their Lordships would remember that in introducing the Bill he said more than once that he was not enamoured of the functions he proposed to confer on the Lord Chancellor. His noble and learned Friend opposite had also on the Paper an Amendment providing that the County Coroners should be appointed by the "County Authority." The question was, what was the "County Authority?" If it were proposed to place this matter in the hands of a joint committee of the County Councils which were to be created and the Justices at Quarter Sessions, he would gladly agree to that. Everybody, he thought, was agreed that the present system of election by freeholders, as far as County Coroners were concerned, could not be continued, and a late election had called particular attention to the matter; but the question was with whom the duty of appointment was to rest. At present, however minute a man's freehold interest might be, or however short might have been his tenure of that interest, he was entitled to vote. No doubt, a scrutiny was incident to every right of voting, but in the election of Coroners it would have to be conducted without a register, so that every person voting would have to be tried before the Sheriff as the Returning Officer.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that, of course, he had not had time to consider the proposal of his noble and learned Friend, but he did not quite like it. In boroughs the Coroner was appointed by the Borough Council, and he trusted that the County Councils about to be created would be no less worthy of confidence. It seemed to him rather a reflection on the latter Bodies if, at the outset, the Government showed them that they were not prepared to trust them with powers which for years past had been exercised by the Councils of boroughs. What was to be done in the case of places like Liverpool and Manchester, which would be counties in themselves? Hitherto they had always elected their own Coroners. Were they to continue to do so? If so, there would be this curious state of things—that the Councils of Liverpool and Manchester would appoint their Coroners, but the other Councils in the same county would not. Surely there were great anomalies and inconveniences in such a system as that? The best system would surely be the uniform system of leaving it to the County Councils throughout the country. He would also like to point out that this question of electing Coroners involved a certain amount of sentiment, and, though it was clear the present system of election could not go on, it struck him that the wisest course would be to make the Coroner as much as possible a representative officer. That would best be done by putting the election in the hands of a Representative Body like the County Council.

THE EARL OF JERSEY thought that as the salary of the County Coroner would be paid by the County Council that would be the best authority in whom to vest the appointment.

EARL COWPER said, he hoped that the appointment would be given to the County Council. This was a matter which would most legitimately fall within its control.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it would be somewhat peculiar for the House at the present moment to place the appointment in the hands of the County Council, having regard to the fact that no such Body was in existence,

THE EARL OF DERBY said, as the Bill was brought in it proposed to vest this appointment in the Lord Chancellor. The noble and learned Lord had now brought forward a new proposal. Under those circumstances, he thought it should be deferred for some time, so that it might be fully considered in the interval.

LORD HALSBURY admitted that the Bill originally proposed to vest the appointment in the Lord Chancellor; but when introducing the Bill he distinctly stated that he should be glad to accept some other proposal that would relieve the Lord Chancellor of this task. He could not agree that the matter was not urgent. There had been an election of a Coroner within the last week which had been the subject of the greatest possible complaint. If this Bill was postponed until the passing of another Bill in "another place," which might or might not come here, he did not think that it would then receive much attention. In his opinion, the joint committee of Quarter Sessions and County Council would make an excellent electoral body for this purpose.

LORD BASING said, that if there was a doubt as to the existence of the County Councils, the joint committee suggested was even more shadowy.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the election should be placed in the hands of the County Council. He was astonished at the amount of distrust of the County Council which was manifested. Why should it be feared that the County Council would not be as excellent a body as the Town Council? If anything, there was reason to think that the men elected on to the County Councils would be even more trustworthy men.

LORD HALSBURY said, he was quite prepared to accept the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend placing the appointment in the hands of "the County Authority," and to postpone the discussion of what "the County Authority" should mean.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM thought the appointment would best be placed in the hands of Quarter Sessions. He hoped the Government would not withdraw the Bill, which contained provisions of great value.

Moved, "That the House do now resume," agreed to; House resumed accordingly.

MALTA—THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government can give satisfactory information with regard to the working and efficiency of the new Constitution of Malta, and of the manner in which it has been received by the Maltese people; also, whether a copy of a resolution moving an address to the Governor, and carried unanimously by the Council of Government on the 30th of May last, praying him to petition Her Majesty for the establishment of a Militia regiment in Malta, can be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether any communications on that subject have been made by the Governor to the present or any former Colonial Secretary; and, if so, whether they can be laid upon the Table of the House? He also wished to move for a Return in the words of which he had given Notice—

Moved, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty for Return of the amount of the annual contribution from the revenue of Malta for military purposes, and of the amount remitted directly or indirectly in drawbacks to the military authorities, with the view of ascertaining the possibility of applying these sums towards defraying the expenses of the Militia."—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA observed, that he had recently had an opportunity of gauging the feelings of the people of Malta with respect to the formation of a Militia regiment. He felt sure that the formation of such a corps would be viewed most favourably, and would tend to increase the loyalty of the people.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): The noble Earl has always taken a keen interest in this subject, and has endeavoured to ascertain and forward the wishes of the Maltese to acquire larger powers in the management of local affairs, and I believe his work has been thoroughly appreciated in the Island. No one, therefore, will be better pleased than the noble Earl to hear my reply to the first part of his Question. I can assure him that the new Constitution has been received with satisfaction by all classes in Malta, and that up to the present moment it has worked most successfully. This success is largely owing to the tact and judgment of the Governor, Sir Lintorn Simmons, and the Colonial Secretary; but it is mainly owing to the hearty co-operation and loyal support of the elected members under the new Constitution, and especially of the three elected members of the Council of Government, who are also members of the Executive Council. There were, no doubt, many persons who wished to see larger and more sweeping changes in the Constitution; but they had, nevertheless, shown a spirit of moderation and a loyal desire to support the Government and the new order of things. The Constitution was not yet in operation in its entirety. As part of it, it had been decided to divide the Island into districts, and to assign a member to each district; but, as it was found impossible to collect in this country the necessary information for the purpose of deciding what should be the actual districts, or whether any district should be represented by more than one member, a Royal Commission was appointed to go to Malta to examine into the matter. The Commission has now reported that the proposal to divide the Island into districts had been received with great favour throughout the whole Island. As the Commissioners took very great trouble to ascertain the views of the people, and went into all the districts and examined persons of all classes, I may, perhaps, read a passage of their Report to your Lordships. The Commissioners state that they have acquired a clear insight into the opinions and feeling of all sections of the inhabitants of the country districts, and that they have—

"Satisfied themselves by abundant proofs that the decision of Her Majesty's Government to divide Malta into several electoral divisions was equally just in itself and in accordance with the interests and wishes of the great majority of the persons principally affected by this change from the former system, under which the entire community, both urban and rural, was treated as one single constituency."

From this change, which has long been advocated by leading men, I anticipate very good results, for it will, I believe, tend to create a more lively and intelligent interest in local questions affecting the well-being of the people. It will come into operation when the next Council of Government is elected. Her Majesty's Government have certainly made large concessions to the people of Malta, and conferred upon them considerable privileges. This they have done in the full belief that the new Council of Government would meet them in a loyal spirit, and that its future proceedings would conduce largely to the credit and prosperity of the island without infringing in any way the rights and duties of the Crown. I may, perhaps, be allowed to observe that the power of the Crown to protect Imperial interests has been secured by the provisions of the Letters Patent. In answer to the second Question of the noble Earl, I have to say that the proposal to establish a Militia regiment was first made by the present Governor in 1885, when the Earl of Derby was Secretary of State. That noble Lord viewed the suggestion very favourably; but it appears to have been shelved for a time, as some questions were under consideration affecting the Malta Fencibles. It has now been revived by a unanimous Resolution of the Council of Government, and the Governor is greatly in favour of the establishment of a regiment. I have myself a strong belief that the creation of this Militia is advisable, both from an Imperial point of view, as adding to the defensive power of Malta, and from a Colonial point of view, as bringing all classes together and giving them a lively interest in the defence of the Colony; and I am very glad to find that the noble Lord who has last spoken is also in favour of the scheme. The matter has been referred to the War Office, and a favourable consideration for it has been asked. It is hardly necessary to add that the War Office would probably be the first Department to recognize the importance of having this addition to the Forces in Malta; and I, therefore, hope that their Report will be favourable. The Treasury must also be consulted on the subject. The Papers for which the noble Earl asks can not be well presented until a final decision shall have been arrived at; and I hope that the noble Earl will, therefore, consent to wait a little time for the Papers and the Return for which he has asked.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that he would accede to the request made by the noble Lord.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) — THE SOUTH AND WEST COASTS.—RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF HOWTH, in rising to move—

said, it was not his intention at present to enter into a discussion upon the whole question of the Report of the Royal Commission. He ventured to assert, however, that he approved of its principal observations, which consisted in the proposal to develop the deep sea fishing apart from those in shore or near the shore; that large vessels manned by skilled crews were to be constructed; that full-sized and deep harbours were to be erected; and that railway communication was to be established towards them for the purpose of facilitating the exportation of the captured fish for the English markets. This policy was a total subversion of the principles of the Irish Fishery Act of 1869, which, by promoting the building of small fishing piers, had conferred benefit and relief upon the coast population. He was certainly not opposed to seeing relief extended to congested and poor districts. Quite the contrary; but he ventured to think that expenditure could be beneficially made in improving the condition of the fisheries. The Irish fisheries, with the exception of the mackerel fishery in a small portion of the South-Western Coast of Ireland, had been very fully explained and entered into in this Report; and it would appear that in the opinion of the Commissioners it had been proved that there was an inexhaustible supply of fish on the Western and Southern Coast, and that, with the assistance of future legislation, great benefits might be conferred on the fishing industry. It was clear that the fishing grounds had never at any time been fully inspected and considered, and that thorough inspection of them was absolutely necessary in order that it might be fully proven what was the supply of fish upon them, what was the quality and the species of the fish, and in what localities they were to be found, before an expenditure of a large sum of money was entered upon. It was always a matter for consideration, also, whether the youths who were employed on the sea fisheries of Ireland, and entirely on the sea fisheries of Ireland, should continue their profession unless more happy prospects might be secured to the future of the Irish fisheries. This inspection was really and decidedly a case of what might be termed urgency. In all that had taken place hitherto, it was assumed that there were inexhaustible supplies of fish; but there was a striking absence of information that could be relied upon. The only argument urged against immediate inspection of the coast was that no European nation had made such inspection; but the truth was the waters of all civilized countries were thoroughly well known, the habits of their fish had been studied, and there was no necessity for the inspection which was so urgent in this case. It was essential for the sake of Irish fishermen who were seeking the means of livelihood; in the interests of English fishermen who were on the look-out for new fishing grounds; in the interests of the British public who wanted larger and cheaper supplies of fish; and in the interests of the British taxpayer who was anxious to see more fish caught in return for the money that had been expended upon the Irish Fisheries. The Report recommended an expenditure of £400,000 on harbours and railways communicating with them; and it would be most unwise to incur this expenditure without more definite information as to the fishing grounds. For the purposes of inspection, and to obtain information for the guidance of fishermen, the American Government granted no less than £120,000 a-year. With regard to the second Resolution, the Royal Commission had very clearly and decidedly recommended the dismissal of the three Irish Fishery Commissioners—Sir Thomas Brady, Major Hayes, and Mr. Hornsby. They recommended that there should be substituted for them a Board of practical men connected with the fisheries; that only one of them, the Chairman, should receive a salary, and that the rest of the Board should be composed of unpaid members. He was opposed to that proposal, but he would not now enter into details in connection with the matter. It was evident that the Royal Commissioners considered that the present Fishery Officers were unfitted for their duties, and that they were also dissatisfied with the way in which they managed the Irish Fisheries. He ventured to urge upon Her Majesty's Government that if they had decided that these men should be dismissed, it was very unfair to allow this sentence to remain hanging over them, even till next Session, or even after the present Session was past. There were in Ireland, he was sorry to say, in fishery matters as in politics, two programmes. The popular programme was that fishery grounds should not be made subservient to the interests of the coast population; while the other view was that the fishery grounds were not to be made subservient to supplying the demands of England with fish. The Irish fisheries were at present regulated by the Act of 1869, which was introduced immediately after the Election by Mr. Blake, then Member for Waterford, and received a very liberal support from the Irish county Members as well as the Members for boroughs. It was approved of by the Government and received their support, and its main features supported his first Resolution. The expenditure of thousands of pounds on the construction of harbours and railways would give enormous employment to the people. It would aid the farmers and the shopkeepers, and also, perhaps, the publicans would be paid. The whole neighbourhood would derive enormous benefit by these small piers, and they certainly were very popular all over Ireland. Mr. Blake, the previous Chairman of the Fishery Commissioners, had supported these principles for years, and Sir Thomas Brady had also supported them. He thought it was pretty clear that the Commissioners exceeded their powers in making an inquiry into the Irish Fishery administration, and he hoped that the sweeping measure of removing Sir Thomas Brady, who was a gentleman of great experience and ability, and two other Commissioners, which had been suggested by the Royal Commission, would not be adopted by Her Majesty's Government.

Moved to resolve—

1 "That an immediate survey of the fishing grounds on the south and west coast of Ireland is much required:

2 That in the event of Her Majesty's Government accepting the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works to reconstruct the Irish Fishery Department, legislation be not delayed beyond the present Session of Parliament."—(The Earl of Howth.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl O'DOGAN) said, that it would be impossible not to sympathize with the objects of the noble Earl in placing his Motion on the Table; and he was certainly not prepared to say that it would not be desirable that the survey of the fishing grounds on the South and West Coasts should be made as soon as possible. It was quite true that the Commissioners did in one paragraph of their Report recommend that some such survey should be made, but they did not lay much stress upon the recommendation. Undoubtedly it was a point which must be considered in connection with other matters dealt with by the Commission. In reply to the last portion of the noble Earl's Motion, he could only say that it was not the wish of the Government to delay any legislation in connection with this subject longer than was necessary; but he would remind the noble Earl that on a previous occasion he informed him that the Commissioners were instructed to deal with the subjects which were to come before them in the order most advantageous to the Public Service, and they took the question of arterial drainage first and issued their Report on that subject before the Report on Irish Fisheries. The Government had thought it better to follow the order of these subjects adopted by the Commissioners. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had accordingly prepared, as he said some time ago he would prepare, three Bills on the subject of arterial drainage, and when he informed the noble Earl that these Bills were prepared and printed at Whitsuntide, and that his right hon. Friend had not even yet had an opportunity of presenting them in the House of Commons, it would show how impossible it was for them to give any pledge as to when legislation in connection with the Fisheries would be begun, and whether there was any prospect of passing a Bill on that subject during the present Session. He would not follow the noble Earl in the remarks which he had made as to the recommendations of the Royal Commission, nor did he think it necessary to say much on the question of whether the Royal Commissioners had exceeded their authority or not, because, as the noble Earl was well aware, Her Majesty's Government had no control over Royal Commissions, and if any recommendation that the Commissioners had made were ultra vires, so as to render objectionable such legislation as might be founded upon them, that was a matter which could be dealt with when they came to introduce into Parliament the measures on this subject which, no doubt, it would be their duty to bring forward. So far as the Motion of the noble Earl was concerned he trusted that he would not now consider it necessary to go to a Division. He could only say that the subject of Fisheries had received the anxious attention of the Government, and it was their wish to proceed with legislation on the subject with as little delay as possible.

THE EARL OF HOWTH said, he must express his appreciation of the anxious desire of Her Majesty's Government to promote the industries of Ireland, and he was in no hurry on the subject of his Motion. He would be quite satisfied if satisfactory legislation were introduced next year.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord Ashbourne.)

(NO. 93.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Cork and Belfast local bankruptcy courts).

LORD FITZGERALD begged to move the omission of the clause. This was a subject which affected the taxpayers of the United Kingdom, as from his experience he could not fail to see that this measure, if passed, would entail very considerable and unjustifiable expense. He pointed out that there were no less than four Bills pending at present in the House of Commons having reference to the reduction of the judicial strength in Dublin, and other matters connected with the administration of the law, and he contended that it would be unwise, as it was unnecessary, to enact such a measure as this.

Moved, to omit Clause 4.—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE) said, he was tolerably familiar with the Bills pending in the House of Commons to which his noble and learned Friend had referred, and he was bound to say that he entirely failed to see the relevancy of these Bills to the Bill now before their Lordships, and if they were passed by their Lordships, they would not have the remotest bearing upon this question of Local Bankruptcy at all. Then his noble and learned Friend raised the point of increased expenditure, and he ventured to think that there was not one of their Lordships who would not have supposed, from his noble and learned Friend's remarks, that by this moderate Bill he proposed to manufacture two brand new Courts, two brand new Judges, with brand new officials. Nothing of the kind. It only proposed to utilize existing Judges and existing officers, and only supplemented these officers where it was proved to be absolutely necessary. The only proposal it made was that it conferred upon existing Judges this much sought after and desired local bankruptcy jurisdiction. Since this question was last before their Lordships a meeting had been held in Cork which was attended by all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and at which Resolutions had been passed strongly in favour of this Bill being passed. The Recorder of Cork alone, as far as his noble and learned friend had stated, was against it. And in Belfast there was a large meeting held in favour of this Bill. He found that the Chambers of Commerce of England and the United Kingdom had passed Resolutions in favour of local bankruptcy jurisdiction and in favour of such legislation taking place in Ireland. What authorities was his noble and learned Friend able to marshal against the Bill? Mr. Richard Davoren, a highly respectable solicitor practising in the Dublin Bankruptcy Court, of course, was against it, and another respectable solicitor, Mr. Bennett Thompson, gave his individual opinion against it, and he was bound to say that a more meagre support had never been given to the opposition to a Bill than the letter written by the Secretary of the Incorporated Law Society saying that they did not wish any further action to be taken in that House with regard to this Bill. Last year three Bills had been introduced into the House of Commons on this very question, one of them by Mr. Sexton, who was known not to be a Conservative. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee, with Mr. Sexton as Chairman, and in all essential lines this Bill was the same as the Bill when it emerged from the Select Committee. Then they were asked not to pass this Bill because Mr. Chamberlain's Act of 1883 worked well. Mr. Chamberlain's Bill of 1883 made important changes in the law and procedure. This Bill made no change whatever in the law, and if it was thought desirable afterwards to adopt any or all of the provisions of the Act of 1883, there would be nothing in this Bill to interfere with that being done. He hoped their Lordships would consider it unreasonable to withhold what was sought for for a great many reasons—namely, the establishment of local bankruptcy jurisdiction, and that they would give it in the way which commended itself to the judgment of all those most interested in this question.

EARL SPENCER thought it was desirable that facilities for bankruptcy proceedings should be extended locally in Ireland. When he was in Ireland representations were made to him from different parts of the country strongly urging the Government not to drop the clauses with regard to Ireland which originally appeared in the Bill of 1883. He would be the last person to wish to add to the already overgrown judicial state of Ireland; but when he read the Bill he did not understand it would necessitate anything like the expense his noble and learned Friend feared—considering that no new Judges or officers would be required. He hoped that the greatest possible care would be taken to see that the salaries and allowances under it would be moderate. If his noble and learned Friend had pressed his Motion to a Division he certainly should be obliged to vote against him and in favour of the Bill.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a on Friday next.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (IMPRISONMENT OF MR. JOHN DILLON).

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following letter relating to the imprisonment of a Member of this House :—

Dundalk,
June 20, 1888.

SIR,

I have the honour to report that Mr. John Dillon, M.P. for East Mayo, duly appealed to me, as County Court Judge and Chairman of Quarter Sessions, from two Orders of Conviction made one on the 11th May, 1888, and one on the 12th May, 1888, whereby he was convicted under the first of said Orders of having with other persons unlawfully taken part in a Criminal Conspiracy, punishable by Law, to compel and induce certain persons, tenants of farms situate in divers parts of Ireland, not to fulfil their legal obligations, to wit, to refuse to pay to the owners of such farms the rents which they the said tenants were and might become lawfully bound to pay, and which the owners of said farms were and might become lawfully entitled to be paid; and, under the 2nd of said Orders, of inciting persons unlawfully to take part in a Criminal Conspiracy, stated in the same terms. Upon each of these convictions Orders were made that Mr. Dillon should be imprisoned for six months without hard labour, the sentences to run concurrently.

Mr. Dillon appeared in due course before me this day at the Quarter Sessions held at Dundalk, in the said county, when, upon hearing the evidence and what was advanced by Mr.

Dillon in his defence, I affirmed the conviction and the sentence in each case.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

W. KISBEY,

County Court Judge of Armagh and Louth.

The Right Honourable

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

QUESTIONS.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND)
—MR. T. A. STEWART, INSPECTOR OF SCHOOLS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he will inform the House what is the nature of the special merit which entitled Mr. T. A. Stewart, Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools, to be promoted over the heads of nine of his colleagues; what are the defects in the official career of the nine superseded inspectors which led to their being passed over; upon what grounds was the senior of the nine—namely, Mr. William Jolly, superseded; and, what are the grounds upon which promotion by seniority to the higher grade of Inspectorships has been departed from for the first time in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have already stated the grounds upon which Mr. Stewart was appointed one of the Chief Inspectors; and their Lordships must decline to discuss the individual merits of the officers who were not chosen to fill that office.

WAR OFFICE—ARMY ACCOUTREMENTS
—THE 3RD BEDFORDSHIRE REGIMENT—VALISES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is in a position to give further information regarding the 800 valises supplied to the 3rd Bedfordshire Regiment, and reported as unfit for use after three trainings; and, the total number of valises of the description in question supplied to the British Government, and the names of the contractors and of the officers who passed them?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied)

said: Specimens of these were sent from the Eastern District for examination at Woolwich. They, however, only left the district the day before yesterday; and, considering the time necessary to examine them, it will be at least a week before I can answer this Question.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. W. J. GLASGOW, COOKSTOWN, CO. TYRONE.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report in The Northern Whig of June 11, of proceedings at the Petty Sessions held at Cookstown, County Tyrone, on the previous day, in which Mr. W. J. Glasgow, proprietor of an extensive drapery establishment in that town, was charged with riotous and indecent behaviour on May 14; whether, at the trial, the solicitor for Mr. Glasgow stated he was instructed that a magistrate then on the Bench had instigated the prosecution for the purpose of injuring Mr. Glasgow in his business; whether the charge was dismissed by the magistrates; and, if he can state who was the prosecutor, and on what grounds the prosecution was initiated?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University), in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case by the Question of the hon. Member. The summons was issued by the Town Clerk. The charge was dismissed by the magistrates, there being no evidence against the defendant. The solicitor for the defence did make the statement mentioned in the second paragraph of the Question; but the Town Clerk, who prosecuted, said there was not a shadow of foundation for the assertion. From the Report before him (Mr. Madden) the case appeared to be one of mistaken identity.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICE, LIVERPOOL—STAMPING.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the case that the Inland Revenue Office at Liverpool has not facilities for the stamping of plain parchment and paper as exist in Manchester, whereby some delay is caused, and the usual discount upon impressed stamps cannot be obtained in Liverpool; whether there is any reason for this difference in the facilities afforded by the Revenue Authorities to the two cities; and, whether he will take steps to remedy the inconvenience arising in Liverpool therefrom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's Hanover Square): Facilities have recently been given, and further facilities are about to be given, at Liverpool to meet the delay referred to in the Question, and it is hoped that they will prove sufficient for their purpose. As regards the allowance of discount, I have to inform the hon. Member that the general question of discounts is now under consideration.

RIOTS AND DISTURBANCES (IRELAND)—DISTURBANCES AT KILRUSH, COUNTY CLARE.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to a paragraph in The Freeman's Journal of the 18th instant, in which it is stated:—

"That after the public bellman had announced through the streets of Kilrush, County Clare, the result of the Election for the Ayr Burghs, a patrol of police paraded the streets carrying revolvers and truncheons. In the market square a group, rejoicing at the result of the election, was attacked by the police, and a man named Masterson was arrested. On Masterson protesting against the arrest and refusing to go to the barracks excitement ensued, and four policemen drew their revolvers, presented them at the crowd, declaring they would fire if interfered with, one constable striking Masterson on the head with his baton," &c.

And, whether these statements are true; and, if so, will he take steps to prevent interference by the police with people expressing their satisfaction at a political victory.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the District Inspector reported there was no truth in the statements of the newspaper paragraph. The actual circumstances were these—About 8 p.m., and two and a-half hours after the bellman had made the announcement, a patrol of three constables went out in the ordinary way armed with revolvers. Masterson, who was drunk, accosted them in the street. They told him to go home. He then attacked them, and they arrested him for being drunk and disorderly. The crowd began to throw stones. One of the police struck Masterson, who had hold of another constable by the throat at the time. More stones were thrown. The police drew their revolvers, and the crowd fell back. Masterson was brought to the barrack and subsequently discharged.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W): Is it the ordinary way for patrols of police to go armed with revolvers in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the way in which the police were attacked showed it was necessary they should be armed.

VACCINATION ACTS—CONVICTIONS AT BATH.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that, on the 12th of this month, 18 persons were convicted by the Bath Bench of Magistrates for offences under the Vaccination Acts; whether several of the magistrates who adjudicated on the occasion were members of the Bath Board of Guardians, and were, therefore, prosecutors in the cases on which they adjudicated; whether it is usual or legal for prosecutors to sit in judgment on cases in which they are personally interested; whether the fines inflicted in these cases have to be paid to the Treasurer of the Bath Board of Guardians; whether there were any irregularities in these prosecutions; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will revise the sentences of the Bench.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; the fact is as stated. Two out of the three magistrates who adjudicated are elected Guardians for the Bath Union. They had, however, taken no part in directing any of the prosecutions; and therefore, as I am advised, were not disqualified from sitting in judgment. The law as to the disqualification of Justices from adjudicating in cases in which they are personally interested is laid down in many well-known legal text-books, and cannot be stated within the compass of an answer. I understand that the fines in question were paid to the Treasurer of the city. I cannot ascertain that there were any irregularities in these prosecutions; and, as at present advised, I see no reason to interfere in the matter.

CRIMINAL LAW—STABBING CASE AT LIVERPOOL—CASE OF JOHN DUGGAN.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Duggan, who, after stabbing a girl without provocation just below the right ear, was discharged by the Recorder of Liverpool without any punishment; whether the Home Office is aware that street ruffianism in Liverpool has been for some time the subject of consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Judges; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case above-mentioned?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this case, and I have obtained a Report from the Recorder upon it, who informs me that the prisoner, a youth of 18, was standing in the street, drunk, with a knife in his hand, with which he struck at a woman who was passing and inflicted a wound skin-deep. The act was without motive or provocation. He had been three weeks in prison, had a good character, and his employers were willing to receive him back if speedily released. He was also the sole support of a widowed mother and seven children. Under these circumstances, the Judge thought it right to sentence him to two days' imprisonment. In the opinion of the Judge, the case had no connection with the street ruffianism referred to in the Question.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTRICT INSPECTOR TILLY.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) (for Sir THOMAS ESMONDE) (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether District Inspector Tilly, R.I.C., has yet received the promotion promised him; and, if not, whether he can state when this officer will be promoted?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector mentioned has not yet received promotion. I am not able to say when the opportunity may arise.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887—EMPLOYMENT OF CONVICT PRISONERS.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any Report as to the effect of the remission of hard labour to the exclusion of any other form of employment in cases of imprisonment under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act has within the last 12 months been made by any of the medical or other officials of Her Majesty's prisons in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board inform me that no convicted criminal prisoner in Ireland, whether sentenced to hard labour or not, is unemployed, except on medical grounds, the Board being required by the 47th section of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 49, to find employment for prisoners not sentenced to hard labour.

MR. W. H. JAMES: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the nature of the employment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not very intimately acquainted with the Prison Rules; but I suppose the same Rule obtains in Ireland as in England in the matter.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): Is it not a fact that prisoners not sentenced to hard labour have to break stones and pick oakum, the same as ordinary prisoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have just called attention to the fact that the Prisons Board have to find employment for all prisoners.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, does he not think he ought to acquaint himself with the Prison Rules?

[No reply.]

MR. W. H. JAMES: I beg to give Notice that I will ask the right hon. Gentleman a further Question on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE—RECEIPTS FROM LICENCES AND INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, previous to the discussion of Clause 18 of the Local Government Bill, a Return showing the revenue derived from licences on the sale of intoxicating liquors, and from the Inhabited House Duty, respectively, for each county in England and Wales?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I could give the hon. Member the Return which he asks for with regard to existing counties. But, if he wants them for the counties as they will be constituted by the Local Government Bill, it would be possible to give the Return of the revenue derived from licences, as that has already been prepared; but the Return of the Inhabited House Duty could only be obtained with much trouble, and would require some time.

MR. CAINE said, the old areas would be sufficient.

MR. GOSCHEN: Then the Return can be given.

INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND) — THE LAGAN NAVIGATION COM-PANY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Does he still intend paying £3,500 to the Lagan Navigation Company for taking over the Ulster and Tyrone Canals, which have cost the country £300,000; will he, at least, not make over to them the profit rental of £130 a-year for lands and houses; will he make inquiry, before paying the £3,500, as to the truth of Mr. J. G. V. Porter's statement in his newspaper of June 13, that he, in 1875, bought £2,000 worth of Lagan Company's Stock for £300, and that Messrs. Wyat, solicitors, have a claim of £1,500 against the Lagan Company for promoting the Ulster Canal Bill; is the Lagan Company a limited or an unlimited liability Company; and will any security be taken by the Treasury that none of the £3,500 granted by the taxpayers shall go to defray Bill promotion; but shall all be laid out in works on the Ulster and Tyrone Canals?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): Sir, I think it will be the intention of the Government to propose to Parliament an Estimate for the sum of £3,500, as stated in the first Question. I do not think, with reference to the second Question, that the rental of the land and houses should be separated from the general undertaking. With reference to the third paragraph, I have no information; nor with regard to Paragraph 4. With regard to the fifth Question, I will endeavour to make the best arrangement I can to secure that the £3,500 shall be spent on the works.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Might I ask the hon. Gentleman, before this Company is to get a gift of £300,000 and a second gift of £3,500, whether he would first make himself acquainted with the matter—namely, that this Company, which is alleged to be worth £70,000, sold £2,000 worth of its Stock a few years ago for £300; and also inquire whether this is a Company of limited liability or unlimited, in order to give taxpayers some guarantee that these gentlemen have some assets at all events?

MR. JACKSON: I would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that this Question did not appear on the Paper until this morning. I was engaged on a Committee upstairs, and had no time to make inquiry; but the hon. and learned Gentleman knows that I have already stated, when the Bill was in Committee, that I would take every precaution I could in the agreement handing over the property—if the agreement is come to—that every precaution shall be secured that the money shall be expended on the works.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will repeat the Question. I might remind the hon. Gentleman that I sent him a copy of Mr. Porter's paper, Ireland's Gazette, which contained the statement, yesterday.

MR. JACKSON: Yes; but I think the hon. and learned Gentleman himself would hardly have accepted the mere statement of a newspaper.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is right to state that Mr. Porter is a gentleman who has spent tens of thousand on such works.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIION AT CLOGHER—ALLEGED CRUEL TREATMENT.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following account of an eviction in Ireland, which is taken from a London paper:—

"An eviction was carried out yesterday on the property of Mr. Montroy Gledstones Fardroes, Clogher, telegraphs our Dublin correspondent. Nearly 40 police were in attendance. The evicted family numbers six members. One, a blind boy, received the last sacrament last evening, and the father, an old man of 80 years, was so weak and ill as to appear utterly unconscious of what was going on around him. Another son besought the Sub-Sheriff (Mr. McKelvey) to delay the removal of the father from bed till the parish priest might be sent for, as the arrival of Mr. McKelvey had taken the family by surprise, but the officer was inexorable. The old man was then transferred from his bed to a cart, in which he was conveyed to the house of a son-in-law, where he received the last sacrament immediately afterwards from the parish priest;"

whether his attention has been called to the following statement of the parish priest, which appeared in the newspapers of yesterday, in connection with the eviction in question:—Rev. John McKenna, parish priest of Clogher, writes to The Freeman—

"The blind boy who received the last sacraments of the Church from the curate of this parish the day before the eviction has since made a partial though uncertain recovery. But the father, who received the last sacrament from me immediately after the eviction, continued to sink till yesterday evening, when he departed at the hour of 8 o'clock. It is absolutely certain that Hugh Bogue was in a dying state when he was carried forth from his house on a bed-tick by the Sheriff's officers, and that afterwards he had not any perfectly lucid interval up to the moment of his death;"

whether the Government will take steps to prevent the eviction of persons who are in a dying condition; and, whether it is in the power of the Government to refuse to allow the forces of the Crown to be used in evicting persons under such painful circumstances?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that the family was six in number; but that the "blind boy" referred to is a man apparently between 30 and 40 years of age. It was stated he had received the last rites of the Church the evening before. He was, however, well enough to walk about the yard, using the most violent language to the agent. As regards the old man, there seems to be no ground for thinking that his death was hastened by the eviction. The sergeant at Clogher saw him on the 4th instant, and he appeared to be in his usual health; and it is the general opinion that he was in no worse health on the day of the eviction than he had been for 18 months previously. On the day of eviction the Assistant Sheriff (Mr. McKelvey) appealed to his family to remove him themselves, but none of them would do so; and the Sheriff's officers then carried him out most carefully on his bed to the front of the house, where he remained about a quarter of an hour, when he was removed in a cart to the residence of his son-in-law, about one mile distant. The responsibility for the eviction seems to rest, not with the landlord, whose conduct appears to have been generous, but with the son of the deceased, who was responsible for the prolonged refusal to meet the legal obligation of the tenant.

MR. W. REDMOND: In reference to that part of the right hon. Gentleman's answer where he states that the general opinion is that the death of Bogue was not hastened by being carried out, might I ask him whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the parish priest of the district, who said that it was undoubtedly the fact that Bogue was in a dying condition when he was carried out, in spite of the protests of his friends that the unfortunate man might be allowed to remain in his house until he died, and not be cast out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not aware of the opinion of the priest.

MR. W. REDMOND: It appears on the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I say I was not aware of the opinion of the priest till just now; but I cannot believe it to be accurate, in view of the fact that the man's own family refused to carry him out.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is not a fact that the reason why the man's own family refused to carry him out was that they could not carry out a man who they saw was in a dying condition; and, also, that they asked the Sub-Sheriff to leave him in the house for a few hours until he died, as it was apparent to everyone that he must?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no evidence at all to confirm that statement.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, with reference to his statement that the man's death was not hastened by his being carried out when he was lying sick, in order to satisfactorily come to a conclusion on this particular point, whether he will order an inquest, so that the Sub-Sheriff, who insisted on carrying him out in spite of the protests of his friends that he was dying, may be prosecuted for manslaughter, of which he is undoubtedly guilty?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The ordering or non-ordering of an inquest does not rest with me.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give Notice that I will, on the earliest possible moment, call further attention to the death of this man, whose death undoubtedly lies at the door of the Government.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. W. REDMOND: For when he was dying they cast him out.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) rose to put a further Question—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I call upon the hon. Gentleman whose name is next on the Paper to put his Question.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—THE ENNIS MEETING—REMARKS OF COUNTY COURT JUDGE KELLY.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the following report which appeared in The Star of June 21:—

"The sentence of three months' imprisonment passed on Mr. James Halpin for the Ennis meeting was yesterday confirmed at the Quarter Sessions by County Court Judge Kelly. An application to make the prisoner a first-class misdemeanant was refused. Colonel Turner gave evidence of the circumstances attending the meeting at Ennis in an old corn store. Judge Kelly: How is it you did not arrest the promoters of the meeting?—The Witness: They did not give me the chance.—Judge Kelly: Oh, yes, they did. They came down here from Dublin. It is hard to punish poor people, and allow these fellows, the organisers, to go free.—The Witness: I would be only too glad to arrest them if I thought I had a chance.—The Judge: Their presence was quite enough. You had the placard and the articles in United Ireland calling on the people to go and hear Mr. Davitt;"

and, whether, if a prosecution is instituted, he will undertake that no part of the proceedings will be heard by Judge Kelly, in view of the fact that the prosecution was recommended by him?

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) also had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to the following report of a discussion between Mr. Kelly, County Court Judge, County Clare, and Colonel Turner, at Ennis Quarter Sessions, which appeared in The Daily News of the 20th instant—namely:—

"The sentence of three months' imprisonment passed on Mr. James Halpin, a member of the National League, for attending a proclaimed meeting at Ennis, was confirmed on appeal at the Quarter Sessions by County Court Judge Kelly. An application to make the prisoner a first-class misdemeanant was refused. Prisoner was taken to Limerick Prison at night.

Colonel Turner, the Divisional Magistrate, gave evidence of the circumstances attending the meeting at Ennis in an old corn store.

Judge Kelly: How is it you did not arrest the promoters of the meeting?

The Witness: They did not give me a chance.

Judge Kelly: Oh! yes they did. They came down here from Dublin, and those inciting to take part in an unlawful assembly are liable to punishment under the section. It is hard to punish poor people and allow those fellows, the organisers, to go free.

The Witness: I would only be too glad to arrest them if I thought I had a chance.

The Judge said, he could not for the life of him see why the promoters of the meeting were not arrested.

The Witness: Those who incite unlawful assemblies take very good care not to attend them. In this case we only had their presence.

The Judge: Their presence was quite enough. You had the placards and the articles in United Ireland calling on the people to go and hear Mr. Davitt.

The Witness: It is not too late, my Lord, to do it now.

Judge Kelly: That may be; but, at present, I do not see why the promoters of the meeting were not prosecuted.

The Witness (Colonel Turner): I shall know what to do next time;"

whether it is the practice for Judges to advise prosecutions which afterwards may come before them for decision; and, whether, if a prosecution is instituted, he will undertake that no part of the proceedings will be heard by Judge Kelly, in view of the fact that the prosecution was recommended by him?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, there had not been time to make the necessary local inquiry to enable him to give a full answer. But he might inform the hon. Member for East Clare, if it was any consolation to him, that it was not proposed to institute any further prosecutions in connection with the meeting in question.

INDIA—ADEN HARBOUR TRUST.

MR. T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, seeing that three years have now elapsed since the Secretary of State wrote to India recommending the formation of a Harbour Trust for Aden, chiefly for the purpose of deepening the harbour, and that a Bill to create such Trust was passed by the Bombay Council a year ago, what reason is given by the Government of India for the delay now taking place in the accomplishment of this measure; and, what is the amount of the accumulated surplus at the credit of the Aden Port Fund from the dues levied upon vessels, for whose proper accommodation the improvement of the harbour has been shown to be absolutely necessary?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham): The reasons for delay are given by the Government of India in a telegram, thus—

"Cause of delay, necessity that provision should be inserted in the Bill vesting Government with power to exempt munitions of war from port charges and dues."

Pending the formation of the Port Trust, steps are being taken for deepening Aden Harbour. The balance of the Port Trust Fund is Rs.4,35,000.

CRIMINAL LAW—UNTRIED PRISONERS AND HANDCUFFS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What is the practice in England with regard to placing handcuffs on untried prisoners?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): There is no hard and fast rule with regard to the use of handcuffs in this country; but the practice recommended by the Home Office has been that handcuffing should be only resorted to where there is fair ground for supposing that either violence may be used or an escape attempted.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE BALLINASLOE BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why it is that paid Guardians have been sent to Ballinasloe, at a great expense to the Union, in view of the fact that no charge of dishonesty, corruption, or extravagance can be brought against the Guardians of the Ballinasloe Union, and that on all occasions when points of difference arose between the members of the Board they have appealed in a legal manner to the Local Government Board; and, will they soon be removed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board was obliged to dissolve the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians in consequence of the irregular and disorderly character of their meetings, and their neglect of the business of the Union. This step was not taken without previous warning to the Board of Guardians.

TURKEY (ASIATIC PROVINCES)—ATTACK ON A BRITISH SUBJECT AT ALEPPO.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that no reparation has yet been made by the Turkish Authorities to Mrs. Barker, an English lady, resident at Aleppo, whose house there was attacked, and violently entered, by a mob, led by the then Dragoman of the Governor of Aleppo, in October, 1886; whether the house of this lady is still forcibly retained by this Dragoman, who is protected by the Governor of Aleppo; whether Her Majesty's Government have addressed remonstrances to the Turkish Government on the subject of this outrage, with regard to which a Question was put in this House on the 25th of August last; and, whether they will press energetically that the proper redress shall be made?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No reparation has been made, as the respective claims of Mrs. Barker and the Dragoman are still the subject of litigation. Sir William White has, however, obtained the dismissal of the Dragoman, on account of his attempt to enforce his claim by violence. Both the Ambassador and the Consul at Aleppo have repeatedly advised as to the course that Mrs. Barker should pursue; and have explained that Her Majesty's Government cannot use diplomatic pressure in a case which the Law Courts are competent to decide.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ACT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the Killeagh habeas corpus cases can be laid upon the Table; whether the Government will re-consider, in the light of this decision, the cases of such prisoners as the Milltown Malbay men, whose sentences for refusal to supply goods have been confirmed on appeal, and who are, therefore, deprived of further legal remedy; would it be possible, under the County Court Acts, for Rules to be framed by the County Court Judges, so that the convictions they affirm under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act should in all cases refer to the evidence on which the convictions were grounded, so that it may be possible for prisoners under sentence after appeal to test the legality of their imprisonment by habeas corpus; will any steps be taken in fulfilment of the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman last year, reported in Hansard, vol. 315, p. 284, as follows:—

and, if he can state how many persons are still confined under sentences confirmed on appeal for conspiracy to compel and induce others to do or abstain from doing certain acts?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I have been asked to answer this Question, as it is mainly of a legal character; but as it only appeared upon the Paper to-day, I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to postpone it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is a matter of some little importance, and I think an answer should have been given. I gave Notice of the Question yesterday, and I do not consider that it is a matter of an entirely legal character. I ask in the Question, will any steps be taken in fulfilment of the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman, reported last year in Hansard, which was—

“There will be an appeal in every case to a County Court Judge, and if, on legal technicalities, the County Court Judge is objected to, the Government will be prepared to consider a plan for giving an appeal in cases in which a legal difficulty may be involved to a still higher tribunal.”

Surely a Question as to the carrying out of that pledge is not a Question of a legal character.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly correct in regard to the fact that he gave Notice of this Question yesterday; and I may tell him that I telegraphed over at once to Dublin to get the necessary information. With regard to the subject itself, it has been thrashed out more than once in this House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman refer me to one instance in which the question was thrashed out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have heard allusions on several occasions to this question in debate.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): You said thrashed out.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give any date.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that he desired an answer to the first part of the Question. Surely it was ascertainable as to whether the shorthand writer's notes of the Judge's decision would be laid upon the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is one of the questions we have referred to Dublin about. I do not know that there were any shorthand writer's notes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There were.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONVICTIONS AT KILLEAGH FOR CONSPIRACY.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) (for Mr. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that in the case of the four

Killeagh shopkeepers sentenced by Resident Magistrates, three to one month's and one to a fortnight's imprisonment, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, for refusing to supply the police on the Ponsonby Estate, an application was made to the magistrates to state a case to the Court of Exchequer as to the legality of the conviction for a “conspiracy to induce others not to deal with the police;” whether the Resident Magistrates refused the application in the following terms,—namely:—

“In reply to your notice served on us on the 2nd instant, calling on us to state a case for the opinion thereon of the Exchequer Division of H.M.'s High Court of Justice in Ireland, we have considered your application, and now acquaint you that we refuse to state such case, and we now sign and deliver to you this certificate of our refusal.

(Sd.) H. E. REDMOND, R.M.,

(Sd.) J. C. GARDINER, R.M.,

The Resident Magistrates who heard and determined the complaint.

Dated at Cork, 4th June, 1888;”

whether the Act allows such refusal, except on the ground that the application was “frivolous;” whether the Court of Exchequer has ordered the discharge of the prisoners on habeas corpus, on the ground that “there was absolutely no evidence to support the charge;” whether, as the prisoners by the refusal of an appeal were compelled to undergo many days of illegal custody, any compensation will be made to them; and, whether the Irish Government intend to notice in any way the action of these magistrates?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Question is identical with one that stands in the name of the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson). This is one of those Questions as to which I should be glad to have Notice. As the right hon. Gentleman will see, this Question is one as to which it is absolutely necessary I should apply to Dublin for the information he desires.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I would ask this Question, if the right hon. Gentleman cannot give me any other information, whether these two Resident Magistrates are magistrates who have been, under the terms of the Crimes Act, “certified by the Lord Lieutenant as persons of the sufficiency of whose legal knowledge he is satisfied ;" whether, after the remarks of the Judges upon their conduct, the Lord Lieutenant is still satisfied as to their legal knowledge; and, whether the Irish Government intend to keep them as persons to administer the exceptional powers of the Crimes Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I speak under correction, and without absolute cognizance of the fact; but my belief is that these gentlemen have been certified as legally competent so long ago as the year 1883.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I wish—"Order!"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe they were certified by Earl Spencer.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Not under the Crimes Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. It was under the Crimes Act.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Ridiculous.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the second part of the Question, the fact that a decision of an Inferior Court has been over-ruled by a Superior Court, is not, in my opinion, sufficient reason for making any complaint against the magistrates.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Arising out of my Question, and in face of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I would ask him whether, until the Act of last Session, there was any jurisdiction given to these magistrates on questions of conspiracy; and I would also ask him whether his attention has been called to the observations of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer as to the treatment of these cases, and the refusal of the magistrates to state a case.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir, the Act of 1882, for which these magistrates were, as I have already stated to the House, certified as being competent in the matter of legal knowledge, was quite as difficult an Act to administer as this Act. [Cries of "Answer the Question!"] That is the answer to the Question. ["No!"] Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will repeat the Question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should like to know really whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman has been called to the strictures of the Court of Exchequer on the conduct of the magistrates in this particular case, to the decision given that there was no evidence to support the charge, and that the magistrates refused to state a case for the opinion of the Court above?

Sir William Harcourt

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have seen a report, but I do not know how far it is authentic, of the observations of one Judge making comments of the nature indicated by the right hon. Gentleman; but I would point this out—that if it had been the opinion of the prisoner's counsel that the refusal to state a case was a frivolous one, he could have applied to the Court of Queen's Bench and compelled him to state a case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the prisoner's counsel. Allow me to say—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to put a Question to elucidate any point he is entitled to do so, but he cannot introduce any matter of argument.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman, Sir, has referred to me. He has stated that if the prisoner's counsel held a particular opinion he ought to have done so and so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said, could.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, could. I think I am entitled to state that on a former application made to the Court of Queen's Bench in the Brosnan case—a man whom the right hon. Gentleman was afterwards compelled to liberate unconditionally—an application was made for a mandamus to the magistrates to state a case, and it was dismissed by the Court as frivolous; and that afterwards, in the case of Sullivan, who was released by the Court of Exchequer on habeas corpus, the Queen's Bench Division refused a certiorari. No counsel for any prisoner would have any chance of getting any satisfactory decision—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Schwann.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND) — INSTRUCTIONS TO PREVENT ASSEMBLIES IN THE STREETS AT TRIALS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any new instructions have been issued during the last nine months to the Royal Irish Constabulary Forces, as to the prevention of any assembly of persons in the streets after the holding of trials in the various Court-houses in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This is one of the Questions put down without Notice. I can assure the hon. Gentleman there has been no new departure; but I cannot give him a more specific answer without further Notice. I have inquired whether a Circular was issued—it is possible it may have been; but there has been no new departure. If the hon. Gentleman will repeat the Question on Monday, I will give him an answer.

H.R.H. THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF— THE PATENT.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Patent recently issued to the Duke of Cambridge as Commander-in-Chief?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said: Yes, Sir; if the hon. Member will move for a Copy of the Patent, it will be granted.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CHAN- CERY DIVISION (LAND JUDGES) COURT—MR. P. McDERMOTT, J.P.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Peter McDermott, of Ashfield House, Kilkenny, J.P. for the City of Kilkenny, was receiver under the Chancery Division (Land Judges) in "Reade v. Reade," failed to account for moneys received by him, and, in November, 1885, filed a sworn account stating as due by the tenants arrears of rent actually received by him; whether some of the moneys thus omitted to be accounted for have since been paid into Court; whether Mr. Justice Boyd, on February 23, 1888, directed proceedings to be taken against Mr. McDermott for the balance; and, what steps the Government intend to take in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that the case of "Reade v. Reade" had long since closed, and the Question, therefore, related to another case in which there was some £5 14s. 4d. outstanding, and the Judge directed an application to be made to Mr. McDermott for an explanation in regard to it.

The Government did not propose to take any action in the matter.

MR. CHANCE: I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the Question, and to point out that he has not answered a particular item of it. I have asked him whether this Mr. McDermott failed to account for money received by him? I ask an answer to that paragraph of the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the hon. Member must be inaccurate in his Question, because the suit of "Reade v. Reade" had been disposed of for some time.

MR. CHANCE: What I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, whether in November, 1885, Peter McDermott filed a sworn account containing a statement which was untrue?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will, I think, see that it is not my business to interfere with the action of a Court of Justice, over which I have no control whatever?

MR. CHANCE: I am sorry to trouble the House, but I must point out that I have asked the right hon. Gentleman whether this gentleman is a Justice of the Peace, and whether the Government intend to take any steps in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government propose to take no step in the matter. I am sorry my voice did not reach the hon. Gentleman, but I said so in the first instance.

MR. CHANCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state that the Government will not enter a nolle prosequi if this gentleman is prosecuted for embezzlement?

[No reply.]

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLINASLOE POOR LAW BOARD.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that in the Ballinasloe Poor Law Board the elected Guardians and the ex officio Guardians are nearly equal as regards numbers; that, owing to this fact, close and bitter contests have arisen from time to time at the election of Chairman and Deputy Chairman to the Board; why, having regard to this state of things, did the Local Government Board delay a fortnight before they replied to the objections sent to them against the election of Mr. John Gardiner as Chairman of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians; whether they have pronounced the action of the gentleman who presided at the election of Mr. John Gardiner, on the 4th of April last, as illegal, and have issued an order for a new election; whether he is aware that the gentleman who acted in this illegal manner had the sanction of the Local Government Board to act as presiding officer, and that he was voted into that position by the ex officio Guardians, and against the will of the elected Guardians, and that this course was at variance with the usage of the Board, which up to that time always got the Clerk of the Union to act as presiding officer at the election of Chairman; whether the Local Government Board have received a formal communication signed by six of the elected Guardians claiming the Chairmanship for Mr. Thomas Byrne, who got 18 votes, Mr. Gardiner getting 19 at the election of the 4th of April, on the ground that some of the ex officio Guardians who voted for Mr. Gardiner had no legal right to vote; whether, at the election held on May 16, a formal protest was handed to the Chairman objecting to a new election on the ground that Mr. Byrne was the legally elected Chairman of the Board, and formal objections lodged against Major Thornhill, Mr. Orme Handy, and Mr. J. W. Potts, as having no right to vote at the election of Chairman; whether it is true that in the interval between the 14th of May, the day on which these objections were lodged with the Local Government Board, and the 23rd of May, the day on which the new Board first met, no answer to these objections had been received from the Local Government Board; that in consequence of such delay the Board had to adjourn, being powerless to go on with business while in a state of uncertainty as to their right to act as a legally-constituted body; and, is it on account of this failure on the part of the Ballinasloe Poor Law Board to fulfil duties which, owing to the inaction of the Local Government Board they were powerless to perform, that paid Guardians have been sent down to transact the business of the Union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that the Local Government Board had taken the course referred to in the case of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians in consequence of the irregular and disorderly character of the meeting, and their neglect of the business of the Union. This step was not taken without previous warning to the Guardians.

MR. HARRIS said, the right hon. Gentleman had not given any answer to the part of the Question in reference to the absence of any charge of dishonesty or corruption against the Board in question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not know that any such charge was made; but, however that might be, the complaint constantly made by the Local Government Board was that they were incapable of doing their business, and were engaged in riotous proceedings, which on more than one occasion called for the intervention of the police.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I ask whether or not this Board was dissolved because they took proceedings to set aside the riotous, disorderly, and illegal election of a Conservative Chairman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware, Sir, that riotous and disorderly applies to but one section of the Guardians to whom the hon. Gentleman refers.

MR. CHANCE: That is not an answer to my Question. What I asked was, whether this Board was not superseded immediately after they had instituted proceedings to set aside the riotous, disorderly, and grossly illegal election of their Conservative Chairman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member is not satisfied with my answer, perhaps he will put a Notice on the Paper.

POST OFFICE (SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT).

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that, since the 1st of December last, it has been necessary to constantly employ in the Savings Bank Department of the General Post Office a large number of officers for considerably longer than six hours a day; and, whether any application has been made for an increase of staff; and, if so, whether the Treasury will now take steps to insure the immediate introduction of the seven hours' scale into this Department?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, the question of the establishment of the Savings Bank Department was receiving the consideration of the Treasury in concurrence with the Postmaster General, and he hoped they would be able to make such arrangements as would tend to the efficiency and economy of the Public Service.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can fix an early day for the Indian Budget Statement, or about when it may be expected?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, it was impossible for him to name a day when it would be introduced; but the Papers were in the hands of hon. Members, and they could fully inform themselves on the subject of Indian finances.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, if the Government would undertake that the debate should take place before the last days of the Session, when it would be discussed to empty Benches?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the hon. Member must be aware that it was utterly impossible to enter into any engagement with regard to the Indian Budget, looking at the present state of Business.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) desired to know whether the Indian Budget was not of equal importance with the Local Government Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. CECIL ROCHE, R.M.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, notwithstanding the decision of the Court of Exchequer, the Resident Magistrate has refused to state a case of a priest of the County Clare, who was charged with illegal assembly in addressing a meeting from a boat on the Shannon, and who was sentenced to one month's imprisonment without bail by Mr. Cecil Roche; and, whether the Government will draw the attention of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland to the rights of the subject in these cases?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is the fact that in making an application for a mandamus to the Court of Queen's Bench to compel the magistrate to state a case, the application has to be made to a Court of which Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Gibson, who carried the Coercion Act, are members?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I cannot answer the Question without Notice. With regard to the Question put by the hon. and learned Member for Longford, I have to remind him that the statement made by the Judge had reference not to stating cases generally, but to the action of the magistrates with regard to the one particular subject that came before them. There can be no applicability to the case of Mr. Roche. If the hon. and learned Member thinks Mr. Roche ought to have stated a case, he has ample power to go to the Queen's Bench.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As there is a controversy in regard to the observations of the Judges, will the right hon. Gentleman be able to tell us whether the exact observations which were recorded by a shorthand writer will be laid upon the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not think there was any controversy in the matter. That only arose with reference to some of the Questions that had been put upon the Paper on the subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY: My Question is, whether, on Monday, the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us whether we shall be able to have an exact copy of the Judge's observations?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I certainly shall be able to answer the Question on Monday.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker,—At the opening of our proceedings to-day you read from the Chair a letter announcing to the House that Mr. John Dillon, a Member of this House, had been sent to prison for six months. I wish, Sir, to give Notice that I shall submit the following Resolution :—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the operation of ‘The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,’ and the manner of its administration, undermine respect for Law, estrange the minds of the people of Ireland, and are deeply injurious to the interests of the United Kingdom.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish, Sir, to give Notice, in general terms, that on Monday I will request the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to appoint a day for the discussion of the Motion of which my right hon. Friend has given Notice.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have listened with attention to the Notice which the right hon. Gentleman gave; and feeling that it is one which challenges the conduct of the Government in every respect, I think it only right to respond at once, and to say that the Government will place Monday at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the rumour is true that the Government intend to drop five more clauses of the Local Government Bill, and, if that question be answered in the affirmative, whether it would not be for the convenience of the House to announce at once the entire number of clauses which will be abandoned, instead of giving the information by instalments?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am not aware of the rumours to which the hon. Member has referred, and, therefore, I am quite unable to answer the Question he has put to me. The Government have given Notice of their intention to drop certain clauses of the Bill, and to that Notice they will adhere. It will be quite time, if it becomes necessary to drop any other clauses of the Bill, in consequence of prolonged discussion, it will be quite time enough for us, when that necessity arises, if it arises in consequence of that discussion, to make a statement to the House upon the question.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th June.]

[NINTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Powers of County Council.

Clause 8 (Transfer to County Council of powers of certain Government Departments and other Authorities).

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 24, after the word “day,” to insert the words, “it shall be lawful for the Local Government Board to make from time to time a Provisional Order for transferring.— (Mr. Chaplin.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that when the Committee adjourned on Tuesday, some misunderstanding had arisen with reference to the Amendment. In the course of the discussion some words were addressed to him which, in justice to himself, he thought he should refer to. He must frankly admit that he was somewhat irritated by what had occurred on Tuesday afternoon. He had moved an Amendment in as few words as he could, being desirous to save the time of the Committee, which Amendment was supported by the hon. Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley), the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald), followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) and other hon. Members, including the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who gave a qualified support to the Amendment, as he desired that the transfer should be effected by means of a Provisional Order, instead of an Order in Council. The Government had intimated their intention of accepting his Amendment, and had agreed generally to the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, and it looked as if something in the nature of the Amendment was to be adopted. Whereupon occurred a most unusual incident—an hon. Member sitting on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. C. T. Dyke Acland), who had not heard a word of the Debate, interposed with a speech which led to a prolonged wrangle, which terminated in a Motion to report Progress being carried. Now he (Mr. Chaplin) had said as little as possible on the former occasion in support of his Amendment, as he was anxious to save the time of the Committee; but the Amendment was now in a different form upon the Paper, and perhaps the Committee would allow him to explain more fully the object he had in view in moving it. In the first place, he was most anxious to dispel the idea that there was the slightest desire or intention on his part, or on the part of hon. Members on that side of the House, to do what had been called by Gentlemen opposite, revolutionize the principle of the Bill. However that might be, he pointed out that a blind trust in the people was not of itself sufficient to make a Bill of this complicated character into a working measure. They wanted to make it a thoroughly workable and business-like enactment, and he protested that the clause as it was now drawn was not likely to attain that object, and it was in order to ensure the end he had in view that he moved the Amendment now standing in his name. The clause as it stood proposed to transfer by Statute certain powers, duties, and liabilities of Secretaries of State, Board of Trade, and Local Government Board to the County Councils. It further proposed to transfer certain other powers which were at present vested in the Privy Council and the Education Department and other Departments, as well as certain powers at the present time enjoyed by certain of the counties themselves, some of which were exceedingly important, and involved the expenditure of enormous sums of money. Now, the clause proposed to do all this, subject only to the Proviso contained in the 3rd sub-section of the clause. He wanted the Committee to consider how the clause would work, and he must point out, in the first place, that the powers which it proposed to transfer under the 1st sub-section were very considerable. There were powers vested in the Local Government Board, some of them comparatively unimportant; others again were of great importance, and then there were the powers of the Board of Trade, which in his judgment, were of supreme importance, and which it was most undesirable should be transferred by Statute. The powers of the Board of Trade differed considerably from the other powers to which he had referred, and would be found by reference to the second part of the Schedule. They were as follows—The General Pier and Harbour Acts, The Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, The Tramways Act, 1870, and the Electric Lighting Act, 1882. Those powers were now carried into effect under the admirable Staff now possessed by the Board of Trade, a Staff of great experience, and one under which what was called political continuity, so desirable in matters of this kind, was very successfully insured. As an illustration of the admirable way in which the duties of the Department had been performed, he would like to call attention to the fact that, out of 256 Provisional Orders moved by the Board of Trade with regard to tramways, 242 had been actually carried; out of 279 Provisional Orders in the matter of Gas and Water, 276 had been carried—that was to say, out of a total of 535 Provisional Orders, 518 had been carried. That was very strong testimony to the admirable way in which these matters had been dealt with by the Department up to the present time. Now, on the supposition that the clause were carried in its present form, and that the Bill, as he hoped would be the case, passed into law during the present Session, all these powers of the Board of Trade would cease, and would be transferred to the new County Councils. But, further, before the County Councils could be in a position to act, various promoters in different parts of the country might, and very probably would, want powers for Harbours, Piers, Gas, Water, and Tramways, and he would ask who was going to do the work, because it must be borne in mind that the Councils would have been only just elected; and they would not, therefore, have the necessary machinery at their disposal. He could conceive of nothing more likely to bring things to a deadlock than that the clause should come into operation in its present form. In saying that he had no desire to eviscerate or emasculate the Bill. He was anxious that, as soon as the Bill was passed, there should be machinery in existence which would enable these powers to be carried out as before; at the same time that the Government of the day should have the power to proceed in certain respects by Provisional Order, of course subject to the consent of Parliament. What he contemplated in the case of the clause passing without his Amendment, which he hoped would be accepted, he believed would happen; and probably his right hon. Friend would be able to give his view of the subject. There were a great number of the powers to be transferred and specified in the Schedules which were not of very great importance, and which might be transferred en bloc by a Provisional Order to the new authorities; there were others in connection with the public health, and similar matters, the transfer of which from the Local Government Board, he thought, would be a matter for consideration; but with regard to those vested in the Board of Trade he was satisfied, for the reasons already stated, that it would be unwise and injudicious that they should be transferred as a whole to the County Council, and the Board of Trade altogether deprived of them. For these reasons, he ventured to submit the Amendment on the Paper to the Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, as the Amendment of the right hon. Gentlemen went to the very essence of the principle of transferring these powers to the County Council. He thought they had better deal with it on the Schedules of the Bill. It seemed to him that the way to defeat the object of the Bill would be to carry it in such a form that these important matters should be left to the discretion of the Government for the time being. He thought the Government should make their views upon this subject more clear, or else consent to the postponement of the clause. They were now entering upon a totally different part of the Bill—namely, that which delegated to the local Bodies the powers now exercised by the Central Authorities at Westminster. It seemed to him, in view of the serious import of this portion of the Bill, that the Government should have determined what powers they really intended to transfer to the local Councils before this, and that it was altogether inconsistent and indecorous that they should be, as they appeared to be, ready to surrender the whole of their scheme of delegation, and reserve the powers in question to Her Majesty's Executive Government. He could quite understand that some comparatively small towns did not like to be transferred from the dominion of the Board of Trade to the Councils; but if Her Majesty's Government really wished to give practical and substantial effect to the measure, they must with regard to powers now vested in the central authority, give before long something in the nature of modified Home Rule to the great Provinces of the Kingdom. Such a principle, he thought, might be applied with good effect to London, and such great counties as Yorkshire and Lancashire. On the whole, as it seemed to him Her Majesty's Government were prepared to accept the Amendment, it would perhaps be better to drop the clause for the present.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he wished to make an appeal to the Government to know what course they intended to take in the matter. It was understood the other night that they would put down Amendments for which they were to be responsible, and he wished to point out that, practically speaking, the right hon. Gentleman below the Gangway, by this and subsequent Amendments, wished to withdraw the 8th clause, and he should like to know whether the Government were prepared to withdraw any more clauses without Notice. The Amendment in the name of the right hon. Gentleman, if adopted by the Committee, would in reality destroy the object and intention of the clause.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he hoped that he might be allowed to explain. The Amendment, as it stood now, was moved at the request and instigation of the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), who had led the Opposition in this matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman was not quite accurate in his assertion, and he was sorry that his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax was, in consequence of illness, prevented from being in his place. If the Government would state in the Schedule of the Bill what powers they proposed to delegate to the County Councils, then the County Councils, when they were elected, would know what they had to do. The matter as it stood was left to a Provisional Order, and a Provisional Order meant nothing more nor less than this—another Act of Parliament under another name. What he complained of in the course of the progress of the Bill was the crumbling away, day by day, of all the main provisions of the measure. The Committee were aware that there were other clauses to be omitted besides this, and the section they were now discussing was one of the most vital and important clauses in the Bill in reference to the transfer of powers to the County Council. Nevertheless, at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman below the Gangway, the Government were about to strike it out of the Bill.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. CHAPLIN said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Amendment assumed its present form at the request of his own Party.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was not arguing the matter from a Party point of view. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be incapable of dealing with it from any other point. There were many other clauses which were to share the same fate. So far as he was concerned, he intended to support the clause, even in opposition to the Government. He desired to see the clause kept as it was. If there were any powers improperly proposed to be transferred under it, let them be omitted in the Schedule. He should like the Committee to consider fairly how they stood. If they dabbled with this and other clauses, what were they going to leave to the County Councils? What they had given to the County Councils in Clause 3 was, broadly speaking, nothing, and they had been relying upon Clause 8 to find the Council something to do. Now, however, it was proposed to get rid of Clause 8. The object of Clause 8 was to place very important powers in the hands of the County Councils, and he very much feared that if they took away those powers which were to be transferred by the clause as it stood, the usefulness and the authority of the County Councils would be greatly impaired. Unless the clause were allowed to remain in the Bill as it stood, what would be its effect? It would be impossible to get competent men to remain on the County Councils for the purpose of doing nothing. That was the great fear that was entertained. With certain exceptions, he approved of the constitution of the County Councils, and he approved of many of the functions which it was proposed to confer upon them; but he would like to see them with really operative functions. Would that be so if this clause were removed from the Bill? What would the City Councils then have to do? As far as he could make out, they would have to deal with the main roads. But, surely, that was not a very important power to confer upon the Councils. Then, again, they would have to appoint a Visiting Committee for the lunatic asylums, and would have to attend to the registration and the rules of scientific societies. In point of fact, they would merely have such jurisdiction as could be readily carried out by a committee. So far as their powers and duties were embodied in the Bill, that is all they would have to do. The Government were now cutting away all the more important functions it was originally intended the County Councils should exercise. He was of opinion that it would be far better to give them something and not be so very disappointing. He hoped the Government would not encourage this proceeding. He knew that the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire looked with no particular friendly eye on these Councils, and he knew that not only were there Members of that House, but others who were not Members of it, who regarded the Bill unfavourably. They would rather not have the County Councils created, and they desired that when they were created they should have as nearly as possible nothing to do, and no power and no authority. He was certain that that was not the intention of the Government; but he believed they were absolutely sincere in their desire to create a useful and powerful body. Nevertheless, step by step, they were taking away the powers originally given by the Bill. He entreated them to stand by that clause, and if they did so, he could assure them of the general support of that side of the House.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he did not know whether the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) included his right hon. Friend the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) among those who desired to eviscerate that clause. It was necessary in consequence of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, that he should call the attention of the Committee to the arrangement which was entered into on Tuesday last, when the clause was under discussion. It was perfectly true that the clause, as it stood in the Bill, first of all transferred by way of Schedule certain powers to the County Councils, and that it, secondly, proposed in reference to other powers, that they should be subsequently transferred by means of an Order in Council. When the clause came on for discussion, his right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) rose and moved an Amendment by which all the powers were not to be transferred at once, but by Order in Council. That proposal was supported by at least half-a-dozen Members, who spoke on both sides of the House, and among others by the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton, who, during the discussion of the Bill, had given great attention to the details of the measure, and whose knowledge of the subject would not be denied or gainsaid by any Member of the House. He even thought that the right hon. Member for Derby would be willing to acknowledge that the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton, from his experience, was better able to express an opinion than he was himself. Then again, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax had been regarded, whether rightly or not he did not know, as having charge of the Bill from the Front Bench opposite. In the course of the discussion, that right hon. Gentleman rose and gave a qualified approval of the proposal of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire to transfer the powers by an Order in Council, but suggested that it would be more convenient if the change were made by a Provisional Order Bill, instead of an Order in Council. The Government, recognizing as they did in reference to many of the details of the Bill, that they were quite open to learn by the experience of Gentlemen who had long been connected with the question of Local Government in that House—the Government recognized that there was great force both in the remarks of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire, and also in the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Halifax. Looking at the fact that the County Councils were not likely to come into active operation until April next year, it was quite a debatable point whether it was not desirable instead of at once saddling them with a considerable number of duties requiring great experience, to take some steps by which all the powers, or any part of them, might be made the subject of investigation at the hands of a Select Committee of the House of Commons. Such a Committee would be able to go into one and all of the various powers proposed to be conferred with a view to see whether all or some of them might be transferred, or whether some alterations ought to be made in the proposals of the Bill. That was a proposition which the Government considered reasonable, and they accordingly assented to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Halifax, stating that, so far as they were concerned, they saw no objection to the course of procedure he proposed. But no sooner had they made that concession, than hon. Members opposite rose and protested against it, not one single voice having previously been heard in opposition to the view expressed by the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division and by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite. Now, what were the real facts of the case? As he had said, these County Councils did not really come into power until April, 1889. There was, therefore, plenty of time between now and the commencement of next Session of Parliament for the Government to prepare and introduce a Provisional Order Bill, specifying the powers that were to be handed over to the County Councils.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked, if that Bill would be brought in during the present Session?

MR. RITCHIE said, no; not during that Session. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that it would be quite impossible to pass a Provisional Order Bill that year; but if it were presented early next Session it might be proceeded with at once, and passed rapidly into law. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that the Government had a desire to create County Councils, and then give them nothing to do.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No.

MR. RITCHIE: That was the whole gist of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, who said—"Are we to trust the Government to do anything of the kind, if we do not do it now in the Bill."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. He did not say that; but he had pointed out that by a Provisional Order they would not have the powers transferred in time for the election of the new Councils, and the men elected would not know what they had to do. All he desired to point out was that the first election would take place without the County Councils knowing what the powers were they would have to discharge.

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman wanted to know what the County Councils were to do. It had been stated again and again that this new Body was being created in the hope of placing in the Schedule of the Bill the powers conferred by the measure. It was, however, recognized on all hands, that it would be unwise and impolitic for the House to saddle these new Bodies with the powers they would have to perform until the Councils themselves had had some experience of the nature of the work and were ready to settle themselves down into working order. How could the right hon. Gentleman say that the County Councils would be elected in ignorance of what they would have to do, when the Government in the Bill made proposals in reference to all the questions that were scheduled in the measure, and only refrained from carrying them into an Act in consequence of representations made to them that it would be better early next Session to make provision for it. The right hon. Member said that the most important of those powers were the powers connected with Provisional Orders, and he thought the right hon. Member for Derby would acknowledge the truth of that remark. Therefore, it would not be at all satisfactory to say that they proposed to transfer at once certain powers which the Home Secretary now had, and then to refrain from doing more. There was not the smallest justification for supposing that the County Councils would be prejudiced in their election by the position which the Government had taken up in response to the appeal from the other side of the House. He could only say that the Government had shown their desire to secure that the powers of the County Councils should be ample, but they acknowledged that there was great force in the objections which had been made, that many of these powers would be transferred without sufficient examination by a Select Committee of the House. They would undertake to have a Provisional Order Bill drawn up and presented to Parliament at the earliest moment, with a view of showing that they had no desire to create a great and important machine like this, and then to give it nothing to do. That was the reason why he supported the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire, and he was certain that the proposal would meet the approval of the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) said, he had waited with anxiety to ascertain what position the President of the Local Government Board intended to take with regard to the subsequent Amendments which appeared on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire, because those subsequent Amendments altered the whole position as it was discussed the other day.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was sorry if he had not made that matter clear. This Amendment was only preliminary. He was not prepared to say that he would accept all the Amendments upon the Paper; but what he did accept now was to transfer these powers by means of a Provisional Order.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, he wished to point out that the whole position would be altered if these Amendments were accepted by the Government, and he desired to point out the way in which the matter stood when it was last under discussion. Many Members were opposed to the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire altogether. He had not been one of those. He had thought that it would be wise to give instructions to the County Councils in cases where experience was required by means of a Provisional Order or an Order in Council. The powers which it was proposed to transfer to the County Councils had never been given to the municipalities, and the County Councils not having had the experience of the municipalities would certainly not be prepared at the first moment to exercise the powers proposed to be conferred upon them. But what was the position to-day, if the Government accepted the subsequent Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It simply meant the destruction of Clause 8. Everything up to line 48 was cancelled by the Amendment. If the Amendment were passed, the whole of the Schedules would go, because the effect would be to cause their disappearance from the Bill, and the whole purpose and object of Clause 8 would have vanished. Under such circumstances, he could not vote for the Amendment. If the Government would give an assurance that they would oppose this process of the evisceration of Clause 8 and would retain the Schedule, he would hold himself to his promise and would support them, because he thought it better that the Government should give instructions as to what powers the County Councils were to exercise. By assenting to the course now proposed, that would give to the Government the power of decentralizing the whole matter.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman could have heard the whole of the discussion upon this subject. One of the arguments of the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton was that if the clause were allowed to stand as it was in the Bill it would lead to a long and endless discussion on these very Schedules, and that was one of the chief arguments the right hon. Gentleman used in favour of his proposal. It was certainly an argument which he (Mr. Ritchie) had regarded as a very powerful one. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Lyon Playfair) did not seem to have heard the discussion which took place in reference to the Schedule, and he now said that the Government were going to omit a large portion of the clause. That was perfectly true; but it was necessary to do so because the clause was divided into two parts. It, therefore, became necessary that much of what was contained in the 1st sub-section should be applied to the 2nd sub-section, and the proposal of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) was to deal with both sub-sections in the same way. The Government, therefore, allowed an amalgamation of the two sub-sections, and that was the sole reason why the words referred to by the right hon. Gentleman were proposed to be struck out.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had heard the whole of the discussion, and his interpretation of it was, and he thought it a good explanation, that if they were to give these complex powers, it was not desirable to transfer them at once to the County Councils, but to give the power of doing so by means of a Provisional Order. That would render it unnecessary to discuss the Schedules in such detail as would otherwise be essential. He thought that that was a proper suggestion; but he had not dreamt that the right hon. Gentleman was going to strike out the Schedules altogether.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) said, he thought that after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board the opposition of hon. Members opposite was unreasonable. He thought it was necessary to examine carefully the powers which the Bill proposed to transfer. He had been somewhat alarmed in the first instance at the restrictive powers of the Amendment, but it had been clear altogether that the Government had no intention whatever of restricting the power it was proposed to confer upon the County Councils, and, in regard to the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) there was nothing more reasonable than that a full opportunity should be afforded for considering what powers were to be transferred. He was inclined to think that many hon. Members who had taken part in the discussion of the clause had lost sight of the importance of not handing over these powers at once by wholesale. He was of opinion that the County Councils would not be perfectly capable of carrying them out, and he should vote against the Amendment if he did not see that the practical effect would be to give them experience and knowledge of the work they were to perform. Take, for instance, the power with regard to the issue of Provisional Orders as to the carrying out of works. If this power were handed over at once to the Local Authority, what means would the Local Authority have of carrying out and giving consent to the issue of Provisional Orders in connection with such works as drainage? The money which would have to be borrowed would be a difficulty in itself; it would be necessary to apply to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and the Public Works Loan Commissioners were not likely to grant a considerable sum without some evidence of an engineering character as to the value of the work proposed to be done. So, in regard to other works, a scheme would have to be properly prepared and submitted before the money could be borrowed. It would, therefore, be necessary to have an inquiry on the spot at which objections could be raised, and the whole matter would be fairly threshed out. It was ridiculous to suppose that any County Council would at once embark in any measure of this kind without such a preliminary inquiry; therefore, it was a wise precaution on behalf of the Government to see that the machinery was in working order before they handed over these powers to the County Councils. He hoped there would be no delay in granting the powers which he regarded as so important. It was of the highest importance to remove the power of decentralization, and get rid of the clog of Business that occurred upstairs. It was also desirable to relieve those who at present took part in projects of this kind, from the dreadful responsibility of bringing a local Bill before Parliament. He entertained the hope that, large as the powers were that were to be conferred by the Bill, there would be some further powers in regard to Private Bill legislation. The issue of Provisional Orders was another matter. No doubt, when they handed over this power to the County Councils, care would be taken to see that they were in a position to carry it out. They had had a clear statement from the President of the Local Government Board that it was not the intention of the Government to delay the transfer of these powers, and, therefore, he considered that hon. Members opposite were unreasonable in objecting to the Amendment. He was sure that there was no intention on the part of the Government to restrict the powers of the County Councils. As to the evisceration of the Bill, if the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) would look at the Amendments on the Paper, and the powers to be granted to the County Councils, he could have no fear that the Councils would not have ample work to do. It was not, however, desirable that all the work they would have to do should be put at once upon their shoulders.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, that after the two speeches which had been delivered by the President of the Local Government Board, they seemed really to have got at the bottom of the meaning of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire. It was simply a time-saving Amendment to shorten the debate on the Bill. The Government had done a good deal in that direction in throwing over extra weight, and from the ambiguous and unsatisfactory reply that had been given that afternoon by the First Lord of the Treasury, it was clear that it was at least possible that the London clauses of the Bill might follow the Licensing Clauses.

MR. RITCHIE said, that not a single word had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who asked the question, or his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, which could possibly justify the assertion which the hon. Member had made.

MR. LAWSON said, the silence of the right hon. Gentleman was just as significant as his speech. When the proposition was raised in the Committee, he protested against treating the County of London in the same way as other localities. He had heard nothing that day as to what was to be done for London. [Cries of "Order!" and "Question!"] He submitted that this was the Question. This clause conferred certain powers on the County Council for London, and it was impossible at a later period to insert in the Schedule the duties and liabilities of the County Council of London unless they were prepared to confer some powers upon other County Councils. He doubted very much whether the right hon. Gentleman had improved the

[Ninth Night.]

Bill by substituting a Provisional Order for an Order in Council. No doubt they would have all the influence of the permanent officials against them, who had been accustomed to use these powers, as all must admit, with great efficiency. It was unlikely that they would be willing to surrender them, and to ask popular Bodies to take over the powers they now possessed. He was, therefore, afraid that the process of devolution would be much slower than was contemplated, and the proposition now made might prove more insidious than the one which was contained in the Amendment as it stood. He was of opinion that the whole of the arguments they had heard that afternoon related to one part of the Schedule, and one part only. The hon. Member for North Somerset (Mr. Llewellyn) and the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had referred to the powers now exercised by the Board of Trade, and they maintained that it would be improper to call upon the County Councils, who would be without experience and knowledge, to exercise such powers. The three parts of the 1st Schedule defined the powers that were to be transferred now exercised by the Home Office, the Board of Trade, and the Local Government Board; and the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division, in endeavouring to prevent the second part from appearing in the Schedule, showed what the governing idea in his mind was. Personally, he (Mr. Lawson) did not see why some compromise should not be arrived at in connection with this subject. Why should not the Government at once admit that it was the powers of the Board of Trade that were objected to, on the ground that they required expert knowledge and practice which did not apply to other Departments of the State? The whole of the objections, as a matter of fact, applied to one part of the Schedule, and to save time the Government were going to cut out the whole Schedule and to diminish the dignity of the County Councils, simply with the object of lightening the load the Government had to carry. The Government would be prepared to say that at the present time there was no opportunity to discuss the Schedule. He thought some arrangement might be made by which it might be agreed to except the powers now exercised by the Board of Trade, and to take a moderate amount of discussion on the Schedule as a whole, because on most points in regard to them they would all be agreed. He trusted that hon. Members on that side of the House would resist the Amendment as it stood.

Mr. Lawson

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead) said, that as one who was present during the whole of the discussion the other day, he felt bound to express surprise at the course taken by the Front Opposition Bench. He was second to none in desiring that the powers given to the County Councils should be both large and important; but when he came into the House the other day to hear the discussion of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), he did so with a perfectly open mind, and after the right hon. Gentleman had spoken, a very weighty speech was delivered by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley). He thought it would have been greatly to the advantage of hon. Members to have heard that speech. They had had speeches from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), the last of whom spoke with great authority upon matters connected with the health of the community. Both of those right hon. Gentlemen supported the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) waited to see whether any other hon. Members would address the House; and, finding that there was a universal consensus of opinion in favour of the Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman rose in his place and said that, as he did not wish to resist the universal opinion of the House, he would accept the Amendment, against which not one word had been spoken by any hon. Member. Under these circumstances, he protested against the use in that discussion of such phrases as "evisceration of the Bill" and "time-serving Amendments."

MR. LAWSON said, the phrase he used was "time-saving Amendments."

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY said, he felt bound to protest against the imputation of motives which had been made in the course of the discussion. The phrases which had unfortunately been used, he ventured to think, had much more to do with the Licensing Clauses, which were in a state of suspended animation, than with the question before the House. Those phrases were intended, not as consumption in that House, but for consumption off the premises; they were intended to give the constituents the false idea that a measure which showed more trust in the people than had ever been evinced by any Government before was a sham. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] He understood the meaning of that cheer. He had seen the same phrase used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) when he gave the benefit of his assistance to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) by addressing his constituents. He could only say that it was with the greatest surprise he had heard, on the last occasion, the Motion made to report Progress by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), who had not been present during the whole of the discussion, and had heard very little of the comments of right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the same Benches themselves, but who, on the faith of representations of hon. Members who had casually dropped into the House, without having heard the discussion, moved to report Progress, and had thus occasioned a considerable waste of time.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock) said, he sincerely hoped the Government would not accept the compromise suggested by the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson). Nothing could be more fallacious than the argument that delay was advisable, so that the County Councils might have time to furnish themselves with experts like those who now advised the Board of Trade in regard to Tramways and matters of that kind. It was said that the County Councils had not the experience they ought to have, and that, therefore, they ought not to be entrusted with these new powers; but they never would have experience and were not likely to take experts into their service until they had full powers given to them. He sincerely hoped that all the

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he thought that the House generally was pretty much agreed as to what they wanted to accomplish; but the difficulty was how they were to accomplish it. He believed that most of them were anxious that the new County Councils should have large powers transferred to them; but there were some of those powers which hon. Members sitting on both sides of the House believed that it would be imprudent to transfer at the present moment. The difficulty was how they were to accomplish the transference of powers without involving too great a waste of the time of the House. Let them look for a moment at the matters it was proposed to transfer. The powers of the Secretary of State contained in the first Schedule ought, no doubt, to be transferred at once. The second part proposed to transfer to the County Councils the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Board of Trade, and he thought there was a general agreement that it would not be wise, before the County Councils got settled down to their work, to confer those duties upon them. When they came to the third part it was more difficult to come to a decision. He referred to the transference of the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Local Government Board. He believed that a greater part of those duties should be transferred at once, but there was some part of them which it might be desirable to transfer somewhat later. He thought there was a great objection to the Amendment before the Committee which required these things to be done by Provisional Order. They always knew that Provisional Orders were very slow and difficult things to get through. What he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) was that he should agree to transfer the powers by Order in Council instead of by Provisional Order, and then the right hon. Gentleman should state to the Committee what were the powers which ought to be at once transferred by such Order in Council. By that means he (Mr. Rathbone) thought they would obtain the object they all desired to accomplish—that was to say, that all necessary powers would be at once transferred to the County Councils, and they would be able to get into working order for the rest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he desired to point out that it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) who had suggested a Provisional Order instead of an Order in Council. The hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had suggested a compromise, and proposed that by way of giving the Council something to do they should have at once transferred to them the duties performed by the Home Office. Those duties were "power to represent to Her Majesty in Council that burials should be discontinued in any place of burial in the Metropolitan area; approval of new burial ground or cemetery in the Metropolitan area, or within two miles of it; powers to make report to Her Majesty in Council for the discontinuance of burial in any place of burial; approval of new burial ground; power to order the abolition of a fair, and power to order an alteration of the day for holding a fair and the duration of a fair." Those were the powers of the Home Secretary which the hon. Member for West St. Pancras was kindly willing to say might be transferred to the County Councils.

MR. LAWSON said, he had also pointed out that the powers of the Local Government Board might be transferred at once.

MR. GOSCHEN said, if it was proposed that the whole of those powers should at once be transferred to the County Councils, he was afraid that it would lead to a long discussion, considering that a good many of them were of an extremely controversial character. The hon. Member seemed to think that the London Council would not have enough to do when it was proposed to transfer to it the whole of the powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He (Mr. Goschen) thought that would start the London Council with a fair amount of business. In point of fact it would devolve upon them a somewhat herculean task. It would be better to have the powers for which they were adapted given to the Councils, than to have their minds disturbed by a mass of business with which they would not be able to deal. His views were well known on this subject. He was strongly in favour of decentralization. The whole object of the Government was to decentralize as soon as they could, and he could assure the hon. Member that when he occupied the position of Chairman of the New County Council to which he might aspire, he would have plenty of business to attend to and ample scope for his talents. They were all unanimous, he trusted, on this point, that ample powers should be given to the County Councils, and the only difference was as to the lines upon which they should proceed. He was not going to repeat the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to why these powers should not be included in the Bill at the present moment. What he was dealing with now was the argument that in leaving out certain powers for the present the Government were influenced by some sinister design. The case would have to be considered by a Select Committee, and, of course, the Government would resist any endeavour on the part of the Department to retain powers in their hands which it was desirable to hand over to the County Council.

MR. LAWSON said, that with respect to the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was quite true that the London County Council were to have all the powers which were now exercised by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but he did not understand that the Government wanted another Metropolitan Board of Works, nor did the public want one. He understood that they wanted a different class of men altogether. He looked forward to the London Council having very different powers, and to a time when it might hope to secure the services of men of position and ability, with such a man as the right hon. Gentleman himself at their head. If they believed in all they had said about the necessity of decentralization, they should give their words effect.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) asked, why the clause and the power to which it related had been deliberately put into the measure? What was the object? He thought that a great deal of time, a great deal of trouble, a good deal of friction, and a certain amount of misunderstanding would have been avoided if the Committee had thoroughly realized what powers were proposed to be granted to the County Councils. He would ask the Committee to consider what those powers really were. He represented a county constituency, and he would ask what powers were proposed to be transferred, after the remarkable admission which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that the powers now exercised by the Home Secretary were very trumpery powers indeed. What were they? They would give the County Councils power to alter the day on which a fair was to be held without warrant, and without the necessity of going to the Home Office in order to obtain permission. They also gave the County Councils certain small licensing powers. Then came the second part of the Schedule, which related to the powers now exercised by the Board of Trade, and that was the part to which he wished most strongly, in the interests of the new governing Bodies, to direct the attention of the Committee. They had been told, over and over again, that the Government and the Conservative Party were most anxious to grant large powers to the County Councils, but he would venture, without hesitation, to say that the powers to be granted under the 8th clause and the second and third parts of the Schedules were, so far from being too large, nothing like the powers that a democratic Body like the County Councils would immediately insist upon having. He would invite the attention of the Committee to what those powers were. What was the first? The County Councils were to have the powers of the Board of Trade, with certain exceptions, under the General Pier and Harbours Act. Surely the Committee ought to have been told, before proceeding with the discussion, whether it was really intended to withdraw the concession of those powers. At the present moment, when a Local Authority wanted to have a pier or harbour made, it was necessary to go to the Local Government Board or to the Board of Trade.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN declined to put the Question.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS said, he was not in the habit of trespassing upon the patience of the House. He was only claiming for the County Council of his own county that the powers to be given should be given to them directly, and he wished to show that those powers, so far from involving great responsibility, involved scarcely any responsibility whatever. If a Local Authority wanted to make a pier or harbour, what would be the change introduced if they passed this Schedule? They would simply make it necessary that the Local Authority, or the promoters, as they were called, should go to the County Council, instead of being required to come up to London, in order to lay their case before the Representatives of the people. Was that an unreasonable change to make in creating a great governing Body of this sort? It certainly did not amount to very much, for the County Council would only allow the application to be made. There were a number of serious restrictions imposed by Statute. For instance, it was necessary that notice should be given, and all the formalities of a Provisional Order gone through, and then the application would have to be submitted to the County Council. The powers under which a Provisional Order was to be given were expressly provided in all of the Acts—such as the General Pier and Harbour Act, the Tramway Act, and the Electric Lighting Act. The Local Authority would not be able to buy a foot of land without having practically to go to London. It was perfectly idle to tell him that these powers were too large to be confided to the discretion of the County Council, seeing that they were subjected to the provisions of an Act of Parliament, because a Provisional Order must always be assented to by Parliament. The Committee ought not to deceive themselves by supposing that the people were going to be satisfied with the process of issuing Provisional Orders when public works were required to be done, or that they would be content to come to Parliament for its assent. The powers they required were very much larger than those, and he would seriously ask the Committee to consider—especially those on the other side of the House, who had drafted these clauses—why on earth they should stultify the Bill by introducing certain provisions into it, unless they intended to stand by them. The Government said, "We have drawn up these Schedules and we consider that these powers are necessary powers." Then, why delay their insertion in the Bill? The Bill and the machinery would be ready next year. There were powers exercised by the Local Government Board in reference to baths and washhouses. At present those provisions applied to the whole country, but they could not be applied to a single parish except upon an application made to the Local Government Board. By the second part of the Schedule, instead of its being necessary to apply to the Local Government Board, the application would in future be made to the County Council. That was a very small power indeed, and if the Committee would take the trouble, as he had done, to go through every one of these Acts, they would find that it was only similar trumpery powers which were to be transferred. He, therefore, trusted that the Committee would at once proceed to invest the Local Authorities with the powers contained in the Schedule.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that this debate would be a lesson to him in the future as to how he accepted an Amendment, or an alteration to an Amendment, on the invitation of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Complaint had been made of the substitution of a Provisional Order for an Order in Council. That alteration had been accepted on the direct invitation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). For his (Mr. Chaplin's) own part he greatly preferred his own Amendment; but, for the sake of making progress with the Bill, he had accepted the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought that it was somewhat hard and unreasonable to complain of the Government for the course they had followed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) had expressed his opinion on the previous night that half-an-hour's discussion would finish the question; as they had now been discussing it for two hours and a-half he claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 298; Noes 216: Majority 82.—(Div. List, No. 174.)

Question put accordingly, "That the words 'it shall be lawful for the Local Government Board to make from time to time a Provisional Order for transferring' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 306; Noes 224: Majority 82.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 24, leave out the second "the" and insert "such."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'the' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he ventured to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that it would be a shorter way to reach the object they had in view to strike out Clause 8. He saw no reason why the Committee should waste so much time on a number of verbal Amendments. The brains were out of the Bill, and it was said that, "when the brains were out the man must die."

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman was evidently unfamiliar with Parliamentary procedure, or he would know that if the clause were struck out it would not be in the power of the Government to transfer by Provisional Order at all. He had undertaken that they would proceed next Session to transfer these powers by Provisional Order.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to instruct him by means of his longer experience. He did not think it necessary to dispute the right hon. Gentleman's proposition, and would humbly bow to it. At the same time, the right hon. Gentleman would allow him to say that if all this work was to be done next Session, it might be better to discard the form of a Provisional Order, and introduce "A Bill to provide the County Councils with something to do."

MR. CHAPLIN said, he ventured to propose that, instead of listening to any more of the frothy sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, they should proceed, if possible, in a business-like manner with the Amendments on the Paper, and in that way make progress with the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was always complaining of the evisceration of the Bill by hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House; but he hoped it would be observed by those outside the House that the real and practical evisceration of the measure, by the omission of Clause 8, came from the right hon. Gentleman himself. The Amendment he (Mr. Chaplin) had moved was simply consequential, and, therefore, it was not necessary to dwell upon it. In conjunction with the Amendments which followed, it was intended to carry out the decision at which the Committee had arrived after considerable discussion—namely, to transfer the powers under this clause by Provisional Order instead of by Statute.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 25, leave out from "of" to "other," in line 41.—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that if the Bill were eviscerated at all it would be by adopting the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that Clause 8 should be struck out. He would point out, however, that the adoption of the Amendment just moved would make the clause a shadow and a sham.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) that the Committee ought to discuss these Amendments in a business-like way, and make progress with the Bill; but he thought that far greater progress would be made if the Government did not change their mind every five minutes on the Bill. A suggestion had been made with regard to the time when the powers under the Bill should be transferred, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of a reference to a Select Committee. Were the Committee to understand that a Select Committee was to be appointed at once to go into the question, so that the country might know what powers the Government were going to bring in legislation to transfer to the County Councils? Or were they to understand that the Government proposed that a Select Committee should be appointed at the beginning of next Session to consider what powers should be handed over to the County Council, that the Committee would sit all through the Session, and at the end of the Session make a Report, and then that in the Session following, if the present Government were then still in existence, some proposal might be laid before the House? He ventured to say that the Business of the House would be facilitated if the Government stated definitely what they intended.

MR. RITCHIE said, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said nothing about a Select Committee. But the ordinary course with reference to a Provisional Order Bill was that it should be read a second time, and if there was any opposition to the proposals in the Bill, it would be referred to a Select Committee in the ordinary course. What the Government hoped and believed was that in all probability the Committee stage of such a Bill as was contemplated would be an extremely short one; probably it would not exceed a week in duration.

MR. CHANNING asked whether they were, then, to understand that no answer was to be given to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby?

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had stated that the administration of the Poor Law should not be transferred to the County Councils, and he had also said that he had no intention of transferring the powers of the London School Board to the County Council for London. It was not difficult to understand why the Government did not propose to transfer those powers; because the County Council for London, if it had, in addition to the business of the Metropolitan Board of Works and Quarter Sessions, to conduct that of the London School Board, would be completely overloaded. But the effect of the Amendment which he was about to move would not apply merely to the Metropolis; it would apply to the whole of the school boards of the country. It would be possible if the Bill were to come into operation in its present form, to lay upon the Table of the House for 30 days a scheme for the transfer of the whole of the school board administration throughout the country to the County Councils, which after that time, without any expression of opinion on the part of those interested in the school boards, would take place. He would like to give some reasons why he thought it impossible, at the present juncture, so to transfer the work of the school boards. There were in England and Wales more than 2,000 school boards, which had educational control in respect of 17,000,000 of the population; they were in the administration of funds amounting to £5,000,000 a-year, and they had, on the whole, done their work with great advantage and to the entire satisfaction of the country. They had increased the school attendance since they came into existence by more than 250 per cent; they had raised the standard of education in all the schools of the country, including the voluntary schools, which had been benefited thereby.

MR. RITCHE said, he might save the right hon. Gentleman some trouble by saying that the Government were willing to accept words to exclude the school boards. The Government had never intended to transfer to the Councils the powers of the school boards, which had been set up by Act of Parliament.

MR. MUNDELLA, asked what where the powers of the Educational Department which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to transfer to the County Councils?

MR. RITCHE said, the Government were desirous of making the clause as comprehensive as possible, and they thought it simpler to put in the words "Education Department," because there might be some smaller matters that it would be useful to include.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the revision of the schemes of the Charity Commissioners relating to Endowed Schools was work which would be taken out of the hands of the Education Department, and given to the County Councils. He begged to move the omission of the words.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 2, to leave out the words "or the Education Department."—(Mr. Mundella.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) said he could not conceive anything which it would be more desirable to entrust to the County Councils than the duties connected with local charitable schemes. The whole object of the Party to which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) belonged had been for some time past to secure some local control over the Charities, and yet they had the right hon. Gentleman getting up and disclaiming against the provision of the Bill which might by possibility give much power.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had no objection to the Councils having some control over secondary education, but he thought some power ought to be left to the Education Department.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he entirely agreed with what his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had said. It was of the highest importance that powers like those referred to should be transferred to the County Councils. He could only understand the view taken by his right hon. Friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) from the fact that the right hon. Gentleman's own able administration of the Education Department had convinced him of the infallibility and perfection of that particular Department. Now, that was a great danger they had got to guard against—the belief in the Departments that nobody could do anything but them. If they really wanted to decentralize, they must resist that opinion. What he was afraid of was the pressure of the Departments, and that was why he wanted Parliament to take the matter into its own hands. In respect to all these Provisional Orders, they had the Departments fighting for every scrap of power they could get. That was really the decentralizing clause in the Bill, and if they wanted to make it effective, they ought to extend the powers as far as they could. They always found an enemy in a Department. He had been in Departments, and therefore he knew what the feelings existing there were; they would regard it as a point of honour to resist anything being taken away from them which they could possibly retain. He would point out to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) that, if his Amendment were accepted, they could not transfer any powers, because they would not have the authority under the Bill. After what had been passed in reference to Provisional Orders, they would be perfectly safe; the House would have control over what it transferred, and if any power was to be transferred improperly or which ought to be reserved, they could upon the Provisional Order discuss the transfer; but if they adopted, the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment they could not transfer anything, however desirable. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that there were some powers which might very well be transferred, but they could not be so transferred under the Amendment. He (Sir William Harcourt) hoped that these words would be left in the clause; because if so, the Government would have discretion and the House would have the power to deal with the different matters.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he was glad he was able on that occasion to concur most heartily and entirely with everything which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), with, perhaps, a slight reservation. He did not think that the Heads of Departments deserved the censure implied in the right hon. Gentleman's observations. No doubt, they were exceedingly able and exceedingly well-informed public servants, and it was very natural that they should from time to time desire that the work in which they were interested should be conducted in the best possible manner. But there was a public interest involved in this question which the House ought to consider, and that was the great necessity of decentralization. The Public Departments were overwhelmed by caring for matters which ought to be cared for by the people themselves. It might happen that, under the new system, the work might not be done in all respects so perfectly as, he believed, it was done in the Public Departments; but there would be great gain to the public interest in this work being done locally, and in accordance with the local feelings and sentiments of the people. Under those circumstances, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) would not press his Amendment. He was obliged to refer to one observation which had been made in the course of the discussion. He thought it was extremely inconvenient to refer to past debates in that House. He possibly did give, on behalf of the Government, an undertaking to endeavour to accomplish certain purposes and objects; but he would prefer that the question of what interpretation was to be put upon his words should be deferred until his observations appeared in print. Certainly, he did not think that it was advisable at the present time to engage in a conversation upon the subject with the right hon. Gentleman across the Table of the House. He trusted the Committee would allow the words proposed to be left out to remain in the Bill, as he personally attached great importance to them.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that all he had asked the right hon. Gentleman was that he would fulfil the pledge he gave to the House in the debate they had a few weeks ago on secondary education. He, however, wished to make no further reference to that, because certainly they would hold the right hon. Gentleman to his engagement. As the powers were to be transferred by Provisional Order, and as it would be possible to deal with every case as it arose, he was quite willing to withdraw his Amendment upon the distinct understanding that no elective Bodies, school boards or others, would be in any way influenced by the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought it was well to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Government proposed to accept the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) with reference to school boards and Boards of Guardians.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman that there was to be no interference with the school board system was very good as far as it went ; but, unfortunately, in 10,000 out of 13,000 parishes in the country, there was no such body as a school board, and yet there was an educational system in which they were all interested. He would like the right hon. Gentleman to give them some further assurance—namely, that in no provision of the Bill would there be any power conferred upon the new Bodies to give any local grants out of local funds, or to give any support in any shape or form to what were called the denominational schools of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is quite outside the scope of the Amendment.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: But it is cognate to the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHAIRMAN: But I stopped the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, that he had an Amendment lower down on the Paper dealing with this subject ; and perhaps this would be a convenient opportunity for the right hon. Gentleman to make his undertaking a little more definite. He agreed largely in the remarks made with regard to the transfer of many duties of the Education Department to the new County Councils. As to the transfer of the powers relating to industrial schools, and to the development of agricultural and technical education, he had not a word to say. The point that he specially wished to secure, was that the school boards should not be included in the Clause. But there was a second point in his Amendment to which the right hon. Gentleman had not referred. That point had reference to the Governing Bodies of endowed schools which had an elective element. He did not know whether it would be out of Order to ask, as an undertaking in regard to that special point, that the local centres—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is clearly out of Order.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) said, he begged to move to insert, after the words "Education Department," "Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue Commissioners." There was no public Body which required greater re-organization than that of the Woods and Forests Commissioners. There was no Body which could so well give up some of its duties, such as the control and improvement of waste land, to the Local Authorities as could that Body. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board might reply that that Body was included in the words "or any other Government Department," but he, (Mr. T. E. Ellis) desired the insertion of these words, to show the urgent necessity of the powers vested in this Body being transferred to the County Councils.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 2, after the words "Education Department," to insert the words, "Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue Commissioners."—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman stood on an entirely different footing to anything which had been suggested or was contained in the Bill. The hon. Gentleman was no doubt aware that the Body to which he alluded was the Body which had the management of Crown property, and, therefore, it was clear it would not be within the scope of the Bill to transfer to the management of local elective Bodies the powers vested in the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue Commissioners for dealing with Crown property. He was afraid it would be impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment.

MR. RATHBONE said, he was sorry to hear the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman, because, in his opinion, there was no administrative Department in the State which was more grossly obstructive to the interests of the public than the Department of the Woods and Forests. He was quite satisfied that the present Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) would bear him out that there was no Department in the State which ought to be brought more under the control of some elective Body than the Department of Woods and Forests.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he must support the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in his opposition to this Amendment. If the Amendment meant anything, it meant that the management of Crown property should be transferred to County Councils. [Cries of "No, no!"] He did not know what else it could mean but that. Though he was not qualified to say that the Woods and Forests was by any means a faultless Department, and might not require reform, that was not the way in which to bring about an amendment. What happened with reference to the Woods and Forests was this. Before the Woods and Forests were made a separate Department, the whole of the Crown property was practically wasted, owing to the fact that it was administered by a Minister under the control of Parliament, who insisted in one way or another in making away with the funds it yielded. The Crown lands now yielded something like £350,000 a-year, the revenue had largely increased under the management of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and that was a reason for not doing away with the Department, still less for giving them as a gift to Authorities who, he was afraid, might be quite as bad as the original management.

MR. CHAPLIN suggested to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis) that instead of putting the Woods and Forests under the County Councils, it would be better to put them under the new Agricultural Department, of which they had heard a good deal lately, but which did not seem to be very much nearer being established.

MR. T. E. ELLIS said, he could not assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, because he had not any great faith in the Agricultural Department. He would like to point out, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), that if reforms had been already effected in the management of Crown lands, there was no reason why they should not carry the process of reform a little further. There was no doubt that much of the old maladministration remained, and that the revenue from the Crown lands could be much increased. He ventured to say that in regard to thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres of Crown lands in various parts of the country, especially in Wales, the revenue could be doubled and trebled, and quadrupled, if they were managed with anything like intelligence and local knowledge. Crown property was, after all, only national, and the people's property. He was certain that, with regard to allotments of land for building in industrial districts in Wales, an immense amount of good could be done by conferring control of this property on a representative popular Body. Although he had very much respect for the opinions usually put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), he felt bound to press this Amendment to a Division.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had only one word to say, and that was, that if the hon. Gentleman had any information which would result in anything additional being secured by way of revenue to the country from the Crown property, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would put himself at once in communication with the Government. The Government were bound to protect the revenue, and he did not think the hon. Gentleman had made any suggestion which would afford security in that direction.

MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.) said, he could not help suggesting a point that he thought was raised by the discussion, and that was, what was the meaning of the words in the Bill "or any other Government Department." His hon. Friend (Mr. T. E. Ellis) moved to insert the words "Woods, Forests, and Land Revenue Commissioners;" he (Mr. Asquith) would like to ask one of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to give them information as to whether the Woods and Forests was a Government Department. If it was, its powers were already, under the proposal of the Government, transferred, or capable of being transferred, to the County Councils. If it was not a Government Department, then it would be interesting to the Committee to learn what was a Government Department, and it would be desirable, with a view to the proper construction of this Act, when it became an Act, that some definition of a Government Department should, either in this clause or in some other part of the Bill, be inserted.

MR. RITCHIE said, he imagined the Woods and Forests was a Government Department.

MR. ASQUITH: Are they?

MR. RITCHIE said, of course it was. Hon. Gentlemen would see they specifically named certain Government Departments, and that it was clear the Government could bring in, under the clause, a Provisional Order dealing with any Government Department. It was one thing to have general words of this kind dealing with every Government Department, and another thing to mention Government Departments specifically by name.

MR. ASQUITH said, that in that case the Amendment was entirely unnecessary. It would clearly be within the power of the House, by a Provisional Order, to transfer, if it saw fit, these very powers to the County Councils.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, if these words were inserted in the Bill, it would amount to an expression of opinion that the Woods and Forests should be included among those Departments whose powers were to be transferred.

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.) said, that the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had asked for information as to anything likely to increase the revenue derived from Crown property. If the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to the Scotch fisheries, he would see that a larger revenue might be derived.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had emancipated himself from many Conservative prejudices, but he seemed still to labour under some such prejudices in regard to the question of the Crown lands. There could be no greater fallacy than the contention that Crown lands were not national property. They were national property, and it was a mere fiction to call them Crown lands. It was a fiction which had a very deleterious effect, because there were many instances in which Crown lands were not administered for the benefit of the people. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT assented.] He was delighted to see the right hon. Gentleman assented to that view. If it was possible to improve such a condition of things so that the Crown lands could be managed for national and local benefit, great public advantage would result from the change.

MR. RATHBONE said, that the Woods and Forests Department had possession of a considerable part of the foreshores, and, instead of considering they were the Trustees for the national benefit, they were often obstructive in their action.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the foreshores were under the Board of Trade. [Cries of "No, no!"] He was sure they were in Scotland, and he thought they were so in England.

MR. RATHBONE said, that a case had come under his notice within the last year in which the Woods and Forests Commissioners prevented a Company getting at the sea as a means of transit for a very long time, and thereby considerably impeded the trade of a district.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he might add that there were cases in Scotland in which the foreshore had been made away with by the Department of the Woods and Forests at a very nominal price. No greater abuses had been perpetrated in recent years than those connected with the Scotch foreshores.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, that the way in which this Amendment had been supported put many of them in a difficulty. It had been said there was a great deal of obstruction, and even some corruption in the Department of Woods and Forests, and with that opinion many hon. Members cordially agreed. But what he desired to put forward was, whether it was expedient to mix up the question of obstruction by the Woods and Forests Department with the question of the transfer of powers to the local Bodies? Would matters be improved if the powers were transferred to local Bodies? Let them have another inquiry like the Metropolitan Board of Works inquiry, to see whether the charges of obstruction and corruption were true, and whether a larger national revenue could not be derived from the property. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) that this was national revenue which ought to remain in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he should be very sorry to see the Woods and Forests transferred to Local Councils. Certainly, he did not, by voting against the Amendment, desire to say that the Woods and Forests were anything but very grossly mismanaged.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the word "corruption" had been used in regard to an official Department. [Hon. GENTLEMEN: Possible corruption.] No; it was rather more than that. He asked if it was fair, unless there was real evidence to that effect, to use such a term? They could not brand a great Department of State on evidence that had not been examined with vices from which, he thought, our Civil Service had been conspicuously free.

MR. BUXTON said, he would withdraw the word "corruption," and express regret for having used it. The word he ought to have used was "obstruction."

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS said, that all that was wanted was that there should be some control over the administration of the Woods and Forests which would be to the benefit of the different localities. That was only common sense, and he trusted his hon. Friend would go to a Division.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) trusted his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman had stated very strongly that Crown property was national property; but it seemed to him (Mr. Pickersgill) that the distinct effect of his Amendment, if it were carried, would be not to make the Crown property national property, but to convert national property into local property. In that sense the Amendment did not seem reasonable, and he, for one, could not support it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. CHANNING said, that the feeling which animated him and other hon. Members in wishing to have some such Amendment as that which stood in his name was, that the clause, as drawn, undoubtedly gave power to school boards and other elected educational authorities to wipe themselves out of existence by an Order in Council, and to apply for the transference of their powers to the County Councils. It was well known that strong representations had been made in this House by the Birmingham and the London and other School Boards in the country that that would be thoroughly undesirable. It was notorious to every Member in the House who had paid attention to the recent history of the education question, and who had read the important memorandum which appeared in The Times newspaper yesterday, and who had considered the important evidence given by a former Secretary to the Education Department and by the present Secretary of that Department, that many distinguished public officials and men who had taken a prominent part in educational matters, wished to carry out the definitely formulated scheme which was very fully put before the country in the letter of Sir Francis Sandford. That certainly was a matter which should not be dealt with by a side wind, should not be brought in as a mere permissive portion of a Bill of this kind, but should be dealt with on its merits. There was no doubt that the scheme brought before the Education Commissioners, and the scheme formulated yesterday by Sir Francis Sandford, contemplated the removal of the principle of the compromise of the Act of 1870, and the introduction of the principle of paying denominational schools out of the rates. He thought the Committee was entitled to ask why Her Majesty's Government had inserted words in this permissive clause which, without the slightest doubt, gave power to the school boards to apply for their own extinction? Hon. Members who had followed the matter must perfectly well remember the discussion on the clause introduced by Mr. Pell in 1876. The permissive power given in that clause, however, was of a much more limited character, and there was under that clause power to restore the school boards if desirable. When Mr. Pell's clause was discussed, no hon. Member of the House expressed himself more strongly against the power to bring the school board system to an end than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Birmingham (Mr. Bright), whose temporary absence they all so much deplored. He (Mr. Channing) had reason to press for an answer from the Government as to how these words appeared in the Bill. Had not the country some right to challenge the Government, and say they had been attempting, in this Bill, to introduce by a side wind one portion of the first step in the scheme for placing denominational schools on the same footing as board schools, and for handing over the control of education from the elected representatives of small local areas, men who were acquainted with the local feelings of the people, to a central body at some distance from the localities. He thought the principle of local control was the keynote of the success of education in England. It was the secret of the magnificent results obtained by such a school board as that of Birmingham, and it was equally true of the Managing Committees of voluntary schools. His amendment applied also to the endowed schools of the country, where there was an elective element in the body of governors. He quite agreed with much that had been said in regard to transferring to the County Councils some control over the endowments of the country. But he held that it was vitally important to maintain some form of local administration, so that the special wants and interests of the locality might be secured. He had reason to believe that the first part of his Amendment would be accepted by Her Majesty's Government; but he trusted that on consideration they would be disposed to accept the whole of it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 9, after the words "authority" to insert the words "or a school board, or other board, committee, or authority elected directly or indirectly to deal with educational matters, or any body of trustees or governors, wholly elected, or partly elected and partly nominated, for the management of an endowed school."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he was sure the Committee would hardly expect him to enter into a discussion of the merits of the Act of 1870, or of the manner in which the school boards of the country had fulfilled the duties cast upon them. He would only say that no one valued more than he did the provisions of the Act of 1870, and none were stronger in their admiration of the manner in which that Act had been carried out, and of the enormous benefit conferred upon the country by the school boards elected under the Act than himself. But it was unnecessary for them to enter into a discussion of that, because they had said explicitly, that they did not intend that the question of school boards should be included in the provisions of the Bill, and they had said they proposed to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin), which specifically excluded school boards from transfer under the Bill. With reference to the latter part of the Amendment he had to point out that, in his opinion, all the hon. Gentleman desired to safeguard was amply safeguarded, now that they had accepted the proposal that no transfer should be made without Parliament being consulted and having an opportunity of expressing its opinion in the matter. That, he thought, would be accepted by the Committee as sufficient to safeguard all the hon. Gentleman had dwelt upon, and therefore he thought that, under the circumstances he had named, it would not be advisable to insert in the Bill the words the hon. Gentleman had suggested.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr) understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that school boards were to be excluded from the action of the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, that they were not included; but, in order to make it perfectly plain that they had no intention of superseding boards elected in that way under a specific Act of Parliament, by bringing in a Provisional Order, they would assent to them being excluded. They thought, looking to the nature of the powers, and the manner in which school boards were constituted, and the way they were elected, that if any alteration were made, it ought to be made by a public Act of Parliament.

MR. MOLLOY asked if the Government meant to prevent the possibility of school boards being brought by Provisional Order, or otherwise, under the authority of the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE: Certainly.

MR. MOLLOY said, that in that case he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman had given no reasons. Education was a question for the people, and the people themselves were better able than anyone else to judge what kind of education they required. Yet the right hon. Gentleman had now announced, for the first time, he believed—[MR. RITCHIE: No, no!]
—that he intended to take away from the people powers given under the Bill in that respect. The hon. Member (Mr. Channing) speaking in favour of his Amendment, which he (Mr. Molloy) hoped would be withdrawn for some other, had contended that the system of education given under the school boards was satisfactory. He (Mr. Molloy) could not agree with the hon. Gentleman. He did not think that the system of education, so far as it related to the fitness of boys, when they left school to take up occupations in the world, was as good as seemed by many to be imagined.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, it seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Molloy) did not fully appreciate the meaning of the Amendment. The Bill as it now stood preserved from interference certain Bodies elected by the ratepayers, such as Corporations, as well as urban and rural authorities. This Amendment was to preserve other Bodies likewise elected by ratepayers from interference. He was surprised there was any objection raised to the Amendment on the other side of the House; certainly he must deprecate any attempt to enter upon a wide discussion of educational subjects upon that clause.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would satisfy the Committee upon one point. As he understood the matter, there was no intention, and it had been made clear by the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), that there should not be any interference with, or absorption of, the school boards by the County Councils. What he was anxious to know was whether any of the functions now exercised by the Education Department in connection with voluntary schools would be in any way transferred to the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government had not the smallest intention of doing anything of the kind.

MR. ILLINGWORTH believed that that statement would tend to shorten the discussion, because there was great anxiety, and, he must say, considerable jealousy upon the Education Question, considering the position in which it now stood. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had given an assurance to the Committee that there was no intention whatever of transferring any powers or altering the relationship between voluntary schools and the Department, except by an express Act of Parliament in the form of a Provisional Order. If that were the case, perhaps his hon. Friend would not find it necessary to press his Amendment.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, that under the Bill, no alteration could take place as to the endowed schools.

MR. CHANNING said, that after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) he would not trouble the Committee by pressing that part of his Amendment which dealt with endowed schools. With the permission of the Committee, he would withdraw his Amendment, and simply move the insertion of the words "or a school board."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 9, after the word "authority," insert the words "or a school board." — (Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE thought it would be more convenient, the hon. Gentleman's former Amendment having been withdrawn, that his right hon. Friend's (Mr. Chaplin's) Amendment should be put, which included Boards of Guardians as well as school boards.

MR. CHANNING pointed out that there was no objection to the words of his Amendment, whereas the additional words in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) might lead to controversy.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 9, after the words last inserted, to add "and not being a Board of Guardians." — (Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that as it appeared that the Amendment was about to be passed namine contradicente, it was as well he should express a view, which he knew was held heartily on the Opposition side of the House, that Boards of Guardians ought to be disestablished and their powers transferred to the County Councils. He knew that in that statement he was largely supported by the popular Party in the House. [Laughter.] Well, they would be able to know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite formed the popular Party when they had the courage to go to the country. Anyhow, he and his hon. Friend's had all along held that one of the greatest defects in this measure was that the Government had left altogether in an unreformed condition the Boards of Guardians in the country. He did not desire to say much upon the question; but as the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to purposely exclude Boards of Guardians from being transferred to the County Councils, it was their duty, at any rate, to utter a protest against that view, because they considered that the duties of Boards of Guardians were among the most important duties which County Councils ought to have to perform, being as they were so intimately connected with the welfare of the people of the country. It was perfectly well known that Boards of Guardians did not give satisfaction to the people. The qualification for membership was a high one; there were ex officio members, and if the Government were really sincere in their constant profession of trusting the people, they would have no difficulty whatever in handing over to the County Councils the duties at present inadequately performed by Boards of Guardians.

MR. RITCHIE thought he should be able, in a very few words, to show how impossible it would be to transfer the power of Boards of Guardians to County Councils. Guardians were Guardians for Unions, while County Councils would be composed of the representatives of several Unions, and without an entire re-arrangement of the whole system it would be quite impossible to transfer the power of Boards of Guardians to County Councils. What the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Conybeare) suggested could only be done by a complete scheme and not by any method of transfer.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said, that if the contention of the right hon. Gentleman was correct, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) was really unnecessary. If, on the other hand, the effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the transfer of powers from the existing Boards of Guardians to some other authority, the Amendment was in the highest degree mischievous. If there was one thing which was brought out more clearly than another in the debate on the second reading, it was that the existing system which the Bill proposed to continue, by which they were to have the constitution and qualification and mode of election of Boards of Guardians continued on the same basis as now, was one of the most anomalous features of the Bill. Surely an Amendment which provided that at no future time should it be possible to do away with Boards of Guardians, except by a special Bill brought in the House, was one which ought to be strenuously resisted.

MR. RITCHIE said, that the Amendment only prevented the transfer of these powers by a Provisional Order—the transfer of the powers of a Body composed of representatives of one small area to a Body composed of the representatives of a very much larger area by a Provisional Order. He thought that whatever might be the opinion as to the expediency of the transfer in the future, hon. Members would agree with him that the transfer ought to be done by means of a Bill which would deal with the entire re-arrangement which would have to take place if the transfer were to be made.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) said, he had understood from the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long), that it was extremely probable that it would be left to the County Councils to determine whether the powers of the Boards of Guardians should be altered or reformed under the new conditions of the Local Government Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he never made any statement of the kind.

Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. CHAPLIN, the following Amendments made:—In page 6, line 11, after “suit,” insert “exceptions and modifications as appeared to be expedient and also such;” and in line 15, after “thereof,” insert “shall be.”

Mr. T. E. ELLIS said, that the Amendment which stood in his name was to leave out the words—

F "By the Secretary of State or Department concerned, or approved by the Commissioners, Conservators, or body corporate or unincorporate, whose powers, duties and liabilities are affected thereby.

He wished to ask the Government whether it was really necessary to include these words? Their object appeared to him to be that if any power was to be diverted from a Department to the County Councils, the approval of the Department must be had beforehand. He imagined that the Government of the day would bring forward a Provisional Order, whether they had the consent of the permanent officials or not. If that was the case, he thought it would be better to leave these words out of the Bill.

Mr. RITCHIE said, it was not a question of the permanent officials at all. The Local Government Board would be under the Bill charged with the preparation of the Provisional Orders, and clearly it was essential that the words should be inserted to show that before the Local Government Board acted in that way, the draft orders should be submitted to the Departments concerned for their approval.

Mr. FIRTH (Dundee) said, the Amendment which he had now to propose provided that before the Order in Council was made, the draft thereof should be approved by the County Council to whom the power was to be transferred.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, after "approved," insert "by the County Council to which the transfer is proposed to be made, &c."—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. RITCHIE said, he was sure the Committee would see at once the enormous amount of inconvenience which might possibly follow the acceptance of such an Amendment as that. For instance, it might be desirable that certain powers should be transferred to a County Council, and it would be excessively inconvenient if the County Council said, "We do not want these powers." It was quite clear that they must deal with this question as a whole, and, under the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether he could not insert some words, either now or on Report, which would give the County Council of London an opportunity of saying whether it would or would not take over powers which it might be sought to transfer by Provisional Order. He thought it was not at all unlikely that an attempt might be made to overload the new County Council of London with powers and duties which it would have no desire to take, and which, considering its numbers, it might have no power to discharge. He thought that it was only reasonable that this Body should be asked whether it was prepared to take over powers contemplated to be transferred to it.

Mr. FIRTH said, that this was not a case of Provisional Order, but of Order in Council.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that was so; and that was really the answer to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Baumann).

Mr. FIRTH said, he should be willing to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey) said, he now begged to move the Amendment, No. 17, standing in his name—namely, to leave out, in line 15, from "approved," to "shall," in line 18, in order to insert—

"If it relates to the powers, duties, or liabilities of a Secretary of State, or the Board of Trade, or any other Government department, by such Secretary of State, Board, or department, or approved, if it affects the powers, duties, or liabilities of any commissioners, conservators, or body, corporate or unincorporate, by such commissioners, conservators, or body."

The object of the Amendment was very simple; it was only more clearly to define the powers of the Commissioners. At the present time something like 300,000 acres of fen land in Lincoln, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely were under Drainage Boards, and it was considered that it would be very disastrous if the powers now exercised by those Drainage Boards should be handed over to those who were inexperienced in and knew nothing about fen land drainage. He therefore hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

[Ninth Night.]

Mr. Ritchie said that in that statement he was largely supported by the popular Party in the House. Laughing. Well, they would be able to know whether the Government opposed framed the popular Party when they had the courage to go to the country. Anyhow, he and his own friends had all along held that one of the greatest defects in this measure was that the Government had left altogether in an undivided condition the Boards of Guardians in the country. He did not believe any more upon the question: but as the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to purpose to exclude Boards of Guardians from being transferred to the County Councils it was their duty, at any rate, to utter a protest against that view, because they considered that the duties of Boards of Guardians were among the most important duties which County Councils ought to have to perform, being as they were so intimately connected with the welfare of the people of the country. It was perfectly well known that Boards of Guardians did not give satisfaction to the people. The qualification for membership was a high one; there were ca. 500 members, and if the Government were really sincere in their constant profession of trusting the people, they would have no difficulty whatever in handing over to the County Councils the duties at present inadequately performed by Boards of Guardians.

Mr. RITCHIE thought he should be able, in a very few words, to show how impossible it would be to transfer the power of Boards of Guardians to County Councils. THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he never made any statement of the kind.

Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. CHAPLIN, the following Amendments made:—In page 6, line 11, after "suit," insert "exceptions and modifications," and "be expedient and necessary;" and in line 15, after "insert "be."

Mr. Conybeare

MR. T. E. ELLIS said, that the Amendment which stood in his name was to leave out the words—

“By the Secretary of State or Department concerned, or approved by the Commissioners, Conservators, or body corporate or unincorporate, whose powers, duties and liabilities are affected thereby.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, after “approved,” insert “by the County Council to which the transfer is proposed to be made, &c.”—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. RITCHIE said, he was sure the Committee would see at once the enormous amount of inconvenience which might possibly follow the acceptance of such an Amendment as that. For instance, it might be desirable that certain powers should be transferred to a County Council, and it would be excessively inconvenient if the County Council said, “We do not want these powers.” It is clear that they must deal with the Bill as a whole, and, under the Bill, he trusted the hon. MR. FIRTH said, he should be willing to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey) said, he now begged to move the Amendment, No. 17^a, standing in his name—namely, to leave out, in line 15, from “approved,” to “shall,” in line 18, in order to insert—

“If it relates to the powers, duties, or liabilities of a Secretary of State, or the Board of Trade, or any other Government department, by such Secretary of State, Board, or department, or approved, if it affects the powers, duties, or liabilities of any commissioners, conservators, or body, corporate or unincorporate, by such commissioners, conservators, or body.”

He therefore hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

[Ninth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, leave out from "approved" to "shall," in line 18, and insert "if it relates to the powers, duties, or liabilities of a Secretary of State, or the Board of Trade, or any other Government department, by such Secretary of State, Board, or department, or approved, if it affects the powers, duties, or liabilities of any commissioners, conservators, or, body corporate or unincorporate, by such commissioners, conservators, or body."—(Mr. Fellowes.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RITCHIE said, in framing the Bill it had been intended that words should be inserted to carry out exactly the intentions of the hon. Member. He was bound to acknowledge, however, that the point was much more clearly put by the words proposed. The words of the Amendment were very explicit, and therefore he should be happy to accept them.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he should like to ask whether the word "commissioners" did not leave the clause too wide?

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think so, as the clause already contained the word, and the Amendment simply referred in that respect to what was already adopted.

MR. BRUNNER said, he would ask, would not this word be held to include Improvement Commissioners?

MR. RITCHIE: No, the Amendment simply follows the clause which refers to Commissioners of Sewers.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he now moved to omit the words—

"Shall be laid before each House of Parliament for not less than thirty days on which such House is sitting, and if the House before the expiration of such thirty days presents an address to Her Majesty against the draft or any part thereof, no further proceeding shall be taken thereon, without prejudice to the making of any new draft order, but otherwise the draft or such part as is not the subject of any such address shall be deemed to be approved by Parliament."

His object was, afterwards, to insert the words—

"And every such Provisional Order shall be of no effect until it is confirmed by Parliament."

Mr. Fellowes

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 18, leave out from "thereby," to end of line 25, and insert "and every such Provisional Order shall be of no effect until it is confirmed by Parliament."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RITCHIE said, that this Amendment the Government, of course, accepted, as it had been the understanding throughout that the Provisional Orders they were speaking of were Provisional Orders which should be laid before Parliament.

MR. CONYBEARE asked whether any Provisional Order ever came into effect without being laid before Parliament?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes; some of our Provisional Orders have come into effect without being laid before Parliament.

MR. CONYBEARE: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean simply by remaining on the Paper without notice being taken of them?

MR. RITCHIE: There are Board of Trade Provisional Orders, I know, which come into force without being submitted to Parliament at all.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, he rose to move Amendment No. 24, after line 25, to insert—

"Provided further that nothing in this section, nor in any order made under this section, shall extend to transfer to a county council, or to render exercisable by a county council, any power, duty, or liability within or with respect to any borough not by this Act constituted a county of itself."

He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would see the propriety of accepting this Amendment. They had now arrived at a fair understanding of the constitution of the County Council, and the position in which it would be placed by the Amendments which had been adopted by the Committee. It would be remembered, with regard to the powers which were to be transferred from the different Government Offices to the new County Authorities, that they had learned from the right hon. Gentleman himself that the provision would not apply in the case of any measures promoted by the Authorities themselves. The provision for transferring these powers would not apply in the case of any of the scheduled boroughs; therefore it was clear that, much as they had desired decentralization and devolution, the Home Office, Board of Trade, and Local Government Board would be under the necessity of continuing the staff of competent men they had hitherto employed, in order to deal with those matters which would be referred to them under the same conditions as heretofore, and all this Amendment asked was, that corporate boroughs which were of less population than those exempted, that was, under the 50,000 population limit, would be left as heretofore, rather to the Government Authorities than to the newly constituted County Councils. He trusted it would not be necessary for him to occupy the time of the Committee at any length in arguing considerations which must be obvious to all hon. Members present. He was glad to see in his place the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley), whose very weighty illustrations in support of this Amendment had, unfortunately, been heard by such a small number of Members. There must, however, have been many Members in the House who had been urged by their constituents to support this Amendment, and he, therefore, ventured to submit it to the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, after line 25, insert—"Provided further that nothing in this section, nor in any order made under this section, shall extend to transfer to a county council, or to render exercisable by a county council, any power, duty, or liability within or with respect to any borough not by this Act constituted a county of itself."
—(Mr. Woodall.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he could understand the hon. Gentleman placing this Amendment on the Paper, and desiring to have it inserted as the clause was originally drawn, because, when the clause stood in its original form, certain powers were at once transferred to the County Councils, many of those powers being powers connected with the issue of Provisional Orders, and many of them dealing with matters affecting the arrangements of the Imperial Government with the boroughs. But it must be pointed out to the hon. Gentleman that the face of things had very materially altered by the changes which had taken place in the clause.

MR. WOODALL said, those changes had strengthened his point.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think that could be the case, because, as the clause now stood, no transfer could be made except by means of a Provisional Order. It would be a matter for consideration, when a Provisional Order was made, whether it did or did not unduly and in an objectionable manner interfere with a borough. He thought it would be highly inexpedient to add a provision of this kind to a clause which would entirely prevent in future any power being given to a County Council which must be exercisable with reference to every borough within the county. He honestly believed that when this Bill came into operation boroughs which were contained within the counties would see, in reference to the position they would occupy on the County Councils, that in many matters for which they had now to come to the Government Departments, it would be more convenient and more desirable for them to go to the great Administrative Institution it was proposed to set up in every county. If this Amendment were accepted, it would prevent these powers being exercisable, and they would, for a time, until a fresh Act was passed, impose the duty on a borough of coming to the Central Department rather than going to the local Representative Institution on which they themselves were fully and adequately represented. He hoped, therefore, that, looking at the fact that there was a desire to carry out, as far as possible, a system of decentralization, and place in the hands of the Local Body those powers which had hitherto been discharged by the Central Authority, when the transfer was made from the Central Department, he hoped the hon. Member would see that the Government did not desire to infringe on the privileges of anyone in the county, but rather to increase them. All boroughs, by means of Provisional Orders, would be able to express their opinion upon any matter they thought desirable.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool) said, he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would have viewed this

Amendment with more favour. The right hon. Gentleman forgot that the County Councils, as now constituted, would be very different Bodies to those foreshadowed in the Bill, and, he might say, as some of them would have preferred to see them. The right hon. Gentleman forgot that there were very few counties in England in which the County Councils would represent any boroughs at all. Take the large county of Lancaster. He could very well conceive that, if all the great boroughs in that county had found representation on a large Council formed for the representation of the County Palatine, it would have been possible to give them very many of the powers they had been discussing, and he presumed that no such Amendment as that now proposed would have been necessary. But what was the position they found themselves in now? There were many boroughs in Lancashire, part of which county he represented, which would not be treated as separate counties, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that these places had no desire to go to the new County Authority, as it would be constituted under this Bill, to get its sanction for Provisional Orders, or any other powers which might have to be given. These boroughs had already represented to the right hon. Gentleman that they would rather go to a Government Department. He had two or three boroughs in his mind in the county of Lancashire—health resorts, say. With what confidence could one of these go to a County Council such as they would be likely to have in Lancashire, where rival interests would, in all probability, be very largely concerned? Would they be able to go with the same confidence to such a Council as they would be able to go to a Central Department in London? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said that a Provisional Order would meet the whole case, and that boroughs which did not desire to come under the control of the County Council were to have the advantage of obtaining such Orders. He (Sir Matthew White Ridley) could quite understand that there was something in that view of the right hon. Gentleman; but his contention was, that the municipal boroughs were not adequately represented on the County Councils. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said they were adequately represented, but that position he (Sir Matthew White Ridley) disputed. Why should those municipal boroughs be put in the position of having to oppose Provisional Orders promoted by the County Councils? They now asked that they might have a separate existence in the county, which was perfectly well understood; that all boroughs, whatever their population, should, with reference to these Orders, be excluded from the action of the County Council. Surely the case needed only to be stated to find some support, and he sincerely trusted the right hon. Gentleman would take a favourable view of the matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he agreed rather with the Government than with the hon. Baronet who had just spoken, or the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment. He would ask the question once more, were they or were they not engaged in decentralization? If they were, what was the object of the argument of the hon. Member that they ought to have centralization with regard to boroughs. ["No, no!"] Yes; that really was his argument, because all these authorities were to be reserved to the Government Departments. Now, he (Sir William Harcourt) wished to get this authority out of the hands of the Government Department as far as possible. He had been a party to getting the great boroughs out of the Bill, although, no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in the interests of his measure, would rather have kept them in. He (Sir William Harcourt) fully admitted that, if the great boroughs had been kept in the Bill, it would have strengthened the right hon. Gentleman's County Councils; but then there were rival interests in connection with the great boroughs, which the right hon. Gentleman had thought it necessary to respect. But if they were going to lay it down that all the small boroughs were also to be absolutely and entirely outside the purview of the County Councils as regarded these powers, practically speaking they would reduce their County Councils to a condition of comparative insignificance. Therefore, it was clearly in the interest of the Bill, as he was constantly contending, not to weaken the County Councils. He observed that the hon. Baronet (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had used these words—"Could these rival towns have confidence in the County Councils?" Why, that surely was a spirit of want of confidence which would weaken these Bodies very much. If they held the Councils up as Bodies to which towns in Lancashire could not safely trust their interests, they were disparaging the County Councils, not intentionally, perhaps, but they were expressing with regard to them a want of confidence that would very much diminish their authority. He objected very much to the exercise of many of these powers possessed by the Central Department. When he was responsible for the administration of the Home Office, he observed that Inspectors of Constabulary, for instance, were constantly going to towns and telling the Local Authorities that they ought to have more police than the Local Authorities thought they wanted. He absolutely prohibited any interference on the part of the Home Office with the Municipalities or the Local Councils in these matters. If these Councils knew anything at all, they knew much better than any Central Authority all about such matters as local police. The Inspectors of Constabulary, to his mind, were absolutely useless for the purposes for which they at present existed; and he referred to them as an illustration of what he considered a bad form of centralization. He should be very sorry to exclude from the Bill the power and means of getting rid of more of this Central Department authority. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, they did not commit themselves finally on the subject of what powers were to be given or not given, but, by keeping these words out of the Bill, they would be keeping open to themselves the means of transferring such of the powers as might be thought desirable.

MR. RITCHIE said, he concurred with the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. In his opinion, the County Councils would be in an extremely anomalous position if the Amendment were accepted. All these boroughs would be represented on the County Councils—and he did not know whether he had misunderstood the hon. Baronet in saying that they might not all be represented.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, that rival towns would be represented on the same Council, and it would not be a pleasant thing for a health resort, for instance, to apply to such Council for a Provisional Order, it might be, against the desire of other towns.

MR. RITCHIE said, that with all respect to the hon. Baronet he had more confidence in what the position of these County Councils would be than to imagine that there would be such rivalries and jealousies between one town and another, which would prevent a town getting what it desired. It would be a matter for consideration, when a Provisional Order was brought in, what way the borough should be dealt with. Though he thought there was a great deal to be said for the view of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall), in regard to the transference of many of the powers which were of a debatable character—questions involving Provisional Orders—yet he thought that the concession the Government had made as to Provisional Orders really removed the main ground for this Amendment.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, he hoped the Government would give this matter further consideration. The small boroughs, one of which he had the honour to represent, were strongly opposed to these rights being taken away from them. They were prepared to manage their own affairs through the Central Department, and they asked that they should not be disturbed. As the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had said, they would be represented upon the County Councils, but they would have only one member, perhaps, on a Body consisting of 70 or 80, and their voice would be almost unheard amongst such a large number. The whole sense of the Bill, as proclaimed by the Government, was that vested interests would not be disturbed—that nothing would be taken away from any vested interest, so far as any local affairs were concerned.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, he also desired to support the Amendment. He was certain that the municipal boroughs of the country were most anxious to be exempted from the authority of the

County Council, and not to be interfered with by it. The old Municipalities, almost one and all of them, begged to be exempted. He, therefore, agreed very much with what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Blackpool, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill would look favourably upon the proposal.

MR. BRUNNER said, he regretted he could not support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, though it was impossible for him to follow the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. It seemed to him that the County Councils, as constituted by the Bill, would be somewhat less worthy of respect than they would have been if all the boroughs of 50,000 and upwards had been represented upon them; but, on the other hand, he thought it would be a sad thing on the part of the House to keep up two Authorities to which appeal could be made on matters such as were dealt with in the Schedules. Although he had always had a very great respect for the action of the officials under the Local Government Board, he thought it would be well that the County Council should be the Authority of the future, not only because he had every confidence they would do their work well, but also on account of the educating influence which would thus be brought to bear upon them. He wished to point out, that if the proposal for selective Councillors were dropped the County Council would be more respected by the boroughs the hon. Baronet had spoken of than they would be in the future. This question of selective Councillors, however, had been thrashed out, and he did not wish to say more about it. He had endeavoured, in the consideration of this Bill, to put aside all Party matters, and he desired that these County Councils should be as greatly respected and as dignified as they could possibly be made, and he believed that if, by-and-bye, those selected Councillors no longer existed, the County Councils would be more respected.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) in his desire for decentralization, and, at the same time, he agreed with those who supported the Amendment; but he thought that another alternative might be suggested which did not appear to have been brought before the Committee. It appeared to him that what they wanted to do was to carry out decentralization as far as possible, but, at the same time, to safeguard the individual urban life of the different municipalities, on behalf of which the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall) and the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had spoken. He would ask if these two conflicting views could not be brought together by providing that, when a measure of decentralization should have taken place, authorities which differed very much in themselves should be transferred, some to one party and some to another? When the measure for decentralization was adopted and a Provisional Order Bill was brought forward, some of these powers might be transferred to the District Council. These District Councils would, he understood, in many cases be the municipalities which they were speaking of. He felt very strongly that the County Councils should have ample powers and should be made as dignified as possible, so as to command the confidence of the people generally; but at the same time they did not want altogether to stifle the individual municipal life of the old established boroughs which were now in question. He would, therefore, venture to suggest whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would not consider the possibility of making some arrangement in the direction proposed. He did not say that the right hon. Gentleman should accept the Amendment as it stood upon the Paper, but he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman could not frame some suggestion, at a later stage, to provide that when such transfers of powers took place as was proposed, some of the powers should be transferred to the District Authorities instead of the whole of them being transferred to the County Councils. It struck him that this proposal might meet with the approval of the hon. Member for Hanley, and at the same time bring into harmony the conflicting views of hon. Members.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said, he wished to add a few words in favour of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for

Mr. Stanley Leighton

Hanley. He believed that if the Bill was carried without the Amendment it would do harm to the municipal life of the small boroughs. Many of these boroughs were very ancient, and they would be placed in a secondary position—as compared with the position they had held in the past—under the Bill as it at present stood, and he did not think that would be good for their municipal life. Moreover, the adoption of the clause without this Amendment would be a slur upon those boroughs which during the past few years had been created municipal boroughs, as they would be placed in a secondary in place of an independent position as regarded the County Authority. The clause, unless amended, would afford an obstacle to the creation of new municipalities in the future, as they would have to maintain their claim through the County Councils instead of through a Government Department. It was in the interests of independent local life, which he thought ought to be encouraged and fostered by every means in their power, that he strongly supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hanley. One of the best things in our local life from one end of England to the other had been the growing up of communities into independent centres of local self-government. He wanted that state of things to continue. He did not wish to see these boroughs interfered with, whether they were old or new, as he did not wish to see these places put in an inferior position to a Body which would very often be out of sympathy with them.

MR. WOODALL said, he should be very sorry to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division if he could avoid it; but he certainly, under the circumstances, felt bound to divide. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board could suggest anything to give effect to what he had understood him to imply—namely, that there might be the possibility of devising some method by which the municipal boroughs might have an option in the matter of going either to the County authority or to the Government authority.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was afraid it would be very inconvenient to have a dual control, but he had always said that when they came to consider the question of the transference of powers by means of Provisional Orders, he should be very glad to give full consideration to the suggestion made.

MR. WOODALL said, that the right hon. Gentleman would see that his Amendment proposed that whatever might be the powers given under the Provisional Orders to county authorities, the municipal boroughs should be exempted.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could not possibly accept that.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) asked, would the right hon. Gentleman consider the proposal of the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare)?

MR. RITCHIE: We give large powers of delegation from the County Council to the District Council?

MR. CONYBEARE asked whether it would not be possible, without putting the Committee to the trouble of a Division, to leave the matter so far open that when they came to discuss the matter of delegating these powers, they would still be in a position to discuss the question they were now discussing?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Hanley would not think it necessary to divide the Committee upon this Amendment. It had not received much support, and there seemed to be a great deal in what was said of the changed position effected by the Amendments in the clause.

MR. WOODALL: Perhaps the Government would prefer that we should report Progress?

MR. RITCHIE: Certainly not.

Question put, and negatived.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Q U E S T I O N S .

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ACT.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I suppose I am right in assuming that as Monday was fixed for the debate on the Motion of which I areas, men who were acquainted with the local feelings of the people, to a central body at some distance from the localities. He thought the principle of local control was the keynote of the success of education in England. It was the secret of the magnificent results obtained by such a school board as that of Birmingham, and it was equally true of the Managing Committees of voluntary schools. His amendment applied also to the endowed schools of the country, where there was an elective element in the body of governors. He quite agreed with much that had been said in regard to transferring to the County Councils some control over the endowments of the country. But he held that it was vitally important to maintain some form of local administration, so that the special wants and interests of the locality might be secured. He had reason to believe that the first part of his Amendment would be accepted by Her Majesty's Government; but he trusted that on consideration they would be disposed to accept the whole of it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 9, after the words "authority" to insert the words "or a school board, or other board, committee, or authority elected directly or indirectly to deal with educational matters, or any body of trustees or governors, wholly elected, or partly elected and partly nominated, for the management of an endowed school."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he was sure the Committee would hardly expect him to enter into a discussion of the merits of the Act of 1870, or of the manner in which the school boards of the country had fulfilled the duties cast upon them. He would only say that no one valued more than he did the provisions of the Act of 1870, and none were stronger in their admiration of the manner in which that Act had been carried out, and of the enormous benefit conferred upon the country by the school boards elected under the Act than himself. But it was unnecessary for them to enter into a discussion of that, because they had said explicitly, that they did not intend that the question of school boards should be included in the provisions of the Bill, and they had said they proposed to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin), which specifically excluded school boards from transfer under the Bill. With reference to the latter part of the Amendment he had to point out that, in his opinion, all the hon. Gentleman desired to safeguard was amply safeguarded, now that they had accepted the proposal that no transfer should be made without Parliament being consulted and having an opportunity of expressing its opinion in the matter. That, he thought, would be accepted by the Committee as sufficient to safeguard all the hon. Gentleman had dwelt upon, and therefore he thought that, under the circumstances he had named, it would not be advisable to insert in the Bill the words the hon. Gentleman had suggested.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr) understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that school boards were to be excluded from the action of the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, that they were not included; but, in order to make it perfectly plain that they had no intention of superseding boards elected in that way under a specific Act of Parliament, by bringing in a Provisional Order, they would assent to them being excluded. They thought, looking to the nature of the powers, and the manner in which school boards were constituted, and the way they were elected, that if any alteration were made, it ought to be made by a public Act of Parliament.

MR. MOLLOY asked if the Government meant to prevent the possibility of school boards being brought by Provisional Order, or otherwise, under the authority of the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE: Certainly.

MR. MOLLOY said, that in that case he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman had given no reasons. Education was a question for the people, and the people themselves were better able than anyone else to judge what kind of education they required. Yet the right hon. Gentleman had now announced, for the first time, he believed—[MR. RITCHIE: No, no!]
—that he intended to take away from the people powers given under the Bill in that respect. The hon. Member (Mr. Channing) speaking in favour of his Amendment, which he (Mr. Molloy) hoped would be withdrawn for some other, had contended that the system of education given under the school boards was satisfactory. He (Mr. Molloy) could not agree with the hon. Gentleman. He did not think that the system of education, so far as it related to the fitness of boys, when they left school to take up occupations in the world, was as good as seemed by many to be imagined.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, it seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Molloy) did not fully appreciate the meaning of the Amendment. The Bill as it now stood preserved from interference certain Bodies elected by the ratepayers, such as Corporations, as well as urban and rural authorities. This Amendment was to preserve other Bodies likewise elected by ratepayers from interference. He was surprised there was any objection raised to the Amendment on the other side of the House; certainly he must deprecate any attempt to enter upon a wide discussion of educational subjects upon that clause.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would satisfy the Committee upon one point. As he understood the matter, there was no intention, and it had been made clear by the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), that there should not be any interference with, or absorption of, the school boards by the County Councils. What he was anxious to know was whether any of the functions now exercised by the Education Department in connection with voluntary schools would be in any way transferred to the County Councils?

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government had not the smallest intention of doing anything of the kind.

MR. ILLINGWORTH believed that that statement would tend to shorten the discussion, because there was great anxiety, and, he must say, considerable jealousy upon the Education Question, considering the position in which it now stood. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had given an assurance to the Committee that there was no intention whatever of transferring any powers or altering the relationship between voluntary schools and the Department, except by an express Act of Parliament in the form of a Provisional Order. If that were the case, perhaps his hon. Friend would not find it necessary to press his Amendment.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, that under the Bill, no alteration could take place as to the endowed schools.

MR. CHANNING said, that after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) he would not trouble the Committee by pressing that part of his Amendment which dealt with endowed schools. With the permission of the Committee, he would withdraw his Amendment, and simply move the insertion of the words "or a school board."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 9, after the word "authority," insert the words "or a school board." — (Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE thought it would be more convenient, the hon. Gentleman's former Amendment having been withdrawn, that his right hon. Friend's (Mr. Chaplin's) Amendment should be put, which included Boards of Guardians as well as school boards.

MR. CHANNING pointed out that there was no objection to the words of his Amendment, whereas the additional words in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) might lead to controversy.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 9, after the words last inserted, to add "and not being a Board of Guardians." — (Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that as it appeared that the Amendment was about to be passed nemine contradicente, it was as well he should express a view, which he knew was held heartily on the Opposition side of the House, that Boards of Guardians ought to be disestablished and their powers transferred to the County Councils. He knew that in that statement he was largely supported by the popular Party in the House. [Laughter.] Well, they would be able to know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite formed the popular Party when they had the courage to go to the country. Anyhow, he and his hon. Friend's had all along held that one of the greatest defects in this measure was that the Government had left altogether in an unreformed condition the Boards of Guardians in the country. He did not desire to say much upon the question; but as the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to purposely exclude Boards of Guardians from being transferred to the County Councils, it was their duty, at any rate, to utter a protest against that view, because they considered that the duties of Boards of Guardians were among the most important duties which County Councils ought to have to perform, being as they were so intimately connected with the welfare of the people of the country. It was perfectly well known that Boards of Guardians did not give satisfaction to the people. The qualification for membership was a high one; there were ex officio members, and if the Government were really sincere in their constant profession of trusting the people, they would have no difficulty whatever in handing over to the County Councils the duties at present inadequately performed by Boards of Guardians.

MR. RITCHIE thought he should be able, in a very few words, to show how impossible it would be to transfer the power of Boards of Guardians to County Councils. Guardians were Guardians for Unions, while County Councils would be composed of the representatives of several Unions, and without an entire re-arrangement of the whole system it would be quite impossible to transfer the power of Boards of Guardians to County Councils. What the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Conybeare) suggested could only be done by a complete scheme and not by any method of transfer.

Mr. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said, that if the contention of the right hon. Gentleman was correct, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) was really unnecessary. If, on the other hand, the effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the transfer of powers from the existing Boards of Guardians to some other authority, the Amendment was in the highest degree mischievous. If there was one thing which was brought out more clearly than another in the debate on the second reading, it was that the existing system which the Bill proposed to continue, by which they were to have the constitution and qualification and mode of election of Boards of Guardians continued on the same basis as now, was one of the most anomalous features of the Bill. Surely an Amendment which provided that at no future time should it be possible to do away with Boards of Guardians, except by a special Bill brought in the House, was one which ought to be strenuously resisted.

MR. RITCHIE said, that the Amendment only prevented the transfer of these powers by a Provisional Order—the transfer of the powers of a Body composed of representatives of one small area to a Body composed of the representatives of a very much larger area by a Provisional Order. He thought that whatever might be the opinion as to the expediency of the transfer in the future, hon. Members would agree with him that the transfer ought to be done by means of a Bill which would deal with the entire re-arrangement which would have to take place if the transfer were to be made.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) said, he had understood from the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long), that it was extremely probable that it would be left to the County Councils to determine whether the powers of the Boards of Guardians should be altered or reformed under the new conditions of the Local Government Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he never made any statement of the kind.

Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. CHAPLIN, the following Amendments made:—In page 6, line 11, after “suit,” insert “exceptions and modifications as appeared to be expedient and also such;” and in line 15, after “thereof,” insert “shall be.”

Mr. T. E. ELLIS said, that the Amendment which stood in his name was to leave out the words—

F "By the Secretary of State or Department concerned, or approved by the Commissioners, Conservators, or body corporate or unincorporate, whose powers, duties and liabilities are affected thereby.

He wished to ask the Government whether it was really necessary to include these words? Their object appeared to him to be that if any power was to be diverted from a Department to the County Councils, the approval of the Department must be had beforehand. He imagined that the Government of the day would bring forward a Provisional Order, whether they had the consent of the permanent officials or not. If that was the case, he thought it would be better to leave these words out of the Bill.

Mr. RITCHIE said, it was not a question of the permanent officials at all. The Local Government Board would be under the Bill charged with the preparation of the Provisional Orders, and clearly it was essential that the words should be inserted to show that before the Local Government Board acted in that way, the draft orders should be submitted to the Departments concerned for their approval.

Mr. FIRTH (Dundee) said, the Amendment which he had now to propose provided that before the Order in Council was made, the draft thereof should be approved by the County Council to whom the power was to be transferred.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, after "approved," insert "by the County Council to which the transfer is proposed to be made, &c."—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. RITCHIE said, he was sure the Committee would see at once the enormous amount of inconvenience which might possibly follow the acceptance of such an Amendment as that. For instance, it might be desirable that certain powers should be transferred to a County Council, and it would be excessively inconvenient if the County Council said, "We do not want these powers." It was quite clear that they must deal with this question as a whole, and, under the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether he could not insert some words, either now or on Report, which would give the County Council of London an opportunity of saying whether it would or would not take over powers which it might be sought to transfer by Provisional Order. He thought it was not at all unlikely that an attempt might be made to overload the new County Council of London with powers and duties which it would have no desire to take, and which, considering its numbers, it might have no power to discharge. He thought that it was only reasonable that this Body should be asked whether it was prepared to take over powers contemplated to be transferred to it.

Mr. FIRTH said, that this was not a case of Provisional Order, but of Order in Council.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that was so; and that was really the answer to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Baumann).

Mr. FIRTH said, he should be willing to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey) said, he now begged to move the Amendment, No. 17, standing in his name—namely, to leave out, in line 15, from "approved," to "shall," in line 18, in order to insert—

"If it relates to the powers, duties, or liabilities of a Secretary of State, or the Board of Trade, or any other Government department, by such Secretary of State, Board, or department, or approved, if it affects the powers, duties, or liabilities of any commissioners, conservators, or body, corporate or unincorporate, by such commissioners, conservators, or body."

The object of the Amendment was very simple; it was only more clearly to define the powers of the Commissioners. At the present time something like 300,000 acres of fen land in Lincoln, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely were under Drainage Boards, and it was considered that it would be very disastrous if the powers now exercised by those Drainage Boards should be handed over to those who were inexperienced in and knew nothing about fen land drainage. He therefore hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

[Ninth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, leave out from "approved" to "shall," in line 18, and insert "if it relates to the powers, duties, or liabilities of a Secretary of State, or the Board of Trade, or any other Government department, by such Secretary of State, Board, or department, or approved, if it affects the powers, duties, or liabilities of any commissioners, conservators, or, body corporate or unincorporate, by such commissioners, conservators, or body."—(Mr. Fellowes.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RITCHIE said, in framing the Bill it had been intended that words should be inserted to carry out exactly the intentions of the hon. Member. He was bound to acknowledge, however, that the point was much more clearly put by the words proposed. The words of the Amendment were very explicit, and therefore he should be happy to accept them.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he should like to ask whether the word "commissioners" did not leave the clause too wide?

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think so, as the clause already contained the word, and the Amendment simply referred in that respect to what was already adopted.

MR. BRUNNER said, he would ask, would not this word be held to include Improvement Commissioners?

MR. RITCHIE: No, the Amendment simply follows the clause which refers to Commissioners of Sewers.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he now moved to omit the words—

"Shall be laid before each House of Parliament for not less than thirty days on which such House is sitting, and if the House before the expiration of such thirty days presents an address to Her Majesty against the draft or any part thereof, no further proceeding shall be taken thereon, without prejudice to the making of any new draft order, but otherwise the draft or such part as is not the subject of any such address shall be deemed to be approved by Parliament."

His object was, afterwards, to insert the words—

"And every such Provisional Order shall be of no effect until it is confirmed by Parliament."

Mr. Fellowes

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 18, leave out from "thereby," to end of line 25, and insert "and every such Provisional Order shall be of no effect until it is confirmed by Parliament."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RITCHIE said, that this Amendment the Government, of course, accepted, as it had been the understanding throughout that the Provisional Orders they were speaking of were Provisional Orders which should be laid before Parliament.

MR. CONYBEARE asked whether any Provisional Order ever came into effect without being laid before Parliament?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes; some of our Provisional Orders have come into effect without being laid before Parliament.

MR. CONYBEARE: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean simply by remaining on the Paper without notice being taken of them?

MR. RITCHIE: There are Board of Trade Provisional Orders, I know, which come into force without being submitted to Parliament at all.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, he rose to move Amendment No. 24, after line 25, to insert—

"Provided further that nothing in this section, nor in any order made under this section, shall extend to transfer to a county council, or to render exercisable by a county council, any power, duty, or liability within or with respect to any borough not by this Act constituted a county of itself."

He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would see the propriety of accepting this Amendment. They had now arrived at a fair understanding of the constitution of the County Council, and the position in which it would be placed by the Amendments which had been adopted by the Committee. It would be remembered, with regard to the powers which were to be transferred from the different Government Offices to the new County Authorities, that they had learned from the right hon. Gentleman himself that the provision would not apply in the case of any measures promoted by the Authorities themselves. The provision for transferring these powers would not apply in the case of any of the scheduled boroughs; therefore it was clear that, much as they had desired decentralization and devolution, the Home Office, Board of Trade, and Local Government Board would be under the necessity of continuing the staff of competent men they had hitherto employed, in order to deal with those matters which would be referred to them under the same conditions as heretofore, and all this Amendment asked was, that corporate boroughs which were of less population than those exempted, that was, under the 50,000 population limit, would be left as heretofore, rather to the Government Authorities than to the newly constituted County Councils. He trusted it would not be necessary for him to occupy the time of the Committee at any length in arguing considerations which must be obvious to all hon. Members present. He was glad to see in his place the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley), whose very weighty illustrations in support of this Amendment had, unfortunately, been heard by such a small number of Members. There must, however, have been many Members in the House who had been urged by their constituents to support this Amendment, and he, therefore, ventured to submit it to the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, after line 25, insert—"Provided further that nothing in this section, nor in any order made under this section, shall extend to transfer to a county council, or to render exercisable by a county council, any power, duty, or liability within or with respect to any borough not by this Act constituted a county of itself."
—(Mr. Woodall.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he could understand the hon. Gentleman placing this Amendment on the Paper, and desiring to have it inserted as the clause was originally drawn, because, when the clause stood in its original form, certain powers were at once transferred to the County Councils, many of those powers being powers connected with the issue of Provisional Orders, and many of them dealing with matters affecting the arrangements of the Imperial Government with the boroughs. But it must be pointed out to the hon. Gentleman that the face of things had very materially altered by the changes which had taken place in the clause.

MR. WOODALL said, those changes had strengthened his point.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think that could be the case, because, as the clause now stood, no transfer could be made except by means of a Provisional Order. It would be a matter for consideration, when a Provisional Order was made, whether it did or did not unduly and in an objectionable manner interfere with a borough. He thought it would be highly inexpedient to add a provision of this kind to a clause which would entirely prevent in future any power being given to a County Council which must be exercisable with reference to every borough within the county. He honestly believed that when this Bill came into operation boroughs which were contained within the counties would see, in reference to the position they would occupy on the County Councils, that in many matters for which they had now to come to the Government Departments, it would be more convenient and more desirable for them to go to the great Administrative Institution it was proposed to set up in every county. If this Amendment were accepted, it would prevent these powers being exercisable, and they would, for a time, until a fresh Act was passed, impose the duty on a borough of coming to the Central Department rather than going to the local Representative Institution on which they themselves were fully and adequately represented. He hoped, therefore, that, looking at the fact that there was a desire to carry out, as far as possible, a system of decentralization, and place in the hands of the Local Body those powers which had hitherto been discharged by the Central Authority, when the transfer was made from the Central Department, he hoped the hon. Member would see that the Government did not desire to infringe on the privileges of anyone in the county, but rather to increase them. All boroughs, by means of Provisional Orders, would be able to express their opinion upon any matter they thought desirable.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool) said, he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would have viewed this

Amendment with more favour. The right hon. Gentleman forgot that the County Councils, as now constituted, would be very different Bodies to those foreshadowed in the Bill, and, he might say, as some of them would have preferred to see them. The right hon. Gentleman forgot that there were very few counties in England in which the County Councils would represent any boroughs at all. Take the large county of Lancaster. He could very well conceive that, if all the great boroughs in that county had found representation on a large Council formed for the representation of the County Palatine, it would have been possible to give them very many of the powers they had been discussing, and he presumed that no such Amendment as that now proposed would have been necessary. But what was the position they found themselves in now? There were many boroughs in Lancashire, part of which county he represented, which would not be treated as separate counties, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that these places had no desire to go to the new County Authority, as it would be constituted under this Bill, to get its sanction for Provisional Orders, or any other powers which might have to be given. These boroughs had already represented to the right hon. Gentleman that they would rather go to a Government Department. He had two or three boroughs in his mind in the county of Lancashire—health resorts, say. With what confidence could one of these go to a County Council such as they would be likely to have in Lancashire, where rival interests would, in all probability, be very largely concerned? Would they be able to go with the same confidence to such a Council as they would be able to go to a Central Department in London? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said that a Provisional Order would meet the whole case, and that boroughs which did not desire to come under the control of the County Council were to have the advantage of obtaining such Orders. He (Sir Matthew White Ridley) could quite understand that there was something in that view of the right hon. Gentleman; but his contention was, that the municipal boroughs were not adequately represented on the County Councils. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said they were adequately represented, but that position he (Sir Matthew White Ridley) disputed. Why should those municipal boroughs be put in the position of having to oppose Provisional Orders promoted by the County Councils? They now asked that they might have a separate existence in the county, which was perfectly well understood; that all boroughs, whatever their population, should, with reference to these Orders, be excluded from the action of the County Council. Surely the case needed only to be stated to find some support, and he sincerely trusted the right hon. Gentleman would take a favourable view of the matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he agreed rather with the Government than with the hon. Baronet who had just spoken, or the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment. He would ask the question once more, were they or were they not engaged in decentralization? If they were, what was the object of the argument of the hon. Member that they ought to have centralization with regard to boroughs. ["No, no!"] Yes; that really was his argument, because all these authorities were to be reserved to the Government Departments. Now, he (Sir William Harcourt) wished to get this authority out of the hands of the Government Department as far as possible. He had been a party to getting the great boroughs out of the Bill, although, no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in the interests of his measure, would rather have kept them in. He (Sir William Harcourt) fully admitted that, if the great boroughs had been kept in the Bill, it would have strengthened the right hon. Gentleman's County Councils; but then there were rival interests in connection with the great boroughs, which the right hon. Gentleman had thought it necessary to respect. But if they were going to lay it down that all the small boroughs were also to be absolutely and entirely outside the purview of the County Councils as regarded these powers, practically speaking they would reduce their County Councils to a condition of comparative insignificance. Therefore, it was clearly in the interest of the Bill, as he was constantly contending, not to weaken the County Councils. He observed that the hon. Baronet (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had used these words—"Could these rival towns have confidence in the County Councils?" Why, that surely was a spirit of want of confidence which would weaken these Bodies very much. If they held the Councils up as Bodies to which towns in Lancashire could not safely trust their interests, they were disparaging the County Councils, not intentionally, perhaps, but they were expressing with regard to them a want of confidence that would very much diminish their authority. He objected very much to the exercise of many of these powers possessed by the Central Department. When he was responsible for the administration of the Home Office, he observed that Inspectors of Constabulary, for instance, were constantly going to towns and telling the Local Authorities that they ought to have more police than the Local Authorities thought they wanted. He absolutely prohibited any interference on the part of the Home Office with the Municipalities or the Local Councils in these matters. If these Councils knew anything at all, they knew much better than any Central Authority all about such matters as local police. The Inspectors of Constabulary, to his mind, were absolutely useless for the purposes for which they at present existed; and he referred to them as an illustration of what he considered a bad form of centralization. He should be very sorry to exclude from the Bill the power and means of getting rid of more of this Central Department authority. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, they did not commit themselves finally on the subject of what powers were to be given or not given, but, by keeping these words out of the Bill, they would be keeping open to themselves the means of transferring such of the powers as might be thought desirable.

MR. RITCHIE said, he concurred with the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. In his opinion, the County Councils would be in an extremely anomalous position if the Amendment were accepted. All these boroughs would be represented on the County Councils—and he did not know whether he had misunderstood the hon. Baronet in saying that they might not all be represented.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, that rival towns would be represented on the same Council, and it would not be a pleasant thing for a health resort, for instance, to apply to such Council for a Provisional Order, it might be, against the desire of other towns.

MR. RITCHIE said, that with all respect to the hon. Baronet he had more confidence in what the position of these County Councils would be than to imagine that there would be such rivalries and jealousies between one town and another, which would prevent a town getting what it desired. It would be a matter for consideration, when a Provisional Order was brought in, what way the borough should be dealt with. Though he thought there was a great deal to be said for the view of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall), in regard to the transference of many of the powers which were of a debatable character—questions involving Provisional Orders—yet he thought that the concession the Government had made as to Provisional Orders really removed the main ground for this Amendment.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, he hoped the Government would give this matter further consideration. The small boroughs, one of which he had the honour to represent, were strongly opposed to these rights being taken away from them. They were prepared to manage their own affairs through the Central Department, and they asked that they should not be disturbed. As the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had said, they would be represented upon the County Councils, but they would have only one member, perhaps, on a Body consisting of 70 or 80, and their voice would be almost unheard amongst such a large number. The whole sense of the Bill, as proclaimed by the Government, was that vested interests would not be disturbed—that nothing would be taken away from any vested interest, so far as any local affairs were concerned.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, he also desired to support the Amendment. He was certain that the municipal boroughs of the country were most anxious to be exempted from the authority of the County Council, and not to be interfered with by it. The old Municipalities, almost one and all of them, begged to be exempted. He, therefore, agreed very much with what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Blackpool, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill would look favourably upon the proposal.

MR. BRUNNER said, he regretted he could not support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, though it was impossible for him to follow the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. It seemed to him that the County Councils, as constituted by the Bill, would be somewhat less worthy of respect than they would have been if all the boroughs of 50,000 and upwards had been represented upon them; but, on the other hand, he thought it would be a sad thing on the part of the House to keep up two Authorities to which appeal could be made on matters such as were dealt with in the Schedules. Although he had always had a very great respect for the action of the officials under the Local Government Board, he thought it would be well that the County Council should be the Authority of the future, not only because he had every confidence they would do their work well, but also on account of the educating influence which would thus be brought to bear upon them. He wished to point out, that if the proposal for selective Councillors were dropped the County Council would be more respected by the boroughs the hon. Baronet had spoken of than they would be in the future. This question of selective Councillors, however, had been thrashed out, and he did not wish to say more about it. He had endeavoured, in the consideration of this Bill, to put aside all Party matters, and he desired that these County Councils should be as greatly respected and as dignified as they could possibly be made, and he believed that if, by-and-bye, those selected Councillors no longer existed, the County Councils would be more respected.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) in his desire for decentralization, and, at the same time, he agreed with those who supported the Amendment; but he thought that another alternative might be suggested which did not appear to have been brought before the Committee. It appeared to him that what they wanted to do was to carry out decentralization as far as possible, but, at the same time, to safeguard the individual urban life of the different municipalities, on behalf of which the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall) and the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division (Sir Matthew White Ridley) had spoken. He would ask if these two conflicting views could not be brought together by providing that, when a measure of decentralization should have taken place, authorities which differed very much in themselves should be transferred, some to one party and some to another? When the measure for decentralization was adopted and a Provisional Order Bill was brought forward, some of these powers might be transferred to the District Council. These District Councils would, he understood, in many cases be the municipalities which they were speaking of. He felt very strongly that the County Councils should have ample powers and should be made as dignified as possible, so as to command the confidence of the people generally; but at the same time they did not want altogether to stifle the individual municipal life of the old established boroughs which were now in question. He would, therefore, venture to suggest whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would not consider the possibility of making some arrangement in the direction proposed. He did not say that the right hon. Gentleman should accept the Amendment as it stood upon the Paper, but he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman could not frame some suggestion, at a later stage, to provide that when such transfers of powers took place as was proposed, some of the powers should be transferred to the District Authorities instead of the whole of them being transferred to the County Councils. It struck him that this proposal might meet with the approval of the hon. Member for Hanley, and at the same time bring into harmony the conflicting views of hon. Members.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said, he wished to add a few words in favour of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for

Hanley. He believed that if the Bill was carried without the Amendment it would do harm to the municipal life of the small boroughs. Many of these boroughs were very ancient, and they would be placed in a secondary position—as compared with the position they had held in the past—under the Bill as it at present stood, and he did not think that would be good for their municipal life. Moreover, the adoption of the clause without this Amendment would be a slur upon those boroughs which during the past few years had been created municipal boroughs, as they would be placed in a secondary in place of an independent position as regarded the County Authority. The clause, unless amended, would afford an obstacle to the creation of new municipalities in the future, as they would have to maintain their claim through the County Councils instead of through a Government Department. It was in the interests of independent local life, which he thought ought to be encouraged and fostered by every means in their power, that he strongly supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hanley. One of the best things in our local life from one end of England to the other had been the growing up of communities into independent centres of local self-government. He wanted that state of things to continue. He did not wish to see these boroughs interfered with, whether they were old or new, as he did not wish to see these places put in an inferior position to a Body which would very often be out of sympathy with them.

MR. WOODALL said, he should be very sorry to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division if he could avoid it; but he certainly, under the circumstances, felt bound to divide. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board could suggest anything to give effect to what he had understood him to imply—namely, that there might be the possibility of devising some method by which the municipal boroughs might have an option in the matter of going either to the County authority or to the Government authority.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was afraid it would be very inconvenient to have a dual control, but he had always said that when they came to consider the question of the transference of powers by means of Provisional Orders, he should be very glad to give full consideration to the suggestion made.

MR. WOODALL said, that the right hon. Gentleman would see that his Amendment proposed that whatever might be the powers given under the Provisional Orders to county authorities, the municipal boroughs should be exempted.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could not possibly accept that.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) asked, would the right hon. Gentleman consider the proposal of the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare)?

MR. RITCHIE: We give large powers of delegation from the County Council to the District Council?

MR. CONYBEARE asked whether it would not be possible, without putting the Committee to the trouble of a Division, to leave the matter so far open that when they came to discuss the matter of delegating these powers, they would still be in a position to discuss the question they were now discussing?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Hanley would not think it necessary to divide the Committee upon this Amendment. It had not received much support, and there seemed to be a great deal in what was said of the changed position effected by the Amendments in the clause.

MR. WOODALL: Perhaps the Government would prefer that we should report Progress?

MR. RITCHIE: Certainly not.

Question put, and negatived.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ACT.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I suppose I am right in assuming that as Monday was fixed for the debate on the Motion of which I have given Notice, by that time the Returns for which I asked before the Whitsuntide Recess and the other on the 1st of June will be produced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): With regard to the first, I am not sure whether I can give all the particulars for which the right hon. Gentleman has asked with regard to the sentences; but as to the other and more important Return, I have communicated to the authorities in Dublin, and I am glad to find it will be possible, without doubt, to have the Return in question in manuscript in the House on Monday, with the exception of the portion of it which relates to the county of Kerry. It may be possible, also, to include the county of Kerry, but I am not certain. I have telegraphed to Dublin and asked that, if possible, this Return should be put into print in Dublin, so that it may be brought before the House without delay. I may point out to the right hon. Gentleman that that is quite an unprecedented course to take, as all such Returns are invariably presented to the House in the first instance, and then ordered by the House to be printed; but I have taken the course I have indicated with the object of placing the information before the House as soon as possible.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: But Kerry is one of the most important scenes of the operation of the Act. Can the right hon. Gentleman not give me any particulars with reference to that county?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, I think I can give the right hon. Gentleman a very large number of particulars, but I cannot pledge myself to have the formal Return with regard to Kerry by Monday.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—JUDGMENTS IN THE KILLEAGH CASE—NOTES OF THE JUDGES' DECISION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) inquired whether the notes of the Judges' decision in the Exchequer Division with reference to the alleged conspiracy at Killeagh would be ready by Monday?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that he could not undertake without longer Notice to comply with the hon. and learned Gentleman's request, as it was unusual and would be inconvenient.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): We have put constant Questions on this subject for a week past. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman had full Notice. We want materials upon which to ask the opinion of the House with regard to these Resident Magistrates.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that the inquiry to which the question refers has only just finished. Therefore, the Question could not have been asked before.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) rose to put a further Question, but

It being Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—RESOLUTION.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College), in rising to move—

"That in the opinion of this House the Church of Scotland ought to be disestablished and disendowed," said, the question of Church Disestablishment differed in Scotland and in England in this material respect, that while the Church of England was in fact the Episcopal Church in England, the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was by no means synonymous with the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. It was, in fact, a mere fraction of it, and the connection between Church and State in Scotland had been the cause of every secession that had taken place within its ranks. Wholesale secessions had occurred, and a Presbyterian community had sprung up outside the walls of the Established Church essentially the same in doctrine, equal or greater in point of numbers, which was not behind the Established Church in material wealth and energy, which was perfectly efficient for the work of the country, and which, as a matter of fact, was carrying on the religious work of the country in the poorest districts in Scotland. So far from the present privileges and position of the Established Church having a tendency to bring about union in the different religious Bodies, it was admitted by the most far-seeing supporters of the Church—it was admitted, for example, by the Duke of Argyll—that nothing was so likely to bring about the union of the Presbyterian Bodies as Disestablishment. That opinion was held by the opponents of the Establishment. It was admitted on both sides that the present state of things could not last long in Scotland. Either Parliament itself must soon wake up to the inexpediency and injustice of the Establishment, the retention of whose privileges afforded a motive for a constant struggle against the sister institutions, or the Established Church would, by means of the State aid which it received, gradually weaken and undermine the great ecclesiastical edifice which had grown up by its aid. Among the Presbyterian communities the question of Disestablishment resolved itself into the question of whether the resources of the State, to which non-Churchmen as well as Churchmen had to contribute, should continually be applied to fostering the dependence of Presbyterianism on State aid; or whether, the connection between Church and State being severed, the principle of religious equality being practically recognized, and the property of the nation being applied to really national purposes, the Churches should be left to work out their own destiny in accordance with the spirit of the times. The statistics were disputed. On the one side the Established Church claimed a majority of the Presbyterian community—he did not think justly—and on the other side the Free and United Presbyterian Bodies claimed that they embraced a majority of the Presbyterian worshippers; but about this there was not the slightest doubt, that the Established Church did not embrace a majority or half of the population of Scotland. The highest claim advanced on behalf of the Established Church was only 46 per cent of the population. The number of places of worship maintained by the Established Church was over 100 less than those of other Presbyterian Churches, and about 1,000 less than those of the Nonconforming Bodies of Scotland. Now, he asked, why should this sect or section of the old creed continue not only this monopoly, but also be allowed to interfere in purely civil affairs at the present day? Why should it be allowed to control the Theological Chairs in the Universities; and why should its ministers enjoy any special immunity from taxation, or interfere through its Kirk Sessions with the constitution of Parochial Boards, to which were entrusted the incidence of the most important items of local taxation? It was in accordance with the spirit of the old times, when there was religious unanimity, that certain privileges should be conferred upon the Established Church. In those days it was held responsible for the poor, and for the morals of the people; but now a new state of matters had arisen. The Established Church had ceased to represent the community; it had ceased even to represent the Presbyterian community. Among a certain portion of the religious Bodies the connection between the Church and State was regarded as sinful and unscriptural, and conscientious objections were entertained to being compelled to contribute towards the maintenance of a State Church. A vast majority of the Free Churchmen considered that under existing circumstances the maintenance of the Established Church was unjust and inexpedient. The fact of the Free Church, which was favourable to the general principle of Establishments, having been compelled by force of circumstances to declare that the maintenance of an Established Church in Scotland was inexpedient and unjust, should be considered a testimony of enormous weight by the Members of this House. The indignation with which the Free Church had again and again resisted the pecuniary bribe of participation in the endowments to go over to the Establishment might be taken as a proof of the earnestness of conviction on the part of members of that Church. Of the two great Presbyterian Nonconforming Bodies in Scotland, one was dead against all connection between Church and State, and the other declared that in existing circumstances the maintenance of the connection was inexpedient and unjust, and besides those two Bodies there were a number of others who held precisely the same opinion—Baptists, Evangelical Unionists, Methodists, Congregationalists, and others—all of whom protested against the maintenance of the Establishment as unjust. Again, it was not a Church question only, but Disestablishment was becoming a great political question. With hardly an exception, resolutions in favour of Disestablishment had been adopted by every Liberal association throughout the country, and wherever there was a conference of delegates of those Liberal associations resolutions in favour of Disestablishment and Disendowment were adopted now as a matter of course. Coming to the question of endowments, it was not easy to give exact figures, because most of them had to be dug up from a whole mass of documents. The endowments of the Church of Scotland amounted to between £330,000 and £350,000 a-year, exclusive of a sum averaging £40,000 a-year which the Church received in the shape of an assessment for the maintenance and repair of Ecclesiastical buildings. The total amount received by the Established Church of Scotland in the shape of endowments was therefore less than £400,000 per annum, and that was a mere fraction of the revenues of the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, which amounted to about £1,750,000 sterling yearly. The endowments which the Church received from the State were from various sources. There was a sum of £17,000 got under Act of Parliament from the Consolidated Fund for the payment of stipends in the Highlands, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) himself a few nights before had admitted to be wasted. There was another portion of about £20,000 derived from local and burgh assessments, and he did not think the right of Parliament to deal with a Parliamentary grant which was being wasted could be questioned, or that its right to deal with local assessments would be contested. As to the sum received by the Church in the shape of assessments for the repair and maintenance of Ecclesiastical buildings, their hon. Friends opposite admitted the right of Parliament to deal with it, inasmuch as Bills had constantly been brought in relating to the subject. But the greater portion of the endowments of the Church was derived from tiends or tithes. Those, his opponents said, were the patrimony of the Church, and they stigmatized any proposal to divert those tiends to secular purposes as spoliation and robbery. He denied that in toto. These endowments from the tiends or tithes were national property, and Parliament had a perfect right, having regard to life interests, to direct them to whatever purpose it pleased. Indeed, he considered Parliament had infinitely more right to deal with those tiends than with Corporation funds, and with the private and recent endowments for educational and charitable purposes on which in the public interest it so constantly laid violent hands. But if his opponents would assert that there was any spoliation in the question, he would reply that the right of the Church of Scotland to these tiends was based entirely on spoliation. Tiends were not instituted by the Presbyterian Church, but by the Roman Catholic Church or the ancient Caledonian Church, and if there was any spoliation, it was practised on the Roman Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation. The Scottish Parliament treated those tiends or tithes as public funds, and for several years after Presbyterianism had superseded Roman Catholicism as the Church of Scotland, no provision for the maintenance of Presbyterian clergy out of tithes existed. Again and again, in the course of various Ecclesiastical revolutions in Scotland, those revenues had been diverted from the Presbyterian Church as the national Church of the country and oscillated between Presbyterianism and Episcopacy. He contended that these tithes were purely national property, that the application of them to a single sect was unjust and inexpedient, because it afforded a lever for the injury of other Bodies who taught the same religion, and who were equally able to provide for the spiritual wants of the people. He maintained, also, that these endowments were unnecessary in the interests of Presbyterianism, because they constituted so small a fraction of the revenues of the Presbyterian religion that their withdrawal would not seriously affect it. He believed one effect of their withdrawal would be to bring about a re-union in the Churches, and effect a saving in the working expenses that would compensate for any immediate inconvenience. It was the principle of Disestablishment and Disendowment that he and those who supported him wished to vote in favour of. They had no wish to interfere with life interests, or to imitate the policy which the Church of Scotland itself, controlled by the State, was obliged to adopt in dealing with the people who seceded from it, and whom it sent forth to the world stripped of all their ecclesiastical property. He considered the present system unjust and inexpedient, and proposed another system which was just and expedient. He proposed that the application of the money shall be to some national object. It was calculated that the money would be more than sufficient to meet local charges for education throughout the country, and sufficient in many Highland parishes to provide a satisfactory solution for the crofter question. As to the destination of the funds, however, that was matter for subsequent deliberation. Meanwhile, he wished the House to affirm the principle that the endowments of the Church of Scotland should be put an end to. The position of the Church of Scotland had ceased to be what it was 20 years ago. Its members had adopted an aggressive attitude, and that was the reason why Disestablishment was demanded. The Patronage Act was the first step in this policy of aggression. [Cries of "No!"] Was it not the passing of the Patronage Act that preceded the action of the Free Church in regard to Disestablishment? Since then the aggressive policy of the Church and its friends had been steadily continued. Only two Sessions ago a measure was introduced by the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) which was intended to withdraw from the Free Church community into the Establishment a number of Highland congregations. Then his hon. Friend (Mr. J. A. Campbell) had on the Paper a Bill which all the Nonconformists of Scotland regarded as a measure to strengthen the Established Church of Scotland at the expense of the Free Church. Moreover, there had that very day been brought forward by a noble Lord in "another place" a resolution to make the Established Church a really National Church, by allowing all Protestant ratepayers to vote in the election of her ministers. There were four Amendments on the Paper against the Motion. The first was by the hon. Member for the Central Division of Glasgow (Mr. Baird), the second by the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell), and the third by the hon. Member for St. Andrew's (Mr. Anstruther). The hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell), in his Amendment, introduced the Treaty of Union, but, so far as regarded the Church of Scotland, the Treaty of Union was irreparably broken—almost before the ink on it was dry—by the passing of the Act of Queen Anne which re-imposed lay patronage on the Church of Scotland. The Free Church, which now proclaimed the maintenance of an Establishment to be inexpedient and unjust, could advance the very best title to being the real heir of the pre-Union Church of Scotland. He (Dr. Cameron) did not propose any measure for the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, but simply proposed a Resolution which would afford means for the Representatives of the people of Scotland in the most authoritative and Constitutional manner to declare their wishes upon the subject. He had moved the same Resolution in the last Parliament, and had been defeated by a large majority, but in the minority were a considerable majority of the Scotch Members, and a very large majority of the Scotch Liberal Members. Including those who afterwards became Unionists, they were three to one in favour of the Motion, and exclusive of those Gentlemen they were seven to one. In 1877 it was evident that in consequence of the Patronage Act the question of Disestablishment and Disendowment in Scotland would become an active and burning question. That was prophesied by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who said that the attempt that had been made to buy out piecemeal what had been driven out wholesale would produce that effect. When the official Leader of the Liberal Party—the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington)—made a speech at Glasgow embodying the policy of the Liberal Party on the subject of Disestablishment, he declared that whenever Scottish opinion, or even Scottish Liberal opinion, was fully formed on this question, he would venture to say that the Liberal Party as a whole would be prepared to deal with the question on its merits without reference to any other consideration. To that declaration the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had repeatedly expressed his adhesion. The subject had been kept back for years,—first, because the county franchise question took the lead; and, secondly, at the Elections since another important question had been paramount. There were no longer any reasons which made it expedient to suppress this question, and the time had now come when he called upon the Leaders of the Liberal Party to give effect to the promises that for 10 years had been dangled before the eyes of the Scottish people, their most zealous supporters. He believed that on this occasion he should not appeal to them in vain to redeem their pledges. In October the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a speech at Nottingham, in which he referred at considerable length to the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales and Scotland. He declared that the question stood in the first rank of legislative urgency, and repeated his declaration that it ought to be dealt with in accordance with the views of the Scottish people. He further said that if Scotland sent as good a body of Home Rulers to Parliament as Wales, the question of Disestablishment in Scotland would take priority, because Scotland would be able to hold her own. [Laughter.] The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had great power of laughter; but he did not laugh when he heard the news of the Ayr Burghs Election, and he knew the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would recognize that every seat that has been won by his Supporters in Scotland since the split in the Liberal Party had been won in every single case by men favourable to Disestablishment. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman and the Leaders of the Liberal Party of the Scottish proverb, “Giff-gaff makes guid friends;” and that the obvious corollary of the proposition laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was, that if he would strengthen the Liberal ranks from Scotland and the Party he led, he must give a proof of the practical nature of the belief which he had expressed on behalf of himself and his Friends that this question was now ripe for decision. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) in seconding the Resolution, said, it might not be inappropriate, as the Motion had been proposed by the Representative of a large city constituency, that he, as representing one of the large county constituencies in the North-East of Scotland, should second it. His hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron), he thought, had made out his case for Disestablishment, and they would look to the other side to make out a case for the continuance of religious inequality in Scotland. The hon. Member for the Central Division of Glasgow (Mr. Baird) had put an Amendment on the Paper which in plain language said that the Motion tended to irreligion and immorality. He (Mr. Esslemont) need not say that, as a Presbyterian and a loyal adherent of the same Confession of Faith as the hon. Gentleman, if he thought the Motion had a tendency to irreligion and immorality, he should be the last person in the world to preach the doctrine of Disestablishment. The hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell), who also had an Amendment on the Paper, objected to the Motion, because the position of the Church of Scotland did not warrant them in interfering. He (Mr. Esslemont) had never, in the discussion of the subject, made comparisons with Churchmen, and he was willing to admit, having been connected with the Presbyterian Church for nearly 40 years, that during the most of that time the Church of Scotland had been growing in activity and in vigour in the great work of religion throughout Scotland. But why should they not interfere with that temporal question of Disestablishment and Disendowment? The Church of Scotland was established for three purposes. Its first duty, he admitted, was to look after the religion of the people; but there were two other duties reposed in it under the old parochial system. The first of these was the charge of the poor; but that duty had long ago been consigned to the tender mercies of the ratepayers. The second was the education of the young; but that also had been removed from the hands of the Church; and he challenged any of the champions of the Church to say that the Education Act had not been, in the main, a great benefit to Scotland. Therefore, two of the elementary functions of the Church of Scotland had been disposed of, and the question they had to consider was, whether the time was not come when the endowments of the Church should be distributed over an area which would be useful to the whole community, instead of confining them any longer to the upholding of what was merely a section of the Church. It had been said that the people of Scotland did not wish their Established Church to be interfered with; but how could the minds of the people of Scotland upon this point be ascertained? The question had been brought prominently before the minds of the Scotch electors during recent elections, and the people had declared themselves either in favour of or against Disestablishment and Disendowment, and it was notorious that the largest portion of those returned were in favour of religious equality. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the St. Andrew's Burghs (Mr. Anstruther) had said in his Amendment that they ought not to apply this money for secular purposes. It was a new doctrine that money which belonged to the public might not be applied for any purpose which the country thought best deserving of support. Many people argued, and it was a favourite assertion of those who were opposed to him upon the question, that the supporters of Disestablishment were in favour of taking away a certain patrimony from the people of Scotland. He thought it only required a very elementary consideration of the question to lead one to the conclusion that neither he nor anyone else proposed to do anything of the kind. Not one farthing of this money would be lost to the people of Scotland. He asked merely whether the time had not come when they might apply it for a universal purpose, in which every parishioner would have an equal share. The proposition of the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell) was somewhat contradictory. The hon. Member first said that the Imperial Parliament could not interfere, and then he said that the Imperial Parliament ought to interfere as soon as the people of Scotland told it do so. He left the hon. Member on the horns of the dilemma. There either ought to be home rule on this question, or there ought not. He would make the friends of the Established Church a present of the fact which they put forward, that they were in a large majority in Scotland. In that case, on account of their power and their numbers, they ought to be the more ashamed to take from their Roman Catholic brethren, their Episcopalian brethren, and those who differed from them, the money to support their religion. In the county he represented, there were in many of the parishes one endowed Church and two other Churches belonging to the same denomination, which were neither endowed nor established. These were chapels of ease. Did this great Established Church of Scotland hold to its principles? No; it did not. In not one of those parishes did the old Church seek to divide its loaves and fishes with the others. The whole endowment was kept to the one Church, while the others were allowed to find the means of grace in voluntary subscriptions. Yet this Church, which they were told existed on endowments, really raised as much by voluntary subscriptions as it did from endowments. He did not wish to raise the sectarian question. He was content to rest himself on the political aspects of this question, and he was obliged, in accordance with principles which he had always held, to say that they should no longer withhold from the people in the country a share in the administration of funds to which they had an equal right. He had much pleasure in seconding the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the Church of Scotland ought to be disestablished and disendowed,"—(Dr Cameron,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central), who had given Notice of the following Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of Scotland would be contrary to the interests of religion and the moral welfare of the people, and this House therefore declines to entertain the proposal," said, since he had given the Notice he had been given to understand that the Rules of the House precluded him from moving the Amendment, and that nothing remained for him but to meet the original Resolution with a direct negative, seeing that the Division would take place on the Question that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair. He was perfectly satisfied with that. His only wish was that the question should be properly and adequately debated, and that a Division should be taken upon it. The hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) asked the House to agree that the Church of Scotland should be Disestablished and Disendowed. It was the desire of the hon. Gentleman that his proposition should be carried out to its logical conclusion at as early a date as possible. The idea was evidently intended to be conveyed to the electors, that if they would only return a sufficient majority to Parliament they might look forward to the Disestablishment of their national Church. He (Mr. Baird) did not think such a great question as the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland ought to stand on such a footing. It ought to stand by itself and be judged on its own merits, and its fate should be decided apart from any other consideration whatever. It had been suggested on high authority, expressed in many quarters, that the matter should be left entirely to the people of Scotland—that if they decided that Disestablishment should take place, then there was nothing more to be said. He agreed with that opinion to a certain extent. He believed that when the people of Scotland had fully made up their minds that the Church should be Disestablished and Disendowed, it would then take place. But what he wanted to know was, how were they going to gauge the opinion of the people of Scotland? They might endeavour to make it a test question at the General Election; but he thought every Member of the House would admit that it would be utterly impossible to separate such a question as Disestablishment from the thousand and one questions which agitated the minds of the electors at such a time. They could not avoid mixing it up with the Land Question or the Drink Question, and say they had a decision on Disestablishment. A plebisite is sometimes mentioned in this connection, a sort of glorified local option, in fact; and possibly the machinery provided by the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) would be brought into operation for the purpose. They would then see, not whether the people would abolish public-houses, but whether they would abolish what was one of the greatest enemies to drunkenness. It was often said that the people of Scotland were Radical; but upon some questions he claimed they were the most Conservative people on the face of the earth, and, if this question were put to them fairly and unobscured by other questions, he believed they would display a Conservatism which would be absolutely shocking to many hon. Members opposite. The fact was, the Scotch people had not been consulted on the matter at all. It was said the other night that Scotch opinion was overborne in that House; but as for this being the voice of the country, he would only like hon. Members to go down to their constituencies and take their stand on the single platform of the Disestablishment of the Church, and they would soon see whether the statement that the voice of Scotland, which hon. Members said was to be overborne to-night, was a true one or not. That question of Disestablishment, involving as it did separation from the State, was one on which the English Members were perfectly entitled to give their opinion. He should be glad if the hon. Member for the College Division would bring in a Bill formulating in plain language his proposals, and he should like to appear on the back of it some names he could mention. A few years ago a Bill was brought in by Mr. Dick Peddie, which was one of the wildest ever brought from the Bar to the Table of the House, and it contained proposals so revolting to the people of Scotland, that he was absolutely inundated with Petitions against it. That Bill was dead and buried, and he did not think it would ever be resuscitated. On the back of that Bill appeared the name of the hon. Member for the College Division, but that was no reason why the hon. Gentleman should not introduce a Bill on his own behalf. Many of the hon. Members who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) upon general questions of policy, he believed, would be very much inclined to withdraw their support, and no one knew that better than the right hon. Gentleman himself. In 1885, when the question of Disestablishment was brought forward, a great agitation was raised against it by the Liberals, and at the last moment the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the subject, finding he had made a mistake, and the election proceeded on other questions. He (Mr. Baird) deprecated the idea that the support of the Church devolved entirely on the Conservative Party. There was no one who was acquainted with the history of Scotland who did not know that since the secession of the Free Church in 1843, the Church had made up much of her lost ground, and had greatly recovered from the severe blow then dealt her; but that was no argument, although often used, why she should be dealt another blow in the shape of Disestablishment and Disendowment. Although much of the lost ground had been made up, there was still a large field for her exertions, and any measure that might arrest the development of the Church, such as Disestablishment, was contrary to the religious and moral welfare of the people of Scotland. He was not going into the question whether these endowments were national property or not, but in this connection he would like to point out that the Church itself was the property of the nation, and was free to all. There was nothing to prevent any man—whether United Presbyterian, Free Church, Roman Catholic, or Atheist—from going into the Church and partaking in its services. He maintained that the Church of Scotland outnumbered, by a large majority, the communities of the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church, and it outnumbered all the other Churches, including the Episcopalian and the Roman Catholic Churches, by over 60,000, and he believed it would be shown that the accommodation provided by the Nonconformist Bodies was very small in comparison with that provided by the Established Church. The argument as to the voluntary offerings of the Established Church being smaller than those of the Free, was a purely commercial one. It was treating the Churches as if they were great Railway Companies competing against one another. In order to obtain a true comparison as to the liberality of the two Churches, the amount of private income of the individual members had to be taken into consideration. The true test of the value of a Church was not the amount of money it gave, but the amount of good it did. It had been said that Disestablishment would lead to a union of the Churches; but he scouted the idea, and wanted to know whether, if the Church was Disestablished, it was at all likely to rush into the arms of the Nonconformists? Suppose one brother fell out with another, was it likely that union would be promoted by one brother giving the other a blow in the face? The Church of Scotland was a progressive Church. Parliamentary Returns in 1874 showed that the number of communicants in the Church of Scotland was 460,000, in 1878 they numbered 515,000, and by the Parliamentary Return for 1884 the number had still further increased to 555,622. Since 1843, the year of the Disruption, 352 new parish churches had been erected, and nearly £2,000,000 had been spent in building churches and manses and in endowing churches. In conclusion, he said that the Established Church had made enormous strides of late years, and was still growing. It had great influence amongst the people of Scotland, and no one who loved his country could look unconcernedly at a blow directed against the Church, which, if effectual, they believed would do serious damage to the best interests of the people of Scotland.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) said, he desired to congratulate the hon. Gentlemen the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution on the direct character of the Motion they supported. He, for one, greatly preferred an honest, upright, straightforward opponent to one who shilly-shallied and beat about the bush; and to those who pursued such tactics, he would say that even on the lowest ground, the ground of expediency, it was hardly a paying policy to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. He did not think the hounds cared much for those who hunted along with them and yet were continually trying to throw them off the scent, while, on the other hand, the hare did not care very much for even the sweetest scent of those who ran along with it, because in that sweetness was always a nasty taint of red currant jelly. Those who were conscientiously in favour of the maintenance of the connection between Religion and the State had good reason to congratulate themselves upon the progress their cause was making, and the way in which Disestablishment was more and more going into the background of late years. In proof of this he would call a witness who could hardly be said to be favourably inclined towards the Church—namely, the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) himself. That hon. Member, in 1885, before the General Election, gave Notice of a Motion which stood in the Order Book of the House of Commons for the next Session, as follows:—

Now the hon. Member brought forward a Motion upon the same subject, but omitted from it the word “forthwith.” That was to say, that the General Election of 1885 killed the word “forthwith.” [Laughter.] Surely the omission of that important word showed that between 1885 and the present time popular opinion in Scotland on the subject of Disestablishment had undergone a marked change. To prove that the cause of Disestablishment was losing ground he would call another hostile witness—the evidence of friendly witnesses not being nearly as telling—to testify that in 1884 it was nothing like so ripe as it was in 1874. Mr. Anderson, then Member for Glasgow—no relation, he believed, of the hon. Gentleman who at present represented the counties of Elgin and Nairn—Mr. Anderson speaking in that House, on 11th June, 1884, said—

“He had always voted for Church Disestablishment as a matter of justice. . . . He looked on that question from that point of view, and yet he was bound to say that in Scotland the question of Disestablishment was less ripe for solution now than it was 10 years ago. It was, he believed, a riper question in England, and certainly in Wales, than in Scotland. For one thing, Dissent had been under no social ban in Scotland. . . . There were other reasons which his hon. Friend very fairly pointed out—grievances in England and Wales—which did not apply to Scotland. A proof that the question was less ripe now than 10 years ago he gathered from his own constituency. His constituency was, to a large extent, for Disestablishment, and had always been so. Ten years ago he or his Colleague, or any Member of Parliament, could have got a bumper meeting in the largest hall in Glasgow in support of a Disestablishment Resolution. But about two years ago several prominent Liberationist M.P.'s went down to Glasgow and convened a meeting, and though they had the assistance of his hon. Friend and Colleague (Dr. Cameron) they could get nothing more than a half-filled hall. That was a very significant fact indeed.”—(3 Hansard, [289] 41-2.)

The Motion before the House was a mere abstract Resolution; but four years ago the advocates of Disestablishment went the length of introducing a definite proposal in a Bill. The Bill of Mr. Dick Peddie, he would remind his hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow, was a Bill bristling with Compensation Clauses. The landlord, the heritor, the minister, and the clerk were to be compensated; in fact, everybody was to be compensated except the poor man who was to be deprived of the Church which was his birthright. It had been said that the Scottish people were enthusiastically in favour of such a measure; but, if so, that enthusiasm was shown in a somewhat strange and curious manner. On the back of that Bill appeared five names. The first was that of Mr. Dick Peddie. They all knew what happened to him. He was defeated for the Kilmarnock Burghs, in spite of a speech delivered for him by his hon. Friend the Member for the College Division, and he retired into private life. The next name was that of Mr. Webster, then Member for Aberdeen; he also had retired into private life. The middle name was that of his hon. Friend the Member for the College Division. The fourth name was that of Mr. Henderson, then Member for Dundee, who had retired into private life; and the fifth name was that of Mr. C. B. Bright M'Laren, who was recently defeated for the Borough of Stafford. He might, therefore, apply to his hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow the words—

All its lovely companions are faded and gone.”

Now, to what was the miraculous escape of the hon. Member for the College Division due? It might have been due to good luck or it might have been due to good management. To good luck, inasmuch as his was the middle name of the five, and there was an old Latin saying which ran—" In medio tutissimus ibis." But more probably it was owing to good management. Yes; good management, which consisted in the hon. Member repudiating every line of the very Bill on the back of which his name appeared. He would remind his hon. Friend that he was quite an old enough "Parliamentary hand" to know that it was just as dangerous a matter to put one's name on the back of a Bill in a political sense as it was to put one's name on the back of a bill in private life. There were responsibilities which one incurred in these circumstances which one could not shirk. The only way in which his hon. Friend could escape from the difficulty of the responsibility which faced him in connection with Mr. Dick Peddie's Bill was by saying that it was a Disestablishment Bill, and he did not like it to go forward without having a finger in it.

DR. CAMERON said, he never repudiated any responsibility which he had ever incurred for the Bill. He approved of the principle of the Bill; but as for the details, he did not either suggest or draft them.

MR. HOZIER said, exactly so; his hon. Friend backed a blank Bill as a matter of form, which entailed unpleasant responsibilities in political just as in private life. Whatever they might say with regard to this question, there was no doubt Mr. Dick Peddie's Bill held the field as far as any regular measure was concerned. It had never been superseded by any other scheme; and he would put it to any candid Scotsman whether it was not still more unpopular than any other measure ever presented to a country? They would be told that the votes of the majority of the Scotch Members would show the feeling of the majority of the Scotch people on the subject of Disestablishment. He emphatically denied that, whichever way the majority went. [Cheers and laughter.] He observed that the jeers came only from the Irish Members, who could hardly be expected to know much about the subject. The question of Disestablishment was by no means a test question either in 1885 or in 1886. What was Lord Rosebery's opinion? Whatever might be said for or against Lord Rosebery, no one would deny that he was the most admirable electioneering agent any candidate could wish, and one to whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was deeply indebted. In a letter to Dr. Hutton, dated Mentmore, September 3, 1885, he said—

"I do not agree with you that the moment has come for making the disestablishment of the Church of Scotland an indispensable part of the Liberal programme. I do not believe that the country is ripe for it, while I suspect the main result of raising it would be to further Conservative prospects in the coming election. If the people of Scotland wish for disestablishment, nothing can prevent its becoming a test question; if the people of Scotland do not wish for it, nothing can make it one. To my mind, the main issue to be fought at those elections is whether the country is to be ruled for the next six years by Liberal or Conservative methods, to which all other controversies are subordinate."

That was to say, Disestablishment was subordinate to the question of who was to sit on the Government Bench or on the other side. Moreover, a very important statement had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) on the subject which he (Mr. Hozier) did not think had been quoted at all. In the authorized edition of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, delivered on November 11, 1885, in the Free Assembly Hall, Edinburgh, the right hon. Gentleman said, with regard to Dr. Cameron's Resolution—

"Gentlemen, I think the second question put to me is whether I should accept Dr. Cameron's resolution as conclusively conveying the opinion of the people of Scotland. In my opinion, gentlemen, we are not now speaking of the next Parliament. It is agreed we are now speaking, not of the next Parliament, but of the Parliament after it. Would that resolution be a binding resolution, accepted as conclusive with regard to the possible opinion of the people of Scotland on the question by the Parliament after the next? I tell you fairly no such resolution could be accepted as conclusive of the opinion of Scotland. It would require a long series of such resolutions, probably for a considerable time, to give that solidity to a declaration of that sort that would justify Parliament in so regarding it. We will take the supposition either way. Let us suppose that in this election the Church question is made a test question, and that Dr. Cameron's resolution was carried by a majority of Scottish Members. Well, people would very naturally say this. They would say an election carried upon this question as a test question is not a fair indication of the opinion of the people of Scotland on the subject, because the candidate who has voted for it has done so in consequence of the pressure brought to bear upon him at the election, and from the particular position of parties in his constituency it would be more in his interest to go in that direction than in the other direction. That is very unsafe ground to stand upon, and Parliament would be very slow to recognize it. But let us suppose, on the other side, that it is not made a test question. Well, then, if our view were to prevail, and if I am right in saying that every Liberal voter ought to support a competent Liberal candidate at this election, whatever be his opinion on the Church question, then, of course, no such resolution could be accepted as conclusive, because, as I have said, men were elected on general grounds of Liberalism, and were not elected on the Church question."

He defied anyone to say that the Church Question was a test question in 1886 any more than in 1885. He himself spoke with a free hand, because he was for the Church both in 1885 and in 1886. His opponent, Lord Hamilton of Dalzell, shilly-shallied in 1885, and said he would not vote either way. Lord Hamilton defeated him by shilly-shallying. But the electors found him out, and in 1886 he (Mr. Hozier) beat him, although Lord Hamilton then threw in the extra bait of Disestablishment. Coming now to the Church of Scotland itself, he would emphatically affirm, without fear of contradiction, that it was universally respected and beloved even by those outside it. He would quote the testimony of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) who was strongly opposed to an Established Church. Speaking in the House of Commons, on March 30, 1886, the hon. Member said—

"In Scotland the Established Church is in doctrinal unity with the leading non-Established Churches. It was not an alien Church representing a hostile creed. It is the old Church, which at one time embraced within its fold the entire Presbyterian community in Scotland. It is a Church that was regarded, even by those who did not belong to it, without the smallest particle of anything like animosity. Its clergy are a hard-working and learned body of men, whose emoluments did not err on the side of excess, and it was not encumbered with overpaid and underworked dignitaries. All its clergy meet on a footing of democratic equality, and its laity, equally with its clergy, shared in the government of the Church. Its history every Scotchman can read with pride.

This was strong evidence in favour of the Establishment. He could not do better, in conclusion, than give the testimony of the late Mr. Forster, the son of a Nonconformist and brought up in the strictest tenets of Nonconformity.

Mr. Hozier

On January 5, 1878, at Bradford, Mr. Forster used these remarkable words—

"Not only at present is it the business of the clergy of the Established Church to care for their parishioners, but these parishioners know that it is their business. There is not a man or woman among them, no matter how poor or degraded, who, when sick or sorrowful, or sore beset by the troubles of this life, has not a right to go to their parish clergyman and to ask him, 'What have you to tell me about that better life which is to come.' Now, I am not prepared to take this right from these men and women, and I am all the less prepared to do so because I know that vast numbers of the dwellers in these cottage hovels and in these city cellars go neither to the parish church nor to any church or chapel; but they know, and I wish them to continue to know, that they may ask for the religious help of their minister of religion—not because they are members of this or that congregation, but simply because they are Britons."

He entirely concurred in those words. Therefore, he cordially supported the Auld Kirk of Scotland. He firmly believed in the infinite wisdom of the text which said—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." It was because the Church of Scotland had been proved, because it had been proved and not found wanting, that he had so much pleasure in supporting it. It was a Church which, in his opinion, secured that in the very poorest districts, quite as much as in the richest, and in times of apathy no less than in times of enthusiasm, there should be that constant maintenance of religious ministrations which was so necessary to the welfare of the people. In these circumstances, he for one would not venture, and he earnestly trusted that the House would not venture, to do anything towards depreciating or minimizing an influence which, whatever its opponents might say—and, goodness knows, opponents would say almost anything—had done and was doing an enormous amount of good.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.) said, he was unable to come to the same conclusion as his hon. Friend (Mr. Hozier). The question had been agitated in Scotland for a considerable time, and he believed it was now ripe for a settlement. It never would be any riper, for the time had come when the conditions that ought to precede the settlement of that or any question had occurred, and every condition precedent to a settlement was now realized. He freely admitted that the discussion had, on all hands, been conducted with good temper and good feeling. He was unable to agree with his hon. Friend's (Mr. Baird's) Amendment, or with the reasons by which he supported it. At the same time, he agreed with the hon. Member that this question ought not to be mixed up with any other question. He (Mr. Shiress Will) believed no section of the House desired to mix the question up with any other question in the political programme. It should be judged upon its merits, and if it had any demerits, it ought to be condemned for them, and not for the demerits of any other question. His hon. Friend (Mr. Baird) said the proper time for dealing with the question would be when the people of Scotland had fully made up their minds upon it. But how were they to know that, except through the voice of the Representatives of the people in that House? Statistics had been widely circulated on both sides of the question, and had been fully dealt with by his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron); but he did not care whether the number of communicants was slightly larger on one side or the other. The time had gone by for counting heads. The question had been so well considered and so thoroughly argued, and was so well understood in Scotland, that it made no difference whatever, whether they had a few figures more on one side of the question than on the other. Then the Mover of the Amendment and his hon. Friend who had just sat down had treated the question as if the Resolution committed those who supported it to an approval of Mr. Dick Peddie's Bill. But he thought a very large number of those in favour of solving the question before the House in the way proposed in the Resolution disagreed with the details of Mr. Dick Peddie's Bill. He (Mr. Shiress Will) disagreed with the details of it. If such a Bill were again put before the constituencies of Scotland, while the great bulk of the people would approve of the general principle of the measure, yet they would be distinctly in favour of dealing in a more generous and gentle way with the great interests concerned in the matter. It was further said that they ought not to make this a Party question; but it was impossible to treat this great and important matter otherwise than as a Party question, although he admitted it was one that should be dealt with with extreme care and caution. Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not hold out any hope that they would join in settling the question, and if it was not to be treated as a Party question, he was at a loss to know how they could deal with the subject. His hon. Friend had said that there was not much enthusiasm on the subject, and that it had not been made a test subject at the last Election. That was correct up to a certain point, because, while in some constituencies it was not a test question, in others it distinctly was. Then his hon. Friend went on to show how he had defeated his Liberal opponent by being firm and consistent in the expression of his views on the Church. The Member for the Central Division of Glasgow had threatened the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian with the loss of many votes if he took up this question. The answer to that was, that at the end of 1885 the delegates from the Liberal Associations throughout the whole of Scotland met at Perth and came to the conclusion—

"That the time had now come for making Disestablishment a plank in the Liberal platform, and that the question should be dealt with in a fair and generous spirit at the earliest opportunity."

But, he would remind the Gentlemen who had spoken on the other side of the House that the claim of other Churches in Scotland to the endowments now enjoyed by the Established Church could not be lightly passed over. What was the claim of the other two great Presbyterian Bodies in Scotland in regard to endowments? When the bodies now united under the name of the United Presbyterians left the Church of Scotland, they did so because they conscientiously believed that it was wrong to depend upon State connection and control. And when the Free Church in 1843 went out, it was also on the question of State control and the question of patronage. But when those Bodies went out, they still left behind them their claims on the national funds, which were being administered by the Body to which they had previously belonged. These funds contemplated the helping of the poor and the promotion of education, as well as the ministrations of religion. Therefore, it was but just and right that they should be allowed to urge the claim that those national funds should now be utilized for the benefit of the whole community at large. That matter could only be settled in one way, and the sooner it was settled the better it would be for the peace and harmony of those different Bodies which were, after all, brethren, and the better also for the best interests of the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute) said, that the observations of the last speaker had accentuated the statement made in the early part of the debate that the proposition before the House related to the present time and not to any remote or indefinite period. But there had been a remarkable abstention on the part of hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on the opposite side from the discussion of the practical question raised by such a proposal, whether it was in the interests of popular utility in Scotland now that such a change as that should be carried out. The speech of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) almost compelled comparison with some previous statements that had been made on the same subject and from the same quarter; and he thought that those who had heard that hon. Member that evening, and also those who had heard or read his former speeches, would agree with him that his speech that night was a more attenuated exposition of the subject than the House had ever yet listened to. The range of argument, and even illustration, had been greatly narrowed; and, positively, the question of Disestablishment had been treated merely on the footing of certain excrescences upon the existing Establishment, such as that of members of the Established Church having seats on Parochial Boards for the administration of the Poor Law. The hon. Gentleman had not discussed that subject at great length, perhaps, because he thought the House was so familiar with it; but if he deemed it right to propound so momentous a change as his Resolution contemplated, the House were entitled to measure the degree of urgency and the expediency of his proposals by the scale of the reasons he had assigned for them. One view of the question of Church Establishments was that the establishment of religion in any country was abnormal, and that it was not the province of the State to provide religious endowments, but that they should be left entirely to voluntary effort. If that were the proposition on which the hon. Gentleman invited the judgment of the House now, the debate would not range over more than one or two subjects of discussion. The hon. Gentleman had only to formulate his conscientious scruple and to find out how many Members in the House there were who shared it. But the matter in discussion was not and could not be limited to so very abstract and meagre a thesis. The subject necessarily led up to the question of whether the popular welfare and general good of Scotland were promoted by the Establishment which now existed; and it was impossible to disregard the various circumstances, historical and otherwise, which distinguished Scotland from other countries as far as that matter was concerned. The hon. Member had mentioned rather than argued the invidious position in which Establishment placed a Church. He could only say, if the hon. Gentleman took the instances he had given as mere illustrations of his arguments, that they might do away with the position of ministers of the Established Church at Parochial Boards, because the essence of the question of establishment did not lie in any accidental arrangement of that kind. It was, therefore, a mere ad captandum argument to introduce such a reference to the precedence of ministers of the Establishment in such a debate. When the hon. Member passed to the question of disendowment, there was not observable a much increased scale of liberality in his method of discussion. But he would glance at the arguments which the hon. Member had used, which were three in number. In the first place, the hon. Member said that the possession of endowments by the Church of Scotland was an injustice to the other Churches. Now, he could not himself understand or at all fathom what was meant by that. The endowments were held for the ministrations of religion in Scotland to as many people as they would enable the ministers to reach. Was it an injustice to other religious bodies that this Church should have money ready in hand while the other Churches had to go and search for it? ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; if it was merely a question of envy or personal jealousy.

Mr. Shiress Will

But there was no injustice if the fact of there being those endowments meant merely an increment of spiritual means for the general welfare of the country; and it was because hon. Gentlemen persistently separated the question of personal prestigs and jealousy of ministers from the question of the whole welfare of the people that the House had heard those unfortunate references to ignoble subjects of mere ecclesiastical and sectarian rivalry. The hon. Gentleman also objected to the endowments because they were unnecessary. Did he mean that the endowments were unnecessary in order to enable the aggregate body of ministers in the country to overtake the spiritual necessities of the people? If he did, the hon. Member would find the opposite asserted by all his clients in the Nonconformist Body. Then the hon. Gentleman asserted that disendowment would promote reunion. He confessed he was unable to see how the question of reunion entered into the question of disendowment. Did the hon. Gentleman believe that it would promote reunion to have less money as a basis for their common operations, or did it mean anything else than that they should make a sacrifice of the endowments to the envy of those who had not? The hon. Gentleman had made no substantive proposals as to the application of the funds set free by disendowment. He did not understand an argument on that subject which did not consider the relative advantages and disadvantages of the old use of that money and the new. They had a right to know, before they assented to the negative side of this proposition, what was the positive proposal. They were there to do their best for the people of Scotland. He asserted that the vast majority of the people of Scotland believed that the best use of the endowments which could be made was that which was made of them at present. But if anyone gainsaid that assertion he ought to be able to show where was the other object of popular utility of competing importance and necessity which was to absorb the endowments. Abstract discussions about Disestablishment and Disendowment revealed the fact that the main interest, which was that of the people, was being lost sight of in order that they might pursue the interests of ecclesiastical rivalry to the verge of caricature. In a question of this kind he did not defend the existence of Establishment and endowment in Scotland on any dilatory pleas, upon mere prescription, upon mere grounds of Conservatism. He took the positive and firmer position, and said that it would be an injustice to the Church to rest her claim to the continuance of present rights and endowments upon anything short of this. He asserted that the answer to the question, what is the mind of the people of Scotland upon this subject, was to be found in the history of the last 40 years. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), and those who acted with him in politics, had always been seeking for a sign. The right hon. Gentleman and his supporters were extremely anxious that the mind of the Scottish people should be made clear on the subject. Let them find the deliberate, growing, and emphatic preference of the people of Scotland during the last 40 years in the growing strength of the Established Church. It was in the historical development of national convictions during the last 40 years, and not in snap majorities, or in managed elections—it was there hon. Members would find the deliberate, permanent, and reliable voice of the people. Hon. Gentleman opposite had said nothing more about statistics on this question, except that they would not weary the patience of the House. There had been times when questions of Disestablishment had been raised, and when statistics were considered to be highly relative and germane to the subject. When they found that the statistics now proved the increasing strength of the Church in membership and in contributions, in its energy and aggressiveness against evil, then he thought that the Church of Scotland had a right to point to the voice of the people as distinguishing its claim to continue in the position assigned to her by the historical decision of the people, and also by the increasing loyalty of all classes. He would not dwell on the figures, because they were not controverted. Let them take any period they chose—10, 20, 30, or 40 years—the progress had been all one way. The Church of Scotland had been growing—that was the increasing testimony of history; and he said it, but not invidiously, that the relative strength of the denominations had been lessened. But another point had been raised. The

hon. Gentleman said that the Church of Scotland had brought this attack upon herself because she had adopted a policy of aggression. Yes; a policy of aggression, because every ecclesiastical Body which existed was aggressive. The Church of Scotland was aggressive if by that was meant that she sought to do away with limitations and asked for the relaxation of privileges and rights which might trench upon the scope of her activity. And here he found a proof that the objection of hon. Gentlemen to the Established Church of Scotland was that the tide was rising on her side, and that they must make haste or they would be too late. If the policy of the Church of Scotland had been directed to an increase of privileges, or if it had been a policy of inertness, then he could understand this attack. But her policy had been the exact reverse. She did not ask for an increase of privileges. She asked for power to do away with abuses, and for means to set forth her own claims as tested by the voice of her own people. Therefore, he could not assent to the view that the measures proposed from the other side were proper methods of retaliation upon the aggressiveness of the dominant Church. The Church of Scotland had endeavoured to fulfil the duties which a State Church had necessarily to discharge. The hon. Member referred to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay). That Bill was a testimony to the desire of the Church to do away with all causes of division, and to bring within her borders those who historically belonged to her. It was impossible to discuss this subject without referring to the speeches of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) and the hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs (Mr. Shiress Will), and what they called the political side of this question. That was a side with which the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan) was not completely unacquainted. He could not have desired a greater piece of political good fortune than to have seen enacted on the floor of that House the little comedy at the close of the speech of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow. The hon. Member closed his speech by saying that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had at Nottingham made certain statements which encouraged the belief that there was an open offer for certain support, and the hon. Member proceeded to address his Leader or those who represented him in this debate, and to ask for some practical proof of his Leader's sincerity. A wicked world said that such things were generally done; but they were not generally done on the floor of the House of Commons. It was the height of cynicism, even in an ecclesiastical discussion, for the hon. Gentleman to hold up the Church of Scotland in view of the people of Scotland, and propose to make terms with the right hon. Gentleman as to political support. The right hon. Member for Bridgeton was going to speak, perhaps to reply, to the offer of political support. He should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman was going to close with it. Might he put it otherwise, and ask, could the right hon. Gentleman repudiate it; and was it not eminently suggestive that the hon. Member for the College Division, and others who had spoken on the opposite side, had most deliberately objected to the fusion and identification of this question with some other questions which had recently been in somewhat labouring circumstances. He hoped the people of Scotland would take notes of the tone of this discussion as taken by its promoters—that they would notice that on the other side of the House this question had never been discussed in their interest, but that it had been discussed in the interest, on the one hand, of rival sects, and, on the other, of aspiring and enterprising politicians.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton) said that the Solicitor General for Scotland had concluded with some remarks on what he called the political side of the question. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the sentences in which the hon. Member for the College Division closed a speech which, down to these sentences, was a truly admirable one, and very glad he was that these sentences, in which, perhaps, he might find something to take exception, were addressed to a Bench upon which the first man who was going to rise was himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of some of them as looking for a sign. The hon. and learned Gentleman could know very little about his political history. Some 18 years ago, when he was a young and poor man, the Government brought in a measure which he conceived to be inconsistent with the principles of religious equality. He resigned Office, and, as he thought, sacrificed his political prospects. In 1885—he might appeal on this matter to his hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot), who a moment ago was sitting behind him—before the Election, the Presbytery of Jedburgh addressed a menacing letter to both of them, requiring them not to vote for the Disestablishment of the Church if the question was raised next Session. He told the Presbytery that he was always in favour of Disestablishment and Disendowment, and would vote for it if the question was brought forward. Coming to later times, but times still anterior to those to which reference had been made, the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) had brought in a Bill which went to the root of the question of Disestablishment; and, as a Member of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, he had himself made a strong Disestablishment and Disendowment speech in answer to that Bill; and not only that, but he and his right hon. Friend beside him had voted for the exact Motion which had been brought forward that evening, before any of the events to which the hon. and learned Member had referred. He agreed with that part of the speech of the hon. Member for the Central Division of Glasgow (Mr. Baird)—which had not descended to these topics—in which he had hoped that that debate would not be obscured by any side question, as was the case in the constituencies. As far as he himself was concerned, it would not be so obscured; he would go straight to the point. The hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier) had told them that they must prove all things. He did not know that the hon. Member had proved much; but, for his own part, he would undertake to say nothing of which he would not give proof; he would go to the centre of the question, and every word he would say should bear on the question of Disestablishment and Disendowment from the point of view of the highest interests and duty of Scotland.

He must congratulate his hon. Friend on having come first that evening. It was very important that they should have a debate, and still more that they should have a Division. He was very anxious to bring this question to the test, both as a Liberal and as a Scotch Member. The Solicitor General for Scotland asked them to say why they were in favour of Disestablishment. As Liberals, they held that State connection was a bad thing; they considered that it fettered and narrowed the Church which was within its influence, and that it depressed and was unfair to the Churches outside of it. They held that it had the deleterious effect of all privilege, ecclesiastical and political; and they held, above all, that the public religious endowments of a nation should not be given for the benefit of one religious body within that nation, but should be applied to uses which should benefit and meet the conscientious wishes of the whole community. He was not ashamed, as a Scotchman, to say that he was very anxious to have this debate. He thought that there was a good deal of sense in what had been said by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that this question of the existence of an Established Church should largely be governed by the preponderating opinions of the people in the district and in the country in which that Established Church existed; and he understood that that was the opinion of some of the opponents of the hon. Member. The hon. Member for the St. Andrew's Burghs (Mr. Anstruther) had brought forward an Amendment in which he said that there was no demand on the part of the people of Scotland for the severance of the relations between their Church and the State. The hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell) also brought forward an Amendment, in which he declined to adopt the Resolution until the people of Scotland should first, in some constitutional or authoritative manner, have distinctly signified their desire for such Disestablishment or Disendowment. Now, he was utterly unable to conceive in what constitutional and authoritative manner the people of Scotland could signify such desire except through the mouth of their Parliamentary Representatives; and if the majority of the Representatives for Scotland decided against them to-night, he should be none the less glad that they had brought this matter to the test. It showed that they were not afraid of their views, and it led the country to look upon the question as a practical one. It was a question which the House could not leave alone, and which it never did leave alone. From both sides of the House Resolutions and Bills relating to the Church of Scotland were constantly being brought forward, and he ventured to say that in the course of the next 20 or 30 years the time of Parliament—if that were the only consideration—would be saved if this Resolution were adopted and the proposals contained in it carried into law. The reason of that was that the abuses of the Church of Scotland were so palpable and so great that Bills were constantly being brought forward to deal with them. These Bills were brought forward by the friends of the Church for the purpose of diminishing the invidiousness of its privileges. In 1874 they had had from the defenders of the Established Church an Act for abolishing patronage. Taken by itself there was nothing objectionable in that Act; but when they took it in connection with the fact that there were other large Presbyterian Bodies in that country, he ventured to say that the Church had no right—as long as it insisted upon keeping up State connection and keeping all its endowments—to continue to enjoy those material advantages, and at the same time to ask for the spiritual advantages which the other Churches had gained by sacrificing everything. Then the hon. and learned Member for Inverness had, two years ago, brought forward a Bill for declaring the constitution of the Church of Scotland. In that Bill he had asked them to set the Church free from State control. Now, this freedom from State control was the only thing that the other Churches had which compensated them for being without endowment and State connection, and it was this purpose and this spirit which had brought this question to the present stage. They could not expect these great voluntary Churches to sit quietly by while Bills were brought in for the purpose of taking away their adherents one by one—[Ministerial cries of "Oh!"—certainly that was the object of them; what other object was there?—and leaving the ministers of the Churches high and dry, isolated and deserted, with all the immense material and educational and religious interest which were in their hands. It had been because they were threatened in such a manner with gradual extinction that these great voluntary Bodies had come forward. Since then all the denominations outside the Established Church had distinctly declared that if it wanted to have the same advantages as they possessed it must seek them in the same manner by giving up its connection with the State. He had already stated that it was important to get the votes of the Scotch Members on this question. But it was also important to get the votes of English Members. He should like to say a few words to English Members from the point of view of an Englishman, who had been a Scotch Member for a number of years, and who, as an Englishman, brought originally to the consideration of the question a certain freshness of view. English Members were, perhaps, not aware of the fact that the privileges of the Established Church in Scotland were much greater than those of the Established Church in England. In England the income of poor benefices was increased out of Church funds, but in Scotland the income was made up out of Imperial taxes. ["No, no!"] That fact, at any rate, could not be denied. There was annually paid out of the Exchequer to make up Scotch livings as much as £17,000. He had before him some figures with regard to a number of parishes all in one county, Ross and Cromarty, which threw a remarkable light on the statement of the Solicitor General for Scotland as to the increase of membership in the Established Church. In Kinlochlaiddart there were 632 people and 15 communicants of the Church of Scotland; in Knock, 2,990 people and four communicants; in Poolewe, 2,317 people and 25 communicants; in Uttapool, 2,573 people and 17 communicants; and in Cross, which had 2,795 people, and Barvas, which had 2,600 people, there were five communicants between them. And the Solicitor General for Scotland told them that the Church of Scotland was making a great advance all over the country, and embracing within its fold the great mass of the people! To each of these parishes there was paid out of the Exchequer £120 a-year. Both Parties in the House were at the present time looking in every direction to see where economies could be made. Here was a case in which a large number of ministers were being paid out of State funds who were doing nothing and for whom there was nothing to do. It was a great abuse. In Ireland it was a serious thing when there were parishes in which the clergyman only had a congregation of three or four persons; but in that case the clergyman was not paid out of the taxpayers' money as in Scotland now. Such payments out of the Exchequer for sectarian purposes, and under the circumstances he had mentioned, would, in the case of lay services, be regarded as an indefensible job. But this was not the only privilege enjoyed by the Church of Scotland which the Church of England was without. Church rates had been abolished in England; but in Scotland £50,000 a-year was raised from persons of all denominations for the repair and rebuilding of churches and manses of the Established Church. The smaller heritors were exempted; but this was really a great injustice to the larger heritors. If this was an inalienable obligation, then the poor should pay it as well as the rich. If it was not, it ought to be swept away altogether. Besides these grants from the Exchequer and these payments towards the repair and maintenance of churches and manses, which were in the nature of Church rates, large payments were also made out of the pockets of the ratepayers. In many large towns in Scotland it was the ratepayers, who were generally voluntaries, who had to bear the expense of the worship of the Established Church. In Glasgow, £5,000 a-year was paid out of the Corporation funds—funds which, if not paid for this purpose, would go to the relief of the ratepayer—for the services of the Established Church. As a set-off against that, there were the pew rents; but it was a most remarkable comment on the Solicitor General's observation that, while they were embracing large numbers into the fold, those pew rents were steadily diminishing. In Edinburgh the payments could not fall short of £6,000 or £7,000 a-year; but he did not, of course, maintain that those payments were made at present out of taxes levied—though they were so paid in a certain part, but in another large part they were the produce of taxes previously levied and capitalized. In Aberdeen £1,100 or £1,200 a-year was paid out of the Corporation fund, and, in proportion, a like sum in the case of Dundee, Perth, and Stirling. He was certain it was in the interest of the Church, owing to the dissatisfaction such a charge created, that it ought to be abolished. Then there was the anomaly of Established Church ministers sitting ex officio along with members of their Kirk Session upon Parochial Boards which had the power of levying taxes. If there was ever a Body which ought to be elective and neutral, surely it was the Parochial Boards; and while ministers of the Established Church had this privilege, they were themselves exempt from taxation. Again, what could be more indefensible and offensive than the tests applied to University Professors? Eighty per cent of Scotland was Presbyterian; but still, in the great Presbyterian Bodies, the Professors were taken exclusively from the Established Church. But that was not all. All the Professors of Greek, Latin, and Natural Science were obliged to swear that they would not exercise their functions to the prejudice or subversion of the Established Church. Now, there they had disabilities which long ago had been abolished by Parliament in the English Universities. This system led to this anomaly—that eminent men from Oxford and Cambridge who crossed the Border had to take this theological test, which was worthy of the Middle Ages. The only defence that he had heard of such a system was that the Church was the Church of the nation; that it was all but the universal Church. But it was not a universal Church. It was far from it. The Presbyterians were 80 per cent; but the Established Church was considerably less than 50 per cent of the Presbyterian Body. ["No!"] The only way in which they would arrive at this was to take a count of the Representatives who voted in Parliament. Now, the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church between them had 100 places of worship more than the Established Church; and it must be remembered that these churches were built because they were wanted. Well, but it was said the Established Church was kept up for the sake of the poor. But was that correct? The poorest of the poor were to be found in Lewis; and what were the statistics of the Established Church in that island? The population of the parish of Barvas was 2,700, the Established Church had 5 communicants; Stornoway had 7,399 people and 11 communicants; Uig, 3,490 people and 49 communicants; Harris, 4,360 people and 26 communicants; Lochs, 6,284 people and 7 communicants; so that out of 23,500 inhabitants in Lewis, 23,000 were adherents of the Free Church, and what it was in Lewis, though in somewhat less proportion, it was all over the Highlands. It was said that there were 356 rural parishes in which there were neither United Presbyterian nor Free Church places of worship; but many of them were very small parishes, and their populations attended Free and United churches in adjoining parishes, just as in a parish he was familiar with in Northumberland the majority of the people were Methodists or Presbyterians and went to buildings outside the parish. And, no doubt, there were in Scotland parishes in which there were no members of voluntary Churches, just as in other parishes there were no members of the Established Church. When it was asked how the Established Church was to meet the needs of the poor parishes, he replied, in the same way that the Free Church had met the spiritual needs of Lewis. No Scotchman would fail to find the means to worship in the church to which his inclination and his conscience led him; and it was a libel on the members of the Established Church to suggest that they would be less generous than the members of the voluntary Churches. The United and the Free Churches had raised between them in the course of the year nearly £1,000,000. That proved that either their adherents were more numerous than they were admitted to be, or else that having to pay for their own worship made them exceptionally generous and public-spirited. But he would never argue this question as one of privilege or of money if Disestablishment were opposed to the highest interests of the Established Church; but to set it free from State control, to throw it on its own resources like its Sister Churches, and, above all, to relieve it from the task of fighting for privileges, were the truest services you could render it. When he was a very young man he came to the conclusion that there was no nobler training for the great mass of working people than the exercise of the public spirit and self-denial which were required for the maintenance of their religion. It was no wrong to demand from the Established Church the same efforts, labours, and sacrifices which had been spontaneously made by the voluntary Churches; but it was a great wrong to allow the public endowments of a great country to be monopolized for the benefit of one religious body, instead of being applied to the general, public unsectarian needs of the entire community.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, E.) said, that the right hon. Gentleman had indulged in some interesting personal reminiscences; but it was not apparent why he had done so.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN said, it was because he was charged with taking up this question on political ground.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, it was not certainly his business to question the right hon. Gentleman's consistency; but the hon. Member for the College Division had referred to the unholy connection that had been established between political and ecclesiastical questions in a sense which must touch the right hon. Gentleman rather nearly. He was quite content to accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he had been a consistent advocate of Disestablishment, and that he repudiated the bargain of supporting it for the sake of gaining adhesions to Home Rule, and he was glad that the question had been placed on the broad grounds of the maintenance or abolition of the Established Church, because it would lead the House to understand what was the ultimate tendency of the Motion now before it. The right hon. Baronet said he was anxious to bring this question to the test. They on the Government side had not raised it; but they should not shrink from the test. This question of Disestablishment had been dragged into a prominence for which there was no occasion. The Church of Scotland was doing its work steadily and carefully, and was annually making large additions to the number of its members, and consequently there had been no reason, on account of its failure in efficiency, to bring this question before the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman had shown a certain amount of inaccuracy in his allegations. He said that in England, for example, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the grant of £17,000 a-year in aid of the poorer parishes in the Highlands was taken out of the taxes of the people was absolutely without foundation. It was a historical fact that since the Reformation a certain portion of the teinds, the patrimony of the Church, had formed part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown; and it was but a small portion of these that was annually granted in aid of those poor parishes in which there were no unexhausted teinds to call up in supplement of the inadequate stipends. Was it possible that the right hon. Gentleman was ignorant of that? For a long period the Established Church of Scotland had made great efforts to meet the wants of the growing population. Within the last 40 years it had established 350 new parishes in order to meet the religious requirements of an increasing population. Since 1834 the numbers of the members of the Church in Scotland had largely increased, and in no sense had that Church fallen back. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the connection with the State imposed fetters on the Church. In that year, by a wise measure, Parliament had removed from the Church the fetters, and made amends for the injuries of former legislation. It was owing to the enactment of lay patronage, alien to the feelings of the people of Scotland, at the beginning of the last century, and to the failure of the Government of the day to appreciate the gravity of the crisis, that the Church had lost so many of its people. Was the Church to be debarred from renewing its attempts to be freed from the burdens which had so long oppressed it, and against which it had so long struggled? And how was it an offence against those who had left the Church on account of those burdens that its efforts were at last successful? The abolition of lay patronage and the attempts which had since been made to obtain for the emancipated Church the declaration by law of an ancient principle, cannot justly be called aggression; they are symptoms of true liberality in throwing wide the doors for the re-entry of those who never, but for the mistakes of statesmen, would have been separated. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to-night to the recent debate upon ecclesiastical assessments, with regard to which it seemed to him (Sir James Fergusson) the other night that he was rather hazy; and he alleged the inconsistency of their maintenance as a legal obligation when compulsory Church rates had been abolished in England. But he forgot, or he was strangely ignorant, that the landed proprietors of Scotland still retained the enjoyment of an income from the unexhausted teinds, much larger than the annual charge of about £40,000 or £50,000, for the maintenance of the ecclesiastical fabrics. And if the ecclesiastical assessments fell upon them alone, as it was maintained they should, it would be impossible to allege in that a well-founded grievance. Again, he called it an injustice that the City of Glasgow should be obliged, out of its common good, to supplement a deficiency in the income from seat rents. Was it possible, he (Sir James Fergusson) asked again, that he did not know that a portion of the teinds were assigned to the city on condition of its maintaining certain churches, and the same obligation existed in certain other towns? He was, indeed, unable to accept the falling-off in the seat rents of certain churches as a proof of the defects of the ministrations. It was the effect of a change in the character of the resident population, the wealthy having, in some cases, moved elsewhere and erected new churches for their own accommodation. Nor, he trusted, would they admit the exaction of seat rents as a wholesome feature in Church management. He wondered to hear the right hon. Gentleman rake up again the buried controversy of Church Endowments in Edinburgh. Some of them were old enough to remember the long contest about the Annuity Tax there, and the settlement of the matter by a legislative compromise not too liberal to the Church. As to what the right hon. Gentleman called the unfair representation on the Parochial Board, and the presence of the parish minister as its Chairman, he (Sir James Fergusson) would remind the House that before the institution of the new Poor Law the Kirk Session was the only authority by which the poor was relieved; it was not, therefore, surprising that in the newly constituted Body the Chairman of the Kirk Session, who by his office was brought so much into contact with the poor, should have a place. A small matter, indeed, to call for Disestablishment! The true defence of the Church as a National Institution was that it was the religious embodiment of the nation; and in the National Church of Scotland was found an organization altogether in harmony in its confession and in its character with the genius and instincts of the Scottish people. That Church had never used its privileges for selfish purposes. Had it done so, there might have been some reason for the House passing a Vote of Censure upon it. But as it had always done its best for the spiritual welfare of the community, he saw no reason for condemning it in the way indicated by the Resolution moved by the hon. Member. In those circumstances, was it reasonable to withdraw from it the means of meeting the wants of the poor and of giving free ministration to all the people of the country, and of accomplishing the purpose for which it existed? The right hon. Gentleman made much of the fact that in the Highlands and Islands the people largely belonged to the Free Church. That was true, because there they had strongly resented the intrusion of unacceptable ministers; but in the Highlands this proposal for Disestablishment had met with no support, while in Mid Lothian itself, a county which had given such pledges to Liberation, when the question was put to the test, 69 per cent of the electors had voted in favour of the retention of the Establishment. He ventured to think that no case had been made out for Disestablishment, and he trusted that the result of the Division would show such an advance on that of 1886 as would utterly frustrate the views of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow.

MR. H. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrew's, &c.) said, he wished particularly to avoid bringing the question down to the level of political controversy. He could not congratulate the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow on the spirit which he had brought to bear on this discussion of a question which deeply concerned the people of Scotland, and which they were prepared to consider on its merits. If that was the spirit that Englishmen who sat for Scottish constituencies, as the right hon. Baronet described himself, were prepared to bring to bear on this question, then he would rather the discussion were confined to Scotchmen sitting for Scotch seats. He would rather treat the question they were dealing with upon its merits, and the Church as an institution doing good in the country to which he belonged. It had not, he submitted, been proved by the hon. Member, in bringing forward this Motion, either that the Church of Scotland was in the minority, or that she had failed to fulfil the sacred trust imposed upon her by the people of Scotland. Nor had it been proved that the connection of the Church with the State was detrimental either to one or the other; and, lastly, he took this point—that it had not been proved that there was any large demand upon the part of the people of Scotland for the change advocated by the hon. Member for the College Division. Hon. Members from Scottish constituencies who had followed closely the course of events in Scotland in 1885 would bear him out in the assertion that every expression of opinion of the people from every part of the country had been against the proposal for Disestablishment and Disendowment. [Opposition cries of "No!"] A vast majority had indicated that as their opinion, and in Mid Lothian nearly two-thirds of the registered electors of that constituency petitioned against Disestablishment. Consequently, they were told by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian that Disestablishment was not to be made a test question at the General Election, and he did not believe it was a test question except in a very few instances. He wished specially to draw the attention of the House to the point which he had given expression to in the Amendment which, by the Rules of the House, he was precluded from moving—it was that there was no substantial demand on the part of the people of Scotland for this change. This was proved by the statistics which the supporters of the National Church had placed before the House, and he trusted the House would reject the Motion by as substantial a majority as it had done on previous occasions. The Church of Scotland had nothing to apologize for in the past, and nothing to be ashamed of. The members of the Church of Scotland only wanted to live in peace and go on with their good work; but if attacks of this kind were to be made on the Establishment and Endowment, there were many Members on his side of the House, and also, no doubt, a large number of Members on the other side, who were prepared to resist them; and, moreover, they would be able to prove to their opponents that they would be able to rally to their side a large number of the people of Scotland.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) said, he rose to explain the vote he was going to give. The last two speakers had endeavoured rather to prove that the Church of Scotland was doing a good work than to show that it was doing that good work in such a peculiar and exclusive manner that to it alone should be granted State endowment and support. That was the point on which the House would divide that night. No one denied the good work the Church of Scotland was doing. On the contrary, many held that it had a great future before it, and that that future would be enhanced by the withdrawal of State support. It seemed to him that when there were three Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, all having the same form of Church government, all holding exactly the same creed and using the same Service, it was an anomaly that to one alone State support should be granted. The hon. Baronet opposite said that two years ago he (Mr. Marjoribanks) voted in exactly the opposite sense to that in which he was going to vote that night. He admitted that, and he would tell the House the reason. At the Election of 1885 he especially and particularly reserved this subject when he asked his constituents to return him again as their Member. He then distinctly stated that he would not, during the Parliament elected in 1885, vote in support of a Motion for the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland without putting the question to his constituents; but with the Parliament of 1885 that pledge fell to the ground. [A laugh.] Hon. Members opposite seemed to insinuate by their laughter that when they made pledges they kept them for ever. How about coercion in Ireland? He repeated that with the Parliament of 1885 that pledge fell to the ground, and he was elected to the present Parliament without any pledge on the question. The reason he gave the pledge at all was that he had hoped that there might be one great Presbyterian Church, endowed and supported by the State, which would combine all the Churches in Scotland. He believed, however, that was a foolish dream, and it was because he believed that the only chance for the union of the three Churches was the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of Scotland that he intended to support the Motion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down need not have taken up the time of the House by accounting for his giving a different vote now from that which he gave in 1885. It is not such an exceptional case on that side as to make it worth his while. The question of Disestablishment is not the only question on which pledges have been given and broken. When the right hon. Gentleman twits hon. Members on this side of the House on the course which they have taken in reference to Ireland he forgets altogether that the circumstances surrounding the question may have changed; but he cannot point to any circumstances which have arisen in connection with the Church of Scotland between 1885 and the present day to justify his change of opinion upon that subject. I presume that when he voted for the Establishment in 1886 he did so because his constituents desired that he should do so. What has happened since to make him and his constituents alter their mind? I presume that the hon. Member for the College Division thinks that this question is ripe for a decision, and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said that it was at Nottingham. Surely if that is so, this is a question upon which the House ought to have the best advice that can be given by the Leaders on both sides. Now, I want to know where are the Leaders of the Party opposite? Why has the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) taken a back seat? Where is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who is a Scotch Member and the Leader of the thought on the other side; surely he was the proper person to guide the Liberal Party, and, if he could, the House to a proper decision on this question. The hon. Member for the College Division professes to believe that the storm is rising. I think, however, he must have been disappointed with the tone of this debate. Surely if the storm was rising the stormy petrel would be here. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, when in Office in 1886, was able to speak some kindly and hopeful words in regard to the hon. Member's Motion; but now that he is in Opposition, in a position "of greater freedom and less responsibility," he does not think it worth while to come here to support the hon. Member, or even to say that he stands in the same position towards this question as he did in 1886. He can fly those kites at Nottingham, but we want him to come here to tell us whether it is the policy of the Liberal Party that there ought to be no connection between Church and State anywhere in the United Kingdom. The right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division is the only Member who has had the honesty in this debate to put this issue clearly before the House. Everybody knows that there are Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House who care nothing about the Church of Scotland and know nothing about it, who take no interest either in its success or failure, but whose sole object is to use this question as a stalking-horse in their endeavours for the destruction of the Established Church in England. There is no enthusiasm save the enthusiasm which is worked up outside Scotland by the Liberation Society, who do not care one rap about the Church of Scotland. I shall not enter into the general question after the very able speech of my hon. and learned Friend near me, who put the matter upon a sound and intelligible basis. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division has referred to paltry sums, amounting in all to £25,000 at the most out of £500,000, and which, he says, are paid to the Established Church of Scotland out of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman is not accurate in his facts, and he affords another instance of English Gentlemen who come to represent Scotch constituencies, but who take very little trouble to inform themselves on matters on which they speak, and indulge in denunciations not based on facts but on their own imagination.

HIS IMPERIAL HIGHNESS THE LATE GERMAN EMPEROR.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Mount-Edgcombe) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

"I return you my most sincere thanks for your Dutiful and Touching Address of Condolence on the melancholy occasion of the death of my beloved Son-in-Law, the Emperor Frederick of Germany.

"This assurance of the warm interest in all that concerns myself and my family affords me deep gratification."

FOREIGN MARRIAGE ACT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intended to bring in a Bill to remedy the inconveniences which arose from the present Foreign Marriage Act? He pointed out that none but clergymen of the Church of England could marry British subjects abroad, and that only in the Embassy Chapel. The Consuls had no power to marry English couples unless both parties had been resident in the city in which they sought to get married for one month. He urged that all this was very inconvenient and worked great injustice, and he trusted the noble Marquess would be able to inform the House that some general Bill would be introduced.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I am afraid the difficulty of passing general Acts, or any other Acts, is very considerable at this time, and I doubt whether it would be in our power to introduce any measure at this period of the Session which would have any chance of passing. I entirely sympathize with the views of my noble Friend. It is clear that any impediment to the marriage of Nonconformists resident abroad who wish to be married is entirely contrary to justice and to good policy, and I shall be very glad to look into the state of the law as it at present exists to see whether, with the existing power, we are not able to remedy the grievances my noble Friend has referred to. I do not concur with him in thinking it desirable to get rid of that provision which restricts the power of the Consul to the marriage of couples who have been resident a month. I am afraid we should have a renewal of Gretna Green in more convenient and accessible circumstances. Any couple that desires to be married, even if under age, could, without any difficulty, cross the water and get it done. But any obstacle on account of a difference in religious opinion is clearly inconsistent with the policy of the present day, and ought to be put a stop to as rapidly as possible.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Marquess of Lothian.)

(No. 165.) THIRD READING.

Order of the day for the Third Reading, read.

The Queen's consent signified; Bill read 3^a (according to order).

Moved, "That the Bill do pass?"

Amendments made.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of Lothian) stated that the number of Commissioners had been increased from 13 to 15 by the addition of Sir Henry Roscoe and Lord Elgin.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, everybody must feel that the new names which had been added must improve the texture and character of the Commission, excepting in one respect—namely, that whereas the number was to have been 13, it would now be 15. He wished to express most strongly his impression that this Commission was much too large. He was aware there were precedents for appointing Commissions of this size, even with reference to this great subject; but in the days when these Commissions were appointed 30 years ago, Commissioners were not expected to undertake so active a part on the Commission as people were supposed to do now. He feared the result of the large number would be to have a great diminution of the sense of responsibility on the part of each individual Member of the Commission. If they had a Commission of seven, they would have a body of men who would feel it a necessity to attend every meeting, and who would have a due sense of the powers devolved upon them by Statute. But with a Commission of 15, some of whom were resident in England, this could not be the case. They would have an habitually small attendance, ready, he feared, by the analogy of their Lordships' House, to be swamped at any critical moment by the appearance of the absentees on the scene. He was afraid that it was too late at this stage of the Bill to remedy this; but they had entrusted such very large—indeed absolute—powers to the Commission, the composition of which was of vital moment, that he must record his opinion of it even at this late period.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he could understand the noble Earl's contention that more efficient work might be done by a small Commission; but, on the other hand, in asking so many Gentlemen to serve, he had looked at the great amount of work to be performed. It might take not only months but years before the work of the Commission could be thoroughly carried through, and he thought that would be too great a task to place on a small number of Gentlemen who gave their honorary services. The analogy with reference to being swamped by absentees, as in the case of their Lordships' House, he did not think could apply. He felt that the Gentlemen whom he had asked represented and felt a practical interest in the subject to which the Bill referred, and he fully believed that they would give their very best attention, as well as all the time they could spare, to the work of the Commission. With that view, and with the hope that it would not entail too much individual work on any of them, the number of the Commission had been so fixed; and their Lordships might feel assured that the work would be fully, effectually, and well done.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY asked whether he was to understand that the work would be so severe that the noble

Marquess had fixed on the large number on the principle of the survival of the fittest, and that only a small remnant of the Commission would be likely to see the work accomplished?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he could not admit that the number was fixed on the principle suggested. He thought the Government had adopted the wisest course.

Motion agreed to; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

SUFFRAGANS' NOMINATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make further provision for nomination of Bishops Suffragans—Was presented by The Lord Chancellor; read 1^a. (No. 176.)

DEATH OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR. HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord ARTHUR HILL) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

"I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address of Sympathy and Condolence on the Occasion of the Death of My beloved Son in Law, the Emperor Frederick of Germany.

"I gratefully accept the Expression of your Sympathy with My Grandson, the present Emperor William the Second of Germany, with His Family and His People, at this melancholy Event, and I will not fail to communicate your Sentiments to His Majesty."

QUESTIONS.

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)—THE LOBSTER FISHERIES.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the law regarding lobster fishing is entirely regulated by 40 & 41 Vict. c. 42; whether, under Section 10, the Board of Trade made the public inquiries, and gave the public notices therein contemplated; in particular, were inquiries made and notices given in regard to the lobster fisheries of the Outer Hebrides; and, if so, where and when; whether he is aware that the Procurator Fiscal of the Long Island District of Inverness-shire suddenly issued notices prohibiting, for the first time, fishermen, who had purchased on credit the requisite materials for the season, from taking lobsters on the West or ocean shores of South Uist during the months of June, July, and August; whether, according to the fishermen, this is the only period of the year they can with safety fish that stormy coast; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made as to this novel interference with the usages of the fishermen, with the view of their being heard in defence of their chief means of subsistence?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The law is regulated by the Act quoted, and there is also an Act passed in the year 9 Geo. II., c. 33, which by Section 4 provides a close time for lobsters in June, July, and August on the coast of Scotland. This section of the Act, though still in force, has very generally fallen into desuetude. The Procurator Fiscal referred to has not issued any such notices as are set forth in the Question; and no inquiries have been made. So far as I can ascertain, in consequence of a complaint made to the Procurator Fiscal, he instructed the police constables in the district to report to him for his information any offenders against the Act of Geo. II. quoted above, and against Sections 8 and 9 of the Act of 1877, which prohibit the sale of lobsters under a certain size. I am informed that it is not the case that the months mentioned are the only ones during which this fishing can be carried on with safety; but that during these months there is less fishing than at any other period of the year, owing to the loss of lobsters in transit during the warm weather, and the low prices realized.

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What progress has been made in the arrangements for so altering the Regulations for the entrance examinations to Woolwich that the subject of natural science shall be duly represented? Also, Whether the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to give information as to the steps which he has taken to place the subject of experimental science in a proper position in the entrance examinations for Woolwich?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: An arrangement has been made which will, I hope, be satisfactory to the hon. Member. I will to-day lay a Paper on the Table showing the marks to be granted for the several subjects, merely stating now that increased relative importance has been assigned to natural science. Notice will, of course, be given before this scale of marks comes into operation.

EXCISE DEPARTMENT—PAY AND PROMOTION OF ASSISTANTS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the present Assistants of Excise have to serve from eight to 10 years before obtaining promotion, during which time their salaries are substantially the same as were fixed for their class 30 years ago, when similar promotion was obtained in four to five years; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of giving these officers a further increase of their present pay?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: The last Assistant of the Excise who was promoted had served nearly eight years in that capacity. This period is likely to become shorter as time progresses. Although the salaries of Assistants of Excise are, as stated by the hon. Member, practically the same as were fixed 30 years ago, the present Assistants have the prospective advantages of promotion to better paid places in the future. With regard to the suggestion that these officers should be given an increase in their pay, Questions bearing directly on the subject have already been asked in the House on six previous occasions—namely, Mr. Macdonald Cameron, June 13, 1887; Mr. Sexton, September 8, 1887; Mr. Webster, March 26, 1888; Mr. O. V. Morgan, April 16, 1888; Mr. D. Sullivan, April 26, 1888—and I have really nothing to add to the replies which were then given.

PAROCHIAL EXPENDITURE (METROPOLIS) — ST. MARGARET AND ST. JOHN, WESTMINSTER.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that the Vestry of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, has recently borrowed two sums, one for wood paving, and the other for asphalt paving, of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that, having completed the works for which the respective loans were taken up, and having a surplus of several thousand pounds, the Vestry is expending the surplus in reduction of the current rates; whether some of the rating authorities have refused to sign the rate in consequence; and, whether there is any power of preventing current expenses being thus paid for by loans?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board have no jurisdiction whatever with respect to the loans raised by the Vestry or their application. They have, however, communicated with the Vestry on the subject, and are informed that the late Board of Works for the Westminster District received two loans from the Metropolitan Board of Works last year for the execution of the works in question; that the works have been carried out; and that there is a considerable balance in hand in respect of each loan. The Vestry state that no part of either loan has been, or is intended to be, applied in aid of current rates; but that the balance of each loan remains on deposit with the Treasurer of the Vestry. The Board are further informed that one of the Churchwardens of the parish refused to sign the general rate, and stated his reasons for such refusal when, on the 28th of April last, he attended before the magistrate to object to the allowance and signing of the rate; but that, notwithstanding the objection thus taken, the magistrate allowed and signed the rate. In the case of a Vestry proposing to apply borrowed moneys in aid of current rates, I presume that application might be made to the High Court for an injunction.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ATHY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Athy Board of Guardians has been dissolved by sealed order from the Local Government Board; and, if so, why?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that the Board had been dissolved by a sealed order of the Local Government Board, because the Guardians had deliberately misappropriated the Union funds for the pecuniary advantage of a member of their own body, in refunding to him from the rates the amount he was obliged to pay by way of surcharge in respect of certain illegal payments he had sanctioned from the rates, as reported by the Local Government Auditor.

MR. KILBRIDE asked, on what principle had the Local Government Auditor proceeded to make this Report?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he fancied it was on the same principle as in the case of every Board of Guardians which sanctioned illegal payments.

MR. KILBRIDE asked, if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in making out the accounts the auditor had in one case, where there were only three in family, sanctioned the payment of £8 4s. for their support for the half year; whereas in another case, where there were 15 in family (13 children and the parents), he only sanctioned the payment of £5 for their support for six months, and surcharged the Guardians with the balance? On what principle had these surcharges been made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was not aware of the particulars of the facts of the case; but he was aware that the payments surcharged were grossly illegal.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, if the right hon. Gentleman would not make a personal investigation into the facts in this particular instance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the facts of the case were really quite clear.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTABLISHMENTS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can state when the Report of the Royal Commission on Civil Service Establishments will be issued?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am informed that the Commissioners are engaged upon the preparation of their Second Report, which will probably be submitted to Her Majesty before the end of the present Session.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—LOUGH CORRIB.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Who has the power to raise the Lough Corrib sluices in time of flood; and, is care taken that the interests of tenants on the banks of Lough Corrib should be considered before those of the lessee of the salmon fishery?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The sluices are under the control of Professor Townsend, Engineer of the Drainage and Navigation Board, under the award of the Commissioners of Public Works, dated September 25, 1859. The engineer may not allow the minimum lowest level to fall below 29·2 feet above the datum line at the Ordnance summer level, or to rise above the maximum level of 31·2 feet above the datum line at the winter level. The engineer has always endeavoured, as far as he possibly can, to consult the interests of the tenants.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE SHANNON.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Who gives the orders for the Shannon sluices at Athlone and Meelick to be raised; were these sluices raised on Tuesday, the 12th, and when was the order given for the raising of these sluices; and, what was the height of water above the bottom of the lock on the 12th June and on subsequent days, and did it ever reach within nine inches of winter flood level?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The orders for raising the sluices at Athlone and Meelick are given by the Resident Engineer, Mr. Crosthwait. The sluices at Athlone were not raised on Tuesday, June 12. At Meelick on that day all were raised except one, which was under repair. The height of water on the upper sill at Athlone Lock on that day was eight feet, and at Hamilton Lock, Meelick, six feet nine and a half. The maximum height of the flood was on June 15, when the depths were—Athlone, upper sill, 8 feet 6; lower sill, 13 feet 3; Meelick, upper sill, 7 feet 4; lower sill, 9 feet 9. I am informed that the level of the winter water is very variable. Above Athlone it reaches the surface of the land, when there is a depth of 8 feet 2, while on the upper sill at Meelick the depth is 7 feet 6.

COLONEL NOLAN would like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he had not stated that the water at these places was over 8 feet, while the Parliamentary level was 6 feet 6?

MR. JACKSON said, that was so; but he was informed that unless the course taken had been adopted a very large area of land would have been flooded.

COLONEL NOLAN asked, if the right hon. Gentleman meant to say that keeping down the sluices would prevent flooding.

MR. JACKSON said, so he was informed.

COLONEL NOLAN: What, all?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

COLONEL NOLAN asked, if that was to be accepted as a correct engineering opinion, that keeping down the sluices would prevent flooding?

MR. JACKSON said, he was informed that unless the water had been kept back a very much larger area would have been flooded lower down.

HORSE AND CATTLE BREEDING (IRELAND)—ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY—THE GRANT OF £5,000.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the Royal Dublin Society have reported to the Government the manner in which they have expended the sum of £5,000 entrusted to them for the improvement of horse and cattle breeding in Ireland; and, if he has any objection to giving a Return showing the names of members of local committees; the number of selected horses; the names of owners of such horses; the districts set apart for each horse; the number of bulls, with their respective breeds; the number of applications for service premiums; the number of applications refused, with reasons for such refusal; the districts in which selected bulls are located; and, the amount of surplus, if any?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) (who replied) said: The Royal Dublin Society have furnished a detailed Report of the manner in which they have dealt with the £5,000 for horse and cattle breeding. There would be no objection to grant a Return in the form indicated, excepting as regards that portion relating to number of applications for and refusal of service premiums, of which there is no record. The refusals, I understand, were few. I may, however, point out that the Royal Dublin Society have given considerable information on the subject of the distribution of the grant in their published proceedings, and in a special pamphlet. The hon. Member may possibly find these sufficient for the purpose he has in view.

MR. M. J. KENNY said, he had desired that these Returns should be issued to Members of the House, so that Parliament would have an opportunity of forming an opinion as to the manner in which this money had been disposed of.

THE SUGAR BOUNTIES—PROTECTIVE DUTIES OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the negotiations for the abolition of foreign sugar bounties extend to the abolition or reduction of the protective duties levied by foreign nations on British sugar, or on British manufactures in which sugar is used?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No; these negotiations relate solely to the abolition of sugar bounties, and do not enter into questions of duties on sugar, or on manufactures in which sugar is used.

SUGAR BOUNTIES CONFERENCE—THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government of the United States have taken a part in the Conference on Sugar Bounties in the same manner and on the same footing as the Governments of the other countries concerned; and, whether he is able to give the House any information concerning the probability of the United States Government joining in and adopting the conclusions of the Conference?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Representative of the United States attended the Sugar Conference to listen to its proceedings and report the same, but without committing his Government. I am not able to inform the House concerning the course which the Government of the United States may take at future stages.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 — IMPRISONMENT OF MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of this House a copy of the record and the depositions in the Court of First Instance and on appeal, in the case of Mr. John Dillon, a Member of this House, sentenced on the 20th instant at Dundalk to an imprisonment of six months?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have considered this matter carefully; and, in view of the fact that the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman is a very unusual one, and there is nothing special, so far as I know, either in the facts or the law relating to the case in the Paper, I think it will not be expedient to make the Return asked for by the right hon. Gentleman.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—PRISON REGULATIONS—MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) (for Mr. W. H. JAMES) (Gateshead) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How Mr. John Dillon has been employed since his imprisonment, and what will be the nature of his employment during the progress of his sentence?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board report that the hon. Member referred to has been exempt from labour of any kind, the medical officer having directed his being placed in the Prison Hospital.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. J. H. ATKINSON, PETTY SESSIONS CLERK, MARYBOROUGH, QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. LALOR (Queen's County, Leix) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that Mr. John H. Atkinson, Petty Sessions Clerk at Maryborough, Queen's County, has been suspended for defalcations extending over a number of years, and if he is aware of the nature and extent of these defalcations; and, if it is the intention of the Government, as reported, to sanction the re-instatement of Mr. Atkinson in the position of Petty Sessions Clerk?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the clerk referred to had not been suspended for defalcations, but for neglect of duty. The Magistrates have recommended his re-instatement, and the matter is now before the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) asked, had not Mr. Atkinson received dog taxes, for which he did not issue either stamped or licensed documents?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was not aware of the fact.

HOME OFFICE—PRISON DEPARTMENT.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, What is the reason for the delay in the issue of the Return relating to the Prison Department; and, whether the Return will show the number of prisoners employed in mat making in each prison?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam): There has been no avoidable delay this year in the preparation of the Report of the Prison Commissioners; the Report usually appears at the end of August. When issued it will show, in the same way as the Report last published, the number of prisoners employed at mat-making in each prison. It appears that the actual daily average number of prisoners so employed in the year ending March 31, 1888, was only 1,473.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—ARREARS OF RATES.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether tenants under £4 valuation who have purchased under Lord Ashbourne's Act can be sued for rates which became due previous to the confirmation by the Land Commission of the purchase scheme; did Lord Ashbourne's Act contemplate payment by such tenants of arrears of poor rates; what are the powers of Guardians to recover arrears of rates from tenants under £4 valuation; and, whether it is the duty of the Guardians to exhaust the means at their disposal to recover the rates from the landlord in such cases before suing the occupier?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The occupier for the time being of any land may be compelled to pay the poor rate as soon as it is four months in arrear. If the valuation of the land is not more than £4, the occupier, if compelled to pay, may recover the whole amount from the lessor of the land by civil bill, or he may deduct it from his rent, if he is liable to pay a rent. Lord Ashbourne's Act does not affect the question. The person in actual occupation of land can be equally sued by the Guardians whether he is a tenant or a purchaser, and in either case he can recover from the person ultimately liable. The Board of Guardians are by law entitled to sue either the lessor or the occupier of land. Where the lessor is ultimately liable it is, I am informed, the usual practice to use all reasonable endeavour to compel him to pay before resorting to the occupier. The mode of enforcing payment is either by distress, which, of course, only affects the occupier, or by civil bill, which is available against either lessor or occupier.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DISMISSAL OF P. LOUGHREY, TULLA UNION.

MR. COX (Clare E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can cite any precedents for the action of the Local Government Board in dismissing, by sealed order, Mr. Patrick Loughry, poor rate collector in the Tulla Union, without any previous communication with the local Board of Guardians; can he state whether it is a fact that the "illegal proceedings" Mr. Loughry was alleged to be concerned in, and for which he was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment, in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour, and for which he was three months afterwards dismissed by sealed order, consisted in being one of a large party engaged in a hunt with a local pack of harriers; whether it is a fact that the Guardians, having complied with the orders of the Local Government Board to advertise for a successor to Mr. Loughry, and having received no application for the office, passed a Resolution on May 29, stating that—

"The Guardians deem it their duty to let the Local Government Board know that it is the belief of the Guardians that no eligible person will apply for the office so long as their sealed order, with the Chief Secretary's signature to it, remains in force ;"

whether, at the meeting of the Board of Guardians on the 19th instant, a Resolution was adopted, again informing the Local Government Board that there was no response to their advertisement for candidates for the vacant situation, and again directing the attention of the Local Government Board to the Resolution of the 29th ultimo, also pointing out that—

"A large number of poverty-stricken persons have been for the past two months deprived of out-door relief owing entirely to the effect of this sealed order," and, whether, as President of the Local Government Board, he will give instructions to have the order withdrawn ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, two cases of the kind had occurred—one, the case of the hon. Member for South Cork, and the other, the case of Dr. Magner. Loughry was convicted as one of the promoters of an illegal assembly of 300 or 400 people, who assembled under the guise of a hunt to intimidate persons from taking certain farms in order that the lands might become derelict. The representations in question were made to the Local Government Board; but, as he had already explained, the outdoor relief was discontinued not because of the dismissal of the man—the payment of it had been stopped before that—but because of the financial condition of the Union.

POST OFFICE—CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT (INLAND BRANCH)—SUNDAY DUTY—THE SORTERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the sorters employed on Sunday duty in the Circulation Department (Inland Branch) petitioned in 1884 for an improved rate of pay; whether, in January, 1885, they asked for a reply to their Petition, which was not given? whether, in October, 1886, they were told officially that—

"A scheme was in existence, which would probably be published early in the new year ;" whether, in January of the present year, having again asked for a reply to the original Petition, they were told by the Controller that "the Postmaster General was in communication with the Treasury;" whether the last statement is correct; and, when a definite answer to the Petition will be given?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): If, as I presume, the hon. Member refers to extra pay for extra duty, the facts are very much as implied in the Question. The matter has, no doubt, been a long time under consideration, involving, as it does, minute and laborious investigation; but I am not without hopes that a decision may now be arrived at shortly, and I can assure the hon. Member that no effort on my part will be wanting to bring this about.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE ACT. 1888—STAMP PENALTIES.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he would be prepared to instruct the Board of Inland Revenue to remit the penalties payable on stamping instruments executed prior to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1888 which are presented to them for the purpose at any time before the 1st of January next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I see many advantages in the course suggested by the hon. Member. The matter is under my consideration; and I shall be glad to give him a fuller and more definite answer if he will kindly repeat his Question in a few days.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ADMINISTRATION OF JUDICIAL OATHS.

MR. J. SINCLAIR (Ayr, &c.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he has yet considered the subject of assimilating the practice of the Irish Courts in the administration of an oath by the "uplifted hand," to the invariable practice in the Scotch Courts as described by the Lord Advocate; and, whether, if he considers further legislation is necessary to effect this reform, he is now prepared to state when he can introduce such legislation?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): If the hon. Member will introduce a Bill dealing with the subject matter of his Question, I can assure him that it will receive the most favourable consideration on the part of the Government. I fear that, so long as the law is governed by the Act of 1838, differences of opinion will exist as to the proper mode of applying its provisions, and that there exist no means of obtaining the uniformity of practice which the hon. Member desires.

MR. J. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman himself be able to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject, as it would be much better coming from the Government?

MR. MADDEN: I am afraid I cannot at this moment undertake on the part of the Government to introduce such a Bill. However, the matter will receive consideration.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL — GEORGE WILLIAMS, A PENSIONER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of George Williams, a pensioner, formerly of the 9th Foot, who, on June 8, 1867, was informed by the Royal Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital, with the assent of the Secretary of State for War, that his claim to an additional 1*d.* a-day had been recognized as well-founded, and that the necessary instructions would be issued for payment of arrears from May 9, 1865, to December 31, 1885, exclusive of the period from July 1 to November 1, 1879, during which he was in Chelsea Hospital; whether the Treasury have caused the money so promised to be withheld; and, if so, whether in view of the fact that the pensioner was not responsible for the accumulation of the arrears, and of the official letter promising payment, and of all the other circumstances of the case he will direct that the Treasury decision shall be re-considered.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): There has been a difference of opinion between the Treasury and War Office with respect to this case; but I have been looking personally into it, and I have good hopes of being able to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of it.

INDIA—THE IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can now give the promised information as to the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): I am sorry to say that the Indian mail has arrived; but it has not brought the Papers relating to this matter.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the hon. Gentleman say how it was that a few weeks ago he informed the House that he had reason to believe the documents were on the way?

SIR JOHN GORST: My reason was that I was told so.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—NOTTINGHAM SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Nottingham School Board have made repeated requests to the Education Department to be permitted to provide additional accommodation in the People's College Board School, and have made various proposals for that purpose; whether the attendance is in excess of the certified accommodation, notwithstanding that more than 100 children have been refused admission; whether he is aware that the school is centrally situated, and is so successful as to cost the ratepayers nothing; whether, instead of complying with the Board's requests, the Education Department has proposed the ejection of the scholars in the three lower standards; and, whether the application which has lately been made for leave to erect supplementary schools on another site will be acceded to by the Department?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The People's College Board School was established as a higher grade school to serve the necessities of the whole town; and the proposals of the Board would have had the effect of converting it into a school of the ordinary type for the supply of a particular district. It is to this degradation of a central school for higher elementary education, and not to the supply of additional accommodation, that the Department have objected; and, as at present advised, I see no reason to re-consider my decision in the matter.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE EDENDERRY UNION—FAIR RENTS.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When he will arrange for fair rents to be fixed for the tenants of Edenderry District, some of whom have been kept waiting for over three years?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that it is not correct to state that some of the applications to fix fair rents in the Edenderry Union have been kept waiting over three years. The earliest undisposed of case in the Kildare part of the Union was served on the 28th of September, 1887; in the Meath part on the 29th of September, 1887; and in the King's County part on the 5th July, 1886. The Commissioners are not at present in a position to state when a Sub-Commissioner will next sit for the disposal of cases in the King's County portion of the Union; but 21 cases have been listed from the Kildare part of the Union for the sitting commencing at Naas on the 2nd of July.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—STREET ASSEMBLIES.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any new instructions have been issued during the last nine months to the Royal Irish Constabulary Forces, as to the prevention of any assembly of persons in the streets after the holding of trials in the various Court-houses in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Inspector General of Constabulary reports that no new instructions of the nature indicated have been issued to the police. Two Circulars were issued to the Divisional Magistrates during the period named, pointing out Regulations to be observed for the preservation of the peace at public demonstrations, and for the prevention of improper demonstrations.

Sir William Hart Dyke

MR. SCHWANN: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay them on the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

COUNTY ELECTORS ACT, 1888—DECLARATIONS IN MUNICIPAL BOROUGHS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether in the County Electors Act of 1888, Section 4, Sub-section 2, in a borough which is only municipal, and for which declarations are to be made on or before September 5, those declarations are to be served on the Town Clerk in that borough or on the Clerk of the Peace, on whom such declarations outside of that borough are served?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St George's): It is presumed that the Question is intended to refer to declarations in boroughs which are municipal, but not Parliamentary, under Sub-section 1 (a) of Section 4 of the County Electors Act. These declarations ought to be served on the Town Clerk of the borough, in accordance with the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, and not on the Clerk of the Peace.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—REFRESHMENT STAND IN THE VICTORIA PARK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, in 1861, permission was granted to Mr. Richard Goddard to occupy a space about 12 feet square in Victoria Park as a refreshment stand; whether, in 1873, the continuance of this permission was granted to Mr. Daniel Nicholl, son-in-law of Mr. Goddard; whether he is aware that, on April 30, 1888, the Metropolitan Board of Works cancelled such permission; and, whether the refreshment stand, whilst under the control of the First Commissioner, had always been well-conducted?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he believed the facts were as stated in the Question; and he had not heard a word of complaint as to the manner in which the refreshment stand had been conducted.

SCOTLAND—LANDLORD AND TENANT
—THE SKIBO ESTATE, SUTHER-LANDSHIRE.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he is aware that Mr. Sutherland, proprietor of the Skibo estate in Sutherlandshire, has refused to accept from his tenants the rents fixed by the Commission appointed under Act of Parliament for that purpose, or refused to give a clear receipt for the said rent when duly offered to him; and that he threatens them with proceedings in the Court of Session unless they pay the old rent; and, whether the Government will take any steps for the protection of the tenants in this case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I am not aware of the facts stated in the Question. Assuming them to be correct, the matter involved is one that can only be decided by a competent Court of Law; and her Majesty's Government have no power to interfere.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—HOUSE OF COMMONS—POLICE ATTENDANCE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, The number of police officers employed in the House of Lords and the number employed in the House of Commons who received extra pay the whole year, and who receive extra pay during the Parliamentary Session, and what rank these officers hold; and, whether he can state the total number of each rank from each House that will be removed at the end of the Session under Sir Charles Warren's new Regulations?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): In the House of Lords one sergeant and six police constables, in the House of Commons one sergeant and nine police constables, receive extra pay all the year round. In addition to this, there is the night watch paid by the Office of Works, consisting of one Inspector, two sergeants, and 16 police constables. In the House of Lords 26 police constables, in the House of Commons two sergeants and 70 police constables, receive extra pay during the Session. The Chief Commissioner cannot say definitely how many of each rank from each House will be removed at the end of the Session; but there will probably be not more than seven men affected by the new Regulations.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—AR-RESTS FOR CONSPIRACY—HAND-CUFFING.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Under what powers and by whose orders were Mr. Sweeney, T.C., and other Loughrea shopkeepers who were arrested for conspiracy, &c., conveyed handcuffed to gaol; what are the Police Regulations with regard to handcuffing untried prisoners; were the handcuffs kept on the 11 men in question during a drive on cars of 22 miles, from Loughrea to Galway, after they were returned for trial, bail being refused by Mr. Townsend, R.M.; did the Queen's Bench afterwards grant bail to all the 11 men; and, what was the reason for handcuffing them?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The Inspector General of Constabulary reports that the Loughrea prisoners were handcuffed in accordance with the Police Regulations, the responsible officer having grounds to apprehend an attempted rescue. Under the Constabulary Regulations prisoners are to be handcuffed (1) if charged with the commission of any serious offence; (2) if persons of bad character; (3) if there are reasonable grounds to apprehend an escape, or attempted rescue, or violence. The handcuffs were kept on the prisoners until they were lodged in Galway Gaol, six of them having being sent by road, and the remaining five by rail from Athenry. It is the fact that Mr. Townsend refused to admit the prisoners to bail, and that bail was subsequently granted by the Court of Queen's Bench.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he had any objection to read the Regulations.

MR. MADDEN said, he had not got the Regulations with him.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that on the Estimates for the Royal Irish Constabulary I shall call attention to the difference in the practices existing in England and Ireland with regard to handcuffing of untried prisoners.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked, whether an attempt had ever been made to rescue a Coercion Act prisoner in Ireland?

MR. MADDEN said, he believed not; but proper caution was necessary on the occasion in question.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—PRISON REGULATIONS—PICKING OAKUM.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) (for MR. W. H. JAMES) (Gateshead) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether prisoners sentenced under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act have to pick oakum and break stones like other prisoners; and, whether the prisoners undergoing these sentences with hard labour have an extra allowance of food to those undergoing sentences without hard labour?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, they were under the same Rules as other convicted prisoners.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL FUNDS—THE SEAMEN PENSIONER RESERVE.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, as a Trustee of the Greenwich Hospital Funds, Whether having stated in his letter to the Treasury of October 18, 1886, as follows:—

“Their Lordships, as Trustees of the Greenwich Hospital Fund, no longer feel justified in diverting the revenues of this Charity, and the charge for the maintainance of the Seamen Pensioner Reserve must, they consider, necessarily fall on Parliamentary Votes,” he proposes to discontinue so diverting the said revenues?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The correspondence to which my hon. and gallant Friend alludes shows a divergence of opinion between two Departments as to the charges which legitimately appertain to the Greenwich Hospital Funds. The payment to the Seamen Pensioner Reserve is a liability which the Admiralty must meet; and if the Greenwich Hospital Funds are the only resources out of which this liability can be defrayed, they must be applied to this purpose.

INDIA—WATER SUPPLY AT RAWUL PINDI.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Native inhabitants of the City of Rawul Pindi are, in consequence of the energy of the Commissioner, Colonel Parry Nisbet, now supplied with fresh water at all seasons of the year, which is brought from the River Rawul by pipes laid underground, a distance of seven miles, into the city; if it is true that the cantonments, distant about a mile from the city, are obliged to draw from wells the majority of which run dry in the hot season; whether any recommendations have been made, suggesting the extension of the water supply to the cantonments; and, if so, for what reasons have they not been carried into effect; and, whether steps will be taken at an early period to give the large body of troops stationed at the cantonments the great benefit already conferred upon the Native inhabitants of the city?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): There is no official information at the India Office which enables me to reply to this Question. The matter is one which it is in the discretion of the Government of India to settle without instructions from the Secretary of State.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CORONERS' INQUESTS—REMOVAL OF A CORPSE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the circumstances attending the removal of the body, by the Coroner's officer, of the late Mr. J. T. Coleman, from the house in which he died (46, Benlede Street, Poplar) to the “East India Arms,” where the inquest was held; whether the Coroner's officer has the legal right to order the removal of a body, against the wishes of the relatives, for simple convenience or the despatch of business; whether he has legal power to call on the police to remove the body by force; and, whether he will grant a Select Committee to inquire into the question of public inquests, the necessity of the jury viewing the body, and the expediency of the present system of holding inquests in public-houses, with the object of seeing whether, by some change in the law, the annoyance, trouble, and cost of inspection and removal of the body could be prevented?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have obtained a Report from the Coroner on this matter. He informs me that the body was not removed to the "East India Arms," but to the nearest public mortuary, in accordance with the almost universal practice in the crowded parts of London. I have not been able to obtain a legal opinion as to whether the Coroner has a right to order the removal of a body, or whether, therefore, he would be entitled to the assistance of the police. I am not aware that any such general dissatisfaction exists with the present procedure that the appointment of a Select Committee is necessary. I understand that in most parts of the Metropolis arrangements are made to obviate the necessity of holding inquests in public-houses. The Coroner for East Middlesex informs me that he never holds an inquest in a public-house if he can avoid it; and at the present moment an application for the use of the Town Hall at Poplar is before the Trustees of that building.

POOR LAW—PENSIONERS AND ARMY RESERVE MEN.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether a large number of Pensioners and Army Reserve men are inmates of workhouses which they only leave for the purpose of receiving their pay, often returning for re-admittance the same day; and, if so, whether means exist by which the Guardians of the various Unions could attach the sums of money which become periodically due to such persons, in order to defray the expense of their maintenance?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board obtained particulars as to the number of Army Reserve men and military pensioners in workhouses on the 12th of November last. The total number of inmates of workhouses on that day was about 63,000. Of this number 88 were Army Reserve men and 530 military pensioners. As regards the latter, there is a provision in the 19 Vict., c. 15, s. 8, which enables the Guardians to arrange with the Secretary of State for the repayment from the pension of the amount of relief advanced to the pensioner, and in a large number of cases this provision is acted upon by the Guardians. The Guardians cannot, however, recover more than the cost of the relief granted to the man, although his pension may exceed that amount; and there are, no doubt, cases where the pensioner discharges himself from the workhouse with the view of receiving the balance of his pension, and when he has received it within a short time spends it, and again becomes an inmate of the workhouse. As regards the Army Reserve men, there is at present no similar provision; but, as already stated, the number of such men in workhouses is very small.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—TRIAL AND SENTENCE ON MR. J. HALPIN FOR THE ENNIS MEETING — COUNTY COURT JUDGE KELLY.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the following report, which appeared in The Star of June 21:—

"The sentence of three months' imprisonment passed on Mr. James Halpin for the Ennis meeting was yesterday confirmed at the Quarter Sessions by County Court Judge Kelly. An application to make the prisoner a first-class misdemeanant was refused. Colonel Turner gave evidence of the circumstances attending the meeting at Ennis in an old corn store. Judge Kelly: How is it you did not arrest the promoters of the meeting?—The Witness: They did not give me the chance.—Judge Kelly: Oh, yes, they did. They came down here from Dublin. It is hard to punish poor people, and allow these fellows, the organizers, to go free.—The Witness: I would be only too glad to arrest them if I thought I had a chance. The Judge: Their presence was quite enough. You had the placard and the articles in United Ireland calling on the people to go and hear Mr. Davitt;"

and, whether, if a prosecution is instituted, he will undertake that no part of the proceedings will be heard by Judge Kelly, in view of the fact that the prosecution was recommended by him?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the learned Judge did not admit the accuracy of the printed version of what occurred; and, as regarded the last paragraph, it was not intended to institute any further prosecution.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLINASLOE POOR LAW BOARD.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that in the Ballinasloe Poor Law Board the elected Guardians and the ex officio Guardians are nearly equal as regards numbers; that, owing to this fact, close and bitter contests have arisen from time to time at the election of Chairman and Deputy Chairman to the Board; why, having regard to this state of things, did the Local Government Board delay a fortnight before they replied to the objections sent to them against the election of Mr. John Gardiner as Chairman of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians; whether they have pronounced the action of the gentleman who presided at the election of Mr. John Gardiner, on the 4th of April last, as illegal, and have issued an order for a new election; whether he is aware that the gentleman who acted in this illegal manner had the sanction of the Local Government Board to act as presiding officer, and that he was voted into that position by the ex officio Guardians, and against the will of the elected Guardians, and that this course was at variance with the usage of the Board, which up to that time always got the Clerk of the Union to act as presiding officer at the election of Chairman; whether the Local Government Board have received a formal communication signed by six of the elected Guardians claiming the Chairmanship for Mr. Thomas Byrne, who got 18 votes, Mr. Gardiner getting 19 at the election of April 4, on the ground that some of the ex officio Guardians who voted for Mr. Gardiner had no legal right to vote; whether, at the election held on May 16, a formal protest was handed to the Chairman objecting to a new election on the ground that Mr. Byrne was the legally elected Chairman of the Board, and formal objections lodged against Major Thornhill, Mr. Orme Handy, and Mr. J. W. Potts, as having no right to vote at the election of Chairman; whether it is true that in the interval between the 14th of May, the day on which these objections were lodged with the Local Government Board, and the 23rd of May, the day on which the new Board first met, no answer to these objections had been received from the Local Government Board; that in consequence of such delay the Board had to adjourn, being powerless to go on with business while in a state of uncertainty as to their right to act as a legally constituted body; and, is it on account of this failure on the part of the Ballinasloe Poor Law Board to fulfil duties which, owing to the inaction of the Local Government Board, they were powerless to perform, that paid Guardians have been sent down to transact the business of the Union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, his answer to the 1st and 6th Paragraphs of the Question was in the affirmative. Last year a close contest did take place in reference to the election of Chairman and Deputy Chairman. That was not the case in 1886 or 1885. The Local Government Board communicated their decision to the Clerk of the Union one week after the formal protest in the matter was addressed to the Board. Therefore, there was no unusual delay. The Local Government Board had not pronounced the action of the gentleman who presided at the election of Mr. Gardiner as illegal. Upon the receipt of the objection referred to the Local Government Board sent down an Inspector to make inquiries; but while such inquiries were proceeding, and before the Board had arrived at its decision, a meeting was held by the Guardians on the 23rd of May; and it was of such a character, having regard to previous occurrences, that the Local Government Board felt constrained to relieve them of their responsibilities. There was nothing to prevent the Guardians performing their ordinary functions, pending the decision of the Local Government Board in regard to the alleged illegality in the election of Chairmen.

POST OFFICE—THE SCOTCH DAY
MAILS FOR THE CONTINENT.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, since the recent acceleration of the train service between Scotland and London, the Scotch day mails for the Continent have been sent by the evening's mail vid Calais instead of next morning; and, whether he will consider as to the desirability of giving the same rapid despatch to letters carried by the Scotch day express on Fridays for India, China, and Australia?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): An acceleration has taken place of the train which brings the Glasgow morning bag to London, and it has been found possible to send forward the same night the letters received in this bag for the Continent. The receipt of foreign correspondence in London at so late an hour is, however, attended with much inconvenience; and it is proposed from the 1st of July to despatch the Glasgow bag by an earlier train and to bring it to London by the East Coast route, so that a longer interval in London may be secured. When this change is made, I hope it may be possible to send forward not only letters for the Continent, but also letters for India, Australia, &c. There is, however, a greater difficulty in dealing with correspondence for India, China, and Australia than with correspondence for the Continent, because the mails for the East must be closed in London, whereas a portion of the correspondence for the Continent can be dealt with on the journey between London and Dover; and in promising that an endeavour shall be made to forward the correspondence for the East the same day, it must be understood that there may be occasions when it will be impracticable so to do. The same facilities will be afforded to Edinburgh as to Glasgow in respect both to correspondence for the Continent and to correspondence for the East from the first proximo.

SHOP HOURS REGULATION ACT— OVERWORK AT HACKNEY.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following case:—

“Summons were applied for on June 16, at the Dalston Court, by the Home Secretary of the Shop Hours Regulation League, against certain shopkeepers in Mare Street, Hackney, for having infringed the provisions of the Shop Hours Regulation Act. The applicant pointed out that, from observations he had himself made, certain of the shop-assistants were kept at work 80, 90, and even 100 hours a-week by the persons against whom the summonses were asked for. The magistrate, Mr. Horace Smith, refused to grant the summonses, unless the young persons thus overworked (and whom it was proposed to subpoena to give evidence) themselves attended and supported the application for the summonses;”

whether any person has the power to institute prosecutions under the Factory Acts and under the Cruelty to Animals Acts; and, whether he will call the attention of the magistrate to the fact that summonses under the Shop Hours Act have been always granted by the Lambeth, Wandsworth, Marylebone, and other Metropolitan Courts?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have been in communication with the magistrate on this matter. He did not refuse to grant the summonses because the young persons alleged to have been overworked did not attend to support the application; but because the applicant failed to give sufficient evidence. He had not communicated with the persons employed, and was not able to say whether any of them had been employed beyond the lawful time; but merely that certain shops were open at certain hours. Any person can institute prosecutions under the Factory or the Cruelty to Animals Acts. It is within the magistrate's discretion to decide whether or not a summons should be issued on the evidence brought before him; and I must decline to make any official representation to the magistrate on the matter.

ADMIRALTY—HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY AND CORONATION DAY AT THE DOCKYARDS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Birthday and Her Majesty's Coronation Day are kept as public holidays in the Dockyards as well as in other Government Offices; whether, on the occasion of the celebration of Her Majesty's Birthday on the 2nd instant, the 10 men employed on fire duty in the Devonport and Keyham Dockyards were on duty the whole day, and have received no extra pay or gratuity in consideration of the loss of their holiday, being told, on application, that they would receive nothing beyond their ordinary pay; whether these men are to remain on duty during the whole of the holiday to be observed on the 28th instant in connection with Her Majesty's Coronation; and, if so, whether he will consider their claim to some extra gratuity; and, whether, at the other Government Dockyards, men have to remain on such extra duty during Sundays and holidays; and, if not, why this stringent regulation is enforced at Devonport alone?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Her Majesty's Birthday and Coronation Day are both kept as public holidays in the Dockyards; but only the former is so observed in the Government Offices. In accordance with the Regulations which govern all the Dockyards, men who are retained beyond the ordinary working hours receive the extra pay laid down by scale for the performance of such extra duty, and there is no intention to depart from the instructions. I understand that the Regulations are uniform in this respect in all the Dockyards.

ADMIRALTY—DEVONPORT DOCKYARD —PAY OF LABOURERS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the labourers in the Devonport Dockyard are, or used to be, entered on the terms that they should receive 15s. per week, with a rise of 1s. per week at the end of two years, on the recommendation of their officers, and a second rise of 1s. per week at the end of seven years; whether the Order under which labourers now working in the yards entered has been cancelled; and, if so, when and by whom; and, if not, whether he will see that its terms are properly carried out; whether in the Dockyards other than Portsmouth the labourers are receiving from 18s. to 21s. a-week; and, whether these are the terms of hire upon which the latter entered?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The minimum pay of Dockyard labourers is 15s. a-week; but there is no stipulation as to an increase being given after certain periods. There has been no alteration in the Regulations in regard to the payment of labourers. The amount of pay given to labourers in all the yards is governed by the same Regulations—namely, 15s. to 17s. per week. It is only when employed on certain special duties that any extra pay is given, and all labourers are entered under similar conditions.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—MR. DILLON, M.P.—DISTURBANCE AT DUNDALK.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, after the committal to prison of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) at Dundalk on Wednesday, a body of armed policemen forced their way through a crowd who were peacefully listening to an address from the balcony of the Imperial Hotel; whether, at the same time, a party of Dragoons charged through the crowd with drawn swords from the opposite side; whether the police, with their clubbed rifles and swords, injured many members of the crowd, and placed one man's life in danger; whether there was any proclamation forbidding the people to assemble, or any warning given, or the Riot Act read, before the police and Dragoons wedged their way through the crowd, or any disturbance during the delivery of the previous address before the police commenced their attack; and, who ordered the police to force their way through the meeting, with what object, and by what authority?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The County Inspector of Constabulary reports that the facts are not as represented in the Question. A body of armed policemen did not force their way through the crowd; but as an escort of police with batons, having in charge three prisoners, were passing through the crowd which blocked the street immediately after the hon. Member had ceased to speak, the police were stoned and a rescue of the prisoners attempted. The Dragoon escort returning from duty did not charge the crowd. The Resident Magistrate ordered them to move through the crowd and assist the police in dispersing it. The Cavalry had their swords drawn as usual. So far as I can ascertain, nobody's life has been endangered. There was no proclamation, nor was the Riot Act read. The police did not attack the people; but by order of the Resident Magistrate endeavoured to clear the street, which was quite blocked, and to prevent further disturbance.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question as to whether there was any disturbance during the time that I was delivering my address; and is it not the fact that it was only when the solid body of the police, which the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned, forced their way through the crowd that was jammed in a narrow street, that it was then, and then only, that such stones were at all thrown.

Mr. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask him, arising out of his answer to the Question of the hon. Member, whether it is not the fact that some of the police got their rifles by the muzzles and hit their hardest at the heads of men who were endeavouring to escape?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Sir; I should think that the statement made in the last Question is not the fact; and with regard to the Question of the hon. Member (Mr. W. O'Brien), I do not mean to say that I am perfectly certain, but it is extremely probable that no disturbance occurred until the police were attacked. The disturbance then consisted of stone-throwing at the police, who were compelled to take notice of such unlawful action.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: Then do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman admits that no disturbance whatever took place, and that no stones were thrown, until upon the one side the Dragoons rode into the crowd, and upon the other side the police forced their way through them while they were peaceably listening to addresses like my own?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is not to understand that, nor is that the inference from my answer. What I understand was the police were escorting three prisoners, and when they arrived on the scene where the crowd was standing which had been listening to the hon. Gentleman the crowd proceeded to throw stones. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that the Resident Magistrate was fully justified in acting as he did.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give any answer as to why the force of police with a couple of prisoners should force their way through a crowd which was engaged in a perfectly legitimate occupation? Why could not they have waited, or gone round another way?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It seems to me that the hon. Member mistakes the functions of a public highway; it is not for the purpose of enabling anyone to gather a crowd together and to make a speech, but to enable persons to get from one point to another.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: I want to know, as a matter of fact, whether any warning was given the people that they were not perfectly within their rights in standing there and listening?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe, as I have already stated, there was stone-throwing by the people; and I do not know whether, under those circumstances, any further notice is required to be given.

PRISONS ACT, 1865—EMPLOYMENT OF THE TREADMILL IN PRISONS.

Mr. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the treadmill is still employed in the prisons of the United Kingdom; whether this form of hard labour has long since been condemned by prison reformers as cruel and unprofitable; and, whether he will consider the feasibility of substituting for it a kind of labour at once useful and more humane?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; the treadmill is still employed, as it is enjoined by the provisions of the Prison Act, 1865. I am not aware that this form of hard labour has been condemned as cruel and unprofitable. Whenever it is possible, the labour is utilized for the purpose of pumping or grinding; so it cannot be called useless, and I do not think it is inhumane.

GOLD MINES (WALES)—SPECULATIVE LEASES OR LICENCES—RIGHTS OF THE CROWN.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Crown claims the right to grant speculative leases or licences empowering the holders thereof to enter upon freehold lands in Wales adversely to the freeholder and to search for gold and silver thereon, even where the existence of such metals has not been proved, and thus indirectly to force upon the freeholder the alternative of taking a mining lease of such precious metals under his own lands; and, if so, under what statute or other authority such right is claimed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The Question which the right hon. and learned Gentleman asks me is, in reality, one of law, upon which he is as well able as I am to form an opinion; but, as I understand the law, in the absence of substantial evidence that gold and silver is to be found in the lands, the Crown does not claim the right to grant licences to enter upon lands adversely to the freeholder.

CRIMINAL LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ROBERT TRAVIS, CONVICTED OF MURDER—COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE.

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, having regard to the sentence of death passed on Robert Travis at the Chester Assizes, in May, 1886, for the murder of Mrs. M'Intyre, of the subsequent commutation of that sentence to penal servitude for life, and that his case was under the consideration of two Home Secretaries in succession, and that afterwards, on its reviewal by Lords Bramwell and Escher, Travis was released in the present month, he will recommend the Government to bring in a Bill, or to add a clause to the Criminal Evidence Bill now before the House, giving to a prisoner convicted of a capital offence an absolute or conditional right of appeal?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The question of appeal on questions of fact in criminal cases is one of such vast importance that I am afraid it is not possible to introduce a Bill dealing with the matter in the present Session; and it would be beyond the scope of the Criminal Evidence Bill to introduce any such clause into that measure.

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND BILL.

MR. RENDEL (Montgomeryshire) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed further with the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill, now standing on the Paper for Thursday next?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Yes, Sir.

NAVY—SEAMEN OF H.M.S. "ASIA"—PAYMENT OF WAGES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the seamen of H.M.S. Asia have been paid off; and, if not, how long it will be before they will receive the wages due to them; whether he is aware that the seamen of Her Majesty's ships are, as a rule, kept waiting for two or three weeks after the end of each quarter before receiving any payment; and, whether, if on inquiry this should be found to be the case, he will take steps to cause the men to be paid in future without any such delay?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): No orders for paying off Her Majesty's ship Asia have been issued. The men in sea-going ships are paid monthly, and in harbour ships weekly; but in order to make the quarterly settlement ordered by the Regulations, the last weekly payment in each quarter is held over the last day of that month. This defers the weekly payment at the end of each quarter for a few days. There seems to be no sufficient grounds for making any alteration in the Regulations.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—TRANSFER OF POWERS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the event of the clauses relating to the government of London, in the Local Government Bill, failing to pass into law this Session, the Government will, in consequence of the disclosures which have recently taken place, consider the propriety of dissolving the Metropolitan Board of Works, and of temporarily handing over the whole of its authority to, and of vesting its powers in, a Royal Commission, until Parliament shall determine as to the government of London by the creation of the proposed County Council?

Mr. Osborne Morgan

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am not prepared to admit the probability of the contingency referred to by the hon. Member; and therefore it is not at all necessary to consider what should be done in the event of such a contingency.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the First Lord of the Treasury. Whether there was any foundation for the statement that had appeared in the morning papers, to the effect that the Government intended to afford facilities for the discussion of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman gave me Notice of his Question as I came into the House. I have referred to the Order Book, and I find that the Bill to which the hon. Member refers stands on the Paper for Wednesday, 11th of July. Having regard to the great interest felt in the question in the country, and the excitement which has prevailed on the subject during the last few weeks, if the Bill is not reached on that day, I will endeavour to find an opportunity for the hon. Member (Mr. J. O. Stevenson) to take the judgment of the House upon it.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the Government intend to support the second reading of the Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the hon. Baronet will be content to wait for an answer to that Question until the Bill is reached.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Are we to understand that, if the second reading be passed, the Government will give further facilities?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I can undertake nothing of the kind.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONVICTIONS FOR CONSPIRACY—JUDGES' NOTES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, If the Solicitor General for Ireland could now inform the House of the number of persons under imprisonment charged with taking part in criminal conspiracy to induce others not to do what they had a legal right to do; and, further, if he can give any statement to the House as to whether it is intended to furnish the House with the notes of the Judges' decision in the conspiracy cases?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) asked for Notice of the Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he asked the Clerk at the Table to place his Notice of the Question, which was on the Paper on Friday, on the Paper for Monday. He did not know why it had not been so put down. Upon the first occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman asked him for further time, and now the Government had seven days' Notice of the Question; and surely they could inform the House how many persons might be, perhaps, illegally in custody upon a charge which the Exchequer Division had decided is insupportable.

MR. MADDEN repeated that he must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to give Notice of the Question. If he did so, the information would be at once forthcoming.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would put a Question on the Paper for tomorrow.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—IMPRISONMENT OF MEMBERS.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory) wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it was true that three Members of the House of Commons were in prison under the Crimes Act for precisely the same offence that two of the number—the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane)—were suffering as common criminals, while the third—the hon. Member for North Monaghan (Mr. P. O'Brien)—was treated as a first-class misdemeanant; what was the reason for that difference of treatment; and, whether it was just to visit the same offence with such widely disproportionate penalties?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I presume the gravity of the offence depends upon the surrounding circumstances, and I do not admit that the offences in all these cases were identical. Moreover, I believe those who administer criminal jurisprudence have never yet found a means by which absolute uniformity of punishment should be arrived at when the offences were identical.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Am I to understand that, as the Riot Act was not read at Dundalk, the Riot Act has been repealed?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

CRIMINAL CASES (IRELAND) (INCREASE OF SENTENCES ON APPEAL)
—THE RETURN.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will meet the convenience of this House if I make a statement in reference to the Return asked for by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). I did my best to have that Return printed, and the printers in Dublin worked the whole of Saturday and also on Sunday. I have got over at this moment 24 copies, and they are at the disposal of the House. I think, perhaps, the best method of distributing them will be to give them to the hon. Gentlemen who are in charge of the Business of the House, who will distribute them to those Members on both sides of the House who are in urgent need of them for the purpose of speaking.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): As it has been intimated to me that probably the debate on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) will not be concluded this evening, I beg to give Notice that at the Sitting of the House to-morrow I shall move that the adjourned debate have precedence of Notices of Motion and Orders of the Day. I also beg to give Notice that I shall move to suspend the Twelve o'clock Rule.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): At what time does the right hon. Gentleman propose that the House shall sit to-morrow?

MR. W. H. SMITH: At the ordinary hour, at 3 o'clock.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887.

RESOLUTION.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne), in rising to move—

said: With reference to the remark that was made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite a moment ago, as to the production of this Return, I may perhaps be allowed to say that I myself only received it, and I am indebted to his courtesy for it, at 2 o'clock this afternoon. All I have been able to gather from that Return, so far, is that it contains 61 pages and rather more than 2,000 cases. Among these cases it is quite clear, I should think, that there is a considerable number of unjust arrests, which were in consequence withdrawn. As to basing any argument on so cursory a survey of this elaborate Return, it is obviously impossible to do so. I will only begin what I have to say by remarking how singular it is that we were asked to discuss the introduction of the Crimes Act without any statistics or figures as to the crimes which were supposed to justify that Act, and that we are now about to enter into a discussion of the operation of that Act without having had any fair or reasonable time to digest the details of this Return.

In no quarter of the House will it be thought necessary that I should make any apology for interrupting by this Motion the Bill which would have been otherwise before the House. One of the Three Kingdoms has been for nearly a year placed by Parliament under exceptionally repressive legislation. Seventeen or more Members of this House have been imprisoned in consequence. In one gaol in Ireland at this moment there are more than 40 prisoners under this Act. Collisions between the police and the people have been of almost unexampled frequency. What is most important of all, perhaps, the High Court of Ireland pronounced the other day a judgment which is in effect discrediting to the most important part of the machinery by which this Act is worked. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) on Friday, when I gave Notice of this Motion, said that he understood it to challenge the conduct of the Government in every respect. Yes, Sir, in every respect. We challenge the policy of this Act, and its administration; we challenge its justice, we challenge its expediency, we challenge its wisdom, and we challenge even your allegations of its transient and temporary success. There are two special reasons why I have brought forward this Motion at the present moment. The first of those reasons is that peculiar difficulties have been experienced within the last few weeks in obtaining from the Irish Minister full and accurate information as to what has been really going on in Ireland. Questions have been asked with the object of eliciting information on the subject, and the replies of the right hon. Gentleman have led us to doubt, not his intentions, but his knowledge of what has been going on there. Out-of-doors the right hon. Gentleman has been guilty of more than one grave inaccuracy of statement. For example, in referring to the case of Mitchelstown, he said that the High Court of Ireland had decided that Leahy, the constable, who had been wounded, was legally occupied. I defied the right hon. Gentleman at the time to produce one syllable of evidence to show that the High Court of Ireland had ever said anything of the kind. I defy him now. The right hon. Gentleman made reference, in the matter of increased sentences, to a Return which he had before him, and the deduction from the surrounding arguments of the right hon. Gentleman was that we had gone beyond the mark when we said that increase of sentences of imprisonment under the Crimes Act was unknown to the law.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. That was not my argument, nor was anything of the kind said.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Certainly the inference drawn by most hon. Members on both sides of the House was the one I have indicated. I was going on to say that I have at this moment seen a full Return for the first time—since I came into the House to-day—and on the face of that Return it is obvious that not in any single case in the proceedings under the Crimes Acts was a sentence increased. I mean the Crimes Acts of 1881 and 1882. Again, the right hon. Gentleman came down one day not long ago—within this month—and told us that the certainty of justice being done was amply secured by the right to have a case stated in the Superior Court. A day or two afterwards he came down, and with a suavity—which from the point of view of accuracy of information I distrust almost more than his severer manner—he told us that the right of having a case stated was compulsory. We shall see presently how far that statement was calculated to enlighten the House as to the true facts of the matter. On another day, Friday last—although the minds of hon. Members of this House were so deeply exercised as to the treatment of prisoners under this Act—he actually said that he was not acquainted with prison rules. Questions are asked in this House every night as to the administration of these Acts, and they are answered by the right hon. Gentleman with statements that I should admire if they were bouts of College dialectic; but as the object is to bring out facts and to get the information we want, I think that it is most unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman does not tell us plainly, and without fencing, what we seek to know. A Question is asked; the official answer is given; there are more Questions and more answers, and then after the process has gone on for a certain time, you, Sir, in the just and proper discharge of your duty, interpose, and the end of it is that the House is in no degree enlightened, but leaves off with a sense of bewilderment and confusion, and it is thought that Ireland must be satisfied because we are tired. We protest against the assumption that a matter is threshed out merely because there is a cross-fire of Questions and answers. There is another reason why this Motion is made. A Member of this House whom we all on both sides regard with respect, although we may not all endorse his policy, has been sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months. I am told that it is a mistake in tactics to have brought forward this Motion now. Some persons seem to think that politics are mainly made up of tactics. As a matter of tactics, I might remind the House of the example set by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) in the Parliament between 1878 and 1880, when he and his Friends constantly brought forward Motions arraigning the conduct of the Government of the day, and were constantly beaten by immense majorities, varying from 100 to 140. But it all came to an end in 1880. And whatever may be the result of this decision—we know substantially what the result will be—[Cheers]—whatever that result may be in this House, we know perfectly well that by taking the same analogy in 1890 the result will be what it was in 1880. [Cheers.] The other night hon. Gentlemen cheered very loudly the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury's promptitude in fixing an early day for this Motion. [Cheers.] Yes; but you would not have cheered so loudly if the right hon. Gentleman had got up and told you that he was going to send you to your constituents on the issue raised by my Motion. When I remember that the hon. Member for East Mayo—I should like, Sir, to be allowed to call him Mr. Dillon, for the fact of his being a Member of Parliament is a matter of very little importance to him or to anyone else just now and for long months to come—has been down to address vast audiences both in England and Scotland, and he has before those audiences said very much what he said the other day in Ireland in respect of which he has now been imprisoned—for my part, I should have regarded myself as one of the most contemptible of men if I had consented, when the holidays came, to enjoy books and refreshment of mind and all the glories of the summer weather, when I knew that Mr. Dillon was undergoing a sentence of this severity, unless I had taken an opportunity of arraigning the whole Irish policy of the Government, which can only be carried out by straining Statutes in order to lock up a man of Mr. Dillon's influence, power, and popularity. I shall presently say a word or two as to the special circumstances of this arrest and imprisonment; but the great political moral which we at this moment, as the virtual rulers of Great Britain and Ireland, have to draw is one which I fear this House at this moment will not draw, but which our constituencies are drawing—that, after all that has happened in Ireland and in this country within the last eight years, and more especially within the last two years, you can only carry your policy out by an Act which in itself is an admission that that policy is a failure. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would deny that coercion is his only policy. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] He accepts that. Well, I notice that a few days ago he did the agent of an American newspaper the honour to grant him an interview. In the course of that interview he desired the agent to make a momentous communication to the American people, that he was maturing a policy, and that he had actually on the Table of the House three Bills—the Bills, I presume, for the better drainage of the Shannon and the Barrow. If he had said that he had a Bill for draining the Atlantic Ocean it would have been a matter of more lively interest to the American people, and not a whit more foolish as a policy for Ireland. I wish to say something now as to the scenes at Dundalk the other day. At every station on the road as Mr. Dillon went from Dublin to Dundalk the line was crowded with admirers. [Laughter.] The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) laughs. I shall have a word to say to him before I have done. At Drogheda there was a great assemblage of the people of the town, with the Mayor at their head. At Dunlear there was another great crowd, and another address was presented to Mr. Dillon. When he got to Dundalk there was an address presented from the Board of Commissioners, from the Board of Guardians; all the town was decorated as if, not a criminal, but a hero were coming. And the last address that Mr. Dillon received before he went off to gaol was one which is worthy of more consideration. It was an address from 150 Members of this House. Most of them are Members whom you yourselves would admit not to be lowest in repute, credit, honour, or substantial position in this House. They met this criminal to tell him that never before had Englishmen been so ashamed of this old story in the relations between Great Britain and Ireland, and never before so keenly alive to the meanness of visiting punishments springing from our own misgovernment of the Irish people on hon. Members of this House. These scenes are the latest outcome of nine months of coercion. They are the last fruit of the present policy of the Government, the last triumph of the policy of law and order and of the attempt to bring the mind of Ireland over to the side of England. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches know as well as I do that it is not only in Ireland, not only among politicians in this House, that great and profound sympathy is felt for this criminal. You know as well as I do that there are not three men in this House—I am not sure that there is more than one—whom our great audiences would more rejoice, and do more rejoice, to see and hear and receive with acclamation than the man whom you have chosen to put in prison.

In all these circumstances it is our duty to call the attention of the House to the conditions of his incarceration. I am not going at any length into the legal aspects of the matter, because this House is not the best tribunal for considerations of that kind. But there are one or two points which are of supreme importance in view of the character of the proceedings at Dundalk. The first is that Mr. Dillon was brought into a Crimes Court by the action of a Proclamation which was ex post facto. I do not dispute for a moment that, having issued the Proclamation, you had a right to try Mr. Dillon in a Crimes Court; but let us look at the state of the matter before the issue of the Proclamation. Mr. Dillon's speech was either an offence against the ordinary law or it was not. If it was not an offence against the ordinary law, then I remark in passing that it is clear that you will have to abandon your position that your Act creates no new offences. If it was an offence against the ordinary law, why did you not bring Mr. Dillon up before a Louth jury? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles. If he knows anything about Ireland at all, which I sometimes doubt, he must know that Louth juries are among the best to be found in Ireland. If, therefore, a Louth jury could not be trusted to secure a conviction in this case, what a testimony is that to the state of mind in Ireland towards your rule! Passing that by, let me remark that the speech was made, I think, on the 20th of April or thereabouts. When Mr. Dillon made that speech he made it subject to prosecution, if his offence was an offence under the machinery of the ordinary law. I beg the House to remember that. The Proclamation was issued a few days afterwards. Why? This Proclamation was issued solely, merely, and entirely to deprive Mr. Dillon of the protection, security, and guarantees which the ordinary law gave him. It was done entirely to bring him within the special machinery of this Act. Nobody contends for an instant that there was any crime in Louth or any threatened outburst of crime in the county. It is one of the quietest parts of Ireland. There was nothing in the state of the county to justify the Proclamation, and the upshot of my argument is that this Proclamation was issued to deprive Mr. Dillon of securities which were in full force at the time when he committed the offence; these securities you took away from him after the offence was committed, and then you punished him. Now, I put it to the House, can you wonder after a proceeding of that kind that people say, and say in England as well as in Ireland, in regard to retrospective legislation so alien as this to the whole spirit of English jurisprudence and English policy—that it was prompted by a desire not to punish a criminal but to reach a political opponent? So much for the Proclamation. And now there is another point. At the trial before the County Court Judge at Dundalk a legal point of some intricacy and importance was raised. Into that question I am not going to enter at this moment; but if this case had been heard before a jury, and if this point had been raised, Mr. Dillon would have had an opportunity of having his case reviewed. Mr. Kisbey refused to place on his order the grounds on which he convicted. The effect of this was that Mr. Dillon was prevented from having his sentence reviewed and its legality tested by a Superior Court. Mr. Kisbey declined to make what I believe is known as a “speaking” order, and by so declining he sheltered his own decision from review by a Superior Court. I shall have a good deal to say presently as to the practice in other cases, but I wish to make that point clear. Let me say at once that if Mr. Dillon's speech was illegal, if the Plan of Campaign is illegal, and if his speech was an incitement to resort to the Plan of Campaign, then, like all others who break the law, Mr. Dillon must have been prepared to face the consequences. But about the Plan of Campaign, may I say that it seems to me there is a great deal of loose talk about the matter? General terms, as we know—and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary knows this as well as I do—relating to all subjects get into circulation and are used to cover inconvenient facts. I only say one thing about the Plan of Campaign, which I said before in the House, and which I say now after a further and longer observation of it. So far as I can hear no substantial injustice has been done under it. I have never heard of a case where the reduction demanded and carried out by the operation of what is called the Plan of Campaign, and where there was a chance of comparing them, exceeded the reductions that have been made in the same or similar circumstances by the Land Commission. It will be found so. I believe my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has taken great pains to inform himself accurately and fully as to the precise circumstances attending Mr. Dillon's speech, and he will probably later on this evening describe all the details to the House. I have seen a number of documents, including a letter from a distinguished dignitary of the Church, which clearly show that the tenants to whom Mr. Dillon went to speak were originally right; that the whole dispute had its origin in the invincible hostility of Lord Massereene to combination; that his agent resigned because he refused reductions. [An hon. MEMBER: Was dismissed.] I beg pardon, was dismissed; that the question might have been originally settled on the terms now proposed by Lord Massereene himself; that the remaining questions at this moment are two—not reduction of rent, that is conceded—but the payment of costs in cases which have been taken to Superior Courts. They are very ready to invoke the Superior Courts when the object is to harry tenants. They are very careful to keep away from these Courts when it is a question of justice to the tenants. That is the first difficulty. The second difficulty is the reinstatement of those evicted men who have been leaders in the combination, and who are admitted to have been substantially in the right from the first. These are, I believe, the things Lord Massereene has been fighting for—the power of dealing with individuals and the power of resisting combination. There we have the whole situation and the whole secret of the administration of this Act in a nutshell. The process is this—a just reduction is refused, then there is a combination; and I am glad to think that in these cases there is a combination; then somebody makes a speech to the tenants, then the coercion machinery is invoked, the district is proclaimed, and the man who makes the speech is tried without a jury and gets a double sentence because he is a leader of great popularity and importance. We told you all along that the object with which the Crimes Act would be worked would be to prevent legitimate combinations. I admit that Mr. Dillon used words which, in my opinion—and probably in his own opinion also when he had had time to reflect upon them—were regrettable. “If any man broke himself from this combination”—I am quoting the words—“his life would not be a happy one.” I admit that that was regrettable language. [Cheers.] Yes; but do not let us have any cant about that. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham and the hon. Member for West Nottingham, I myself, and all who have known the history of Trade Unionism, know very well that language a hundred times more violent and dangerous was habitually used in connection with those disputes until you altered the Law of Trade Combination; and the remedy—the way to get rid of this language and the combinations which prompt this language—is to do with regard to agrarian combinations in Ireland what Parliament did for trade union combinations.

I venture now to quote the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, as explaining still further the object and intent of this Act. I hope I shall always speak of the hon. and gallant Member with respect, for he shows many popular qualities in this House. Here is a speech he made in the town of Ayr. He is reported to have said—

"He would never be satisfied, and his people would never be satisfied, until they placed their heels upon their necks."

[Colonel SAUNDERSON: Hear, hear!]

"It might be said this was a bloodthirsty policy."

[An hon. MEMBER: Rather.]

"If they only manfully came forward and assisted the Government in laying in Ireland that respect for life and property which was the foundation of the prosperity of every civilized country, they would be conferring upon the Empire an unqualified benefit, and an inestimable blessing upon Ireland, his country."

[Cheers.] Yes; but do not you see what you are thinking of is the defence of life and property in Ireland? What he and his friends, whose dupes you are—what they are thinking of is placing their heels upon the necks of the majority of their own countrymen.

Now a word as to equality of treatment. If Mr. Dillon had got up a meeting for promoting a Constitutional movement against the Government of this country, he would have been a first-class misdemeanant by the decision of Parliament a dozen years ago; he gets up a combination to induce a landlord to reduce his rent, and he is a common criminal. That is a difference which ought to make a deep impression on the minds of this House, as I am sure it will on the minds of people outside. Again, if Mr. Dillon had been a priest, he would have been a first-class misdemeanant. In all cases, I believe, except one, up to the present time, the priest has been treated as a first-class misdemeanant. Were they placed in prison clothes? You have boasted of your resolution to treat one man exactly as you would treat another; that you would have no respect for cloth or for a Member of Parliament—all those things show that the pretence of equality and impartial administration of the law is a farce and a mockery.

I will pass on to another point in support of this Motion. On May 17, 1887, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary came down to the House and told us this—talking of the Crimes Act, which was then under our consideration—he said—

"There will be an appeal in every case to a County Court Judge, and if, on legal technicalities, the County Court Judge is objected to, the Government will be prepared to consider a plan for giving an appeal in cases in which a legal difficulty may be involved to a still higher tribunal."—(8 Hansard, [315] 284.)

Now, Sir, that was surely a promise of a plan of appeal to a superior tribunal. My charge is this—that the Government not only did not last year consider or propose in Parliament any plan, but that they have, in administering the law with obstinate pertinacity on every occasion, moved Heaven and earth to prevent higher tribunals from dealing with legal difficulties. They have on every occasion used all the resources of what I feel bound to call chicanery to oppose testing nice points of law in Courts of real legal competency in Dublin. Would you not suppose that if there was a chance of a man being detained in illegal custody the authorities would rejoice at any opportunity being taken to have the disputable and disputed decision reviewed and considered? Sullivan's case was the first I can remember. He was brought up for conspiracy with others in refusing to shoe horses for Mrs. Curtin. An application was made to the Court of Queen's Bench for a certiorari. The Counsel representing the Crown—that is to say, representing the Government, who had promised the House of Commons to do their best to refer legal difficulties to a higher tribunal—argued with might and main that the Court of Queen's Bench had no power to go behind the warrant, and the Court of Queen's Bench refused the prisoner's application. Happily for law and justice, the ingenuity of the prisoner's counsel—who is a Member of this House—hit on the device of an application for a writ of habeas corpus to the Court of Exchequer. Here, again, the Crown Counsel struggled as hard as he had done in the Court of Queen's Bench to prevent a higher Court from testing the legal points in the decision of the two Resident Magistrates. This time the prisoner was successful. The Court of Exchequer decided the Resident Magistrates were wrong, that Sullivan was illegally detained, and he was ordered to be discharged. Take another case. A man named Brosnan was convicted of selling newspapers, and the magistrates in the Crimes Court refused to state a case for a Superior Court. Counsel for the prisoner applied for a mandamus to compel them to do so, Counsel for the Crown, as before, doing their best to obtain a refusal. In the result, owing to the ingenuity of the prisoner's coun-

el, the Resident Magistrates were directed to state a case; and the prisoner was released on bail, having undergone one-half of his imprisonment. The point on which the Resident Magistrates refused to state a case was one of great legal difficulty. I ask Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and other men of sense to realize to themselves the absurdity of a couple of ex-policemen hearing cases in a remote country town, far away from law books, and, without the opportunity of consulting with brother Judges, deciding nice questions of law which would puzzle the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer. To think of these things is to realize what a farce the administration of this Act is. I am sure the common sense and the intellectual integrity of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary ought to be revolted; but, so far from being revolted by it and taking steps to have the magistrates punished, the right hon. Gentleman coolly told the House of Commons that the ends of justice were amply secured by the existing right to have a case stated for a Superior Court. Existing right! What would have become of the existing right if my hon. Friend had not dug out of the law books precedents which enabled that right to be asserted and exercised?

A great number of the cases that have been brought before the House by Questions have been cases of refusal to deal, and they are of the greatest importance, because they have brought into the full blaze of a pretty fierce light the competency of the magistrates administering the Coercion Act. It is not to be denied by any lawyer that a man has a perfect right to abstain from selling to or dealing with another. An eminent Judge—Sir James Stephen—wrote an article just before the Coercion Act was brought in, in which he urged that, just as the driver of a hackney carriage is under a legal obligation to take as a fare or as a passenger any person for whom there is room and to whose admission there is no reasonable objection, so the same legal obligation to ply his trade should be imposed on a butcher, a baker, a chemist, a doctor, and, indeed, on everybody else. But neither Sir James Stephen nor anybody in the world is able to state that that is at present the law either in England or Ireland. If you wanted to make it illegal to refuse to deal, or to refuse to ply a trade, it was your business to have put a clause into the Crimes Act which would have made that change in the law. But you did not; and why? You may have thought you would have had some difficulty in getting such a clause through the House of Commons. I do not know why you should, considering that most of this Bill was passed in a lump without discussion. At all events, it was not proposed. But your Coercion Courts act just as if such a clause had been proposed and had been passed. I should like to give illustrations of the utterly odious way in which prosecutions for refusal to deal have been got up. Thank Heaven, there is no English word for it; we are obliged to use the jargon of Continental despotism, and to speak of the police acting as agents provocateurs. That is the expedient to which the Government have to resort. Here is the case heard at Fermoy, County Cork, of a man named John Moloney, who was charged with refusing to supply police constables. Two of them went into the shop, and the assistant refused to sell them a pair of boots they asked for. A few days afterwards, when the shopkeeper was in the shop, they went in and took up a small pair of boots and wished to buy them. The prisoner declined to sell them because they were required by a customer. One of the constables took up a second pair; the prisoner said he was busy attending to a customer, and the constable said he would wait. He then asked for any pair of boots in the house. The constables had been supplied with £1 by the District Inspector; and this is the cross-examination of one of them before the Resident Magistrates—

“What did he tell you to do?—He told me to get any pair of boots that were in the house. Was it for himself?—No. Any pair of boots you put your eyes on you were to get?—Yes. Did you go there by direction of your officer to entrap and ensnare this respectable man?—Certainly I went by directions. Was it for the purpose of a prosecution you went into these places?—I did not know at the time what it was for. Upon your oath, do you know the object for which you went in there?—Not at the time. Do you know it now?—Certainly. What was the object?—A prosecution. Did you want those boots or shoes for your own use?—No. Did you ask the price of the boots?—No. Is the District Inspector Jones you mentioned in Captain Plunkett's office?—I believe he is.”

There is another case of the same kind.

A number of men were brought up charged with taking part in a criminal conspiracy to compel and induce shopkeepers not to deal with Mr. Leader, a local landlord. He swore at the trial that he had never before dealt with these men, and that he could get the goods elsewhere in the town. This is part of the cross-examination of Mr. Leader—

“Why did you go to these men whose doors you never darkened before?—I knew they were the most hostile people in the town, and that is why I went. Did you expect you would be supplied?—I was sure I would not be served. Knowing you would not be served, why did you go, if it was not for the purpose of getting up a prosecution against these men? (Considerable hesitation.) Can you answer?—I do not deny that I wanted to get up a prosecution.”

There was no evidence of conspiracy; the only evidence was that there was a refusal to deal; and yet four of the defendants were sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment. In another case a number of persons were brought up at Mil-town Malbay, charged with refusing to sell goods to a woman named Connell. Again, there was no evidence of conspiracy, but only of a refusal to supply goods, and yet four men were sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour. They appealed; the sentence was doubled on appeal; and these men are in prison now, serving out the double sentence, for what, if the judgment of the Court of Exchequer be sound, is probably not an illegal act at all. One more case, again at Mil-town Malbay, in County Clare. Twenty-four men were charged with refusing to supply goods to the police. The case arose in this way—A trial of a number of persons took place in this town on the 4th of February, and as at a trial which preceded that by some days it was found that some of the people who had taken drink during the day got into collision with the police, the parish priest requested the publicans of the town to close their houses on the day of this trial. The publicans obeyed. Evidence was given by various policemen that on the 4th they went to every public-house, and knocked at the door, but could not obtain admission. It was admitted that the police had in barracks as much refreshment as they required. On a previous occasion, when there had been prosecutions, disturbances had taken place. On this occasion all was quiet. The Rev. Father White, P.P., for the defence, gave evidence that the public-houses were closed at his request. He wished to prevent the possibility of a collision between the police and the people. In all 24 publicans were proceeded against. All were found guilty, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment; but an offer was made to release them if they made a promise to supply the police in future. Eleven refused to give any promise and went to gaol; 13 promised to supply the police, and were released. The 11 were sent to a month's hard labour for refusing to supply the police with drink on that one day. Yet the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has said—“What we are now fighting for are the elementary principles of private liberty; what we are maintaining is the cause of law, because it is the cause of freedom.”

I now come to the Killeagh case heard last week. The charge there was that certain persons took part in a conspiracy to compel traders not to deal with members of the Irish Constabulary, and the defendants were sentenced to terms of imprisonment, the magistrates refusing to state a case. Against this refusal an appeal was made to the Court of Exchequer, and the actual words of the judgment have been reproduced in some of the English papers, but not in all. A constable said that he went into Heaphy's shop on the 16th of April to purchase some bread. Heaphy said that he would have nothing to do with it, but that his wife could give the constable the bread if she liked. The constable said that he put a shilling on the counter and saw some bread in the shop but did not get any. The Lord Chief Baron, in his decision on the case, said that there was a great deal of evidence that other persons on other days acted similarly towards the police, and he saw no reason to doubt that the magistrates had evidence from which they arrived at the conclusion that each of these persons had bread which they might have supplied if they had wished; and that their refusing to do so was in pursuance of common action. [Cheers.] Yes; but that refusal is not an offence at law. That is the point. Unless the element of conspiracy comes in and unless there is evidence of conspiracy no offence has been committed. What was the question which the two Resident Magistrates had to determine? The Lord Chief Baron said that it was whether there was evidence of conspiracy or what he called undue influence, and he said that he was bound to state that he did not find a shadow of evidence in that direction. There was another and most extraordinary case, that of David Barry. This man was asked for bread and he sold it. Afterwards he was frightened at what he had done, and said that he would rather give the bread for nothing than take money for it, adding—"I do not like being a black sheep any more than anybody else." This miserable man, who was frightened out of his life because he sold bread, was punished with a fortnight's imprisonment for joining in a conspiracy to intimidate others not to supply bread. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would appreciate the comedy. The Lord Chief Baron very naturally said that he could not see that there was any evidence of intimidation against the man, or that his terror of mind and fright was evidence against him. "It was mistaking the injured party for the person who was doing the wrong." Yet the injured party suffered a fortnight's imprisonment for intimidating, though all the evidence went to show that he was himself under intimidation. Is it not true that these magistrates' Courts are more like Courts at a comic opera than anything else? On the other cases the Chief Baron said this—

"Was there evidence from which they could bring home that act of intimidation to any of the parties who were parties to this common agreement? Was this statement of the police evidence against them, and evidence that they intimidated? Now, it was quite clear that it was no evidence against them at all. There was no evidence that Heaphy was a party to the conspiracy within the Act of Parliament; and the same observation applied to the other two persons who were in custody."

Now, this is very important, and will have the effect, I hope, of stopping a most nefarious practice and of showing to the people of Ireland that the administration of the Coercion Act up to this point and in all this class of cases has been nothing more nor less than a scandal. But there was another Judge on the Bench who used to be a conspicuous ornament of this House—Baron Dowse. He dissented from the Lord Chief Baron's view, that the Court of Exchequer were entitled to go behind the warrant and take cognizance of what was going on in the Court below. That makes his remarks all the more important. Baron Dowse said that Mr. Healy had asked the magistrates to state a case and they had refused. Then Baron Dowse went on to say that there were several things which he had never been able to understand in the course of his life, and one of them was the mind of a local Justice, and he was even less able to understand very often the state of mind of a local Justice, of whose legal competence the Lord Lieutenant was satisfied. How the two Justices in question, the Lord Chief Baron said, could have satisfied themselves that the point made in favour of the case being stated was a frivolous one he could not comprehend. Why these Justices did not in a proper way state a case for the opinion of the Superior Court, I say, surpasses my comprehension. I hope for the future they will be wiser, and they will not be of opinion that a point practically decided by the majority of the Court of Exchequer, substantially decided by the majority, and practically decided by the whole of it, that that is a frivolous point. Whatever they may think privately, I do not think they can lay that down generally. I think they ought to bear in mind that men that are brought up under this Act of Parliament have rights, and that it is far better that acts should go unpunished rather than that parties should be punished against the law or by straining the law. Then Baron Dowse read a passage which is more a piece of history, and it is taken from a book which, some think, is a greater book almost than Gibbon—I mean Finlay's History of Greece. Mr. Finlay said that—

"Where true liberty existed every agent of the Administration from the gendarme to the Finance Minister."

Baron Dowse supposed that Resident Magistrates, of whose legal competence the Lord Lieutenant was satisfied, would be included, though I should think the Resident Magistrate was much nearer the gendarme than the Finance Minister—

"Where true liberty existed, every agent of the Administration must be rendered personally responsible to the State for the legality of every act he carries into action."

This, the historian said, and we say also, is the real foundation of English liberty and of the great principle which distinguishes the law of England from some of the Continental nations of Europe. Now, I submit that this principle and these remarks of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer justify all that we said before this Act became law with regard to the Resident Magistrates, and they justify what I have said to-night, that neither their law, nor their common sense, nor their equity, are on so high a level as to make them safe substitutes for a jury. It exposes the absurdity of denying us the fullest criticism upon their action, and of blaming, as your Press does—and as, perhaps, you will do when you get up to defend your action—of blaming us for our criticism as an attack upon a body of men, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said, who, under rare difficulties, are vindicating with rare impartiality the cause of law and order in Ireland. Baron Dowse is a Judge of the land; it is he who says this of your Resident Magistrates, and I need say no more.

The arm of the Coercion Act under this Ministry is very long and very powerful. It can grasp a great political Leader, and also the most miserable waifs and strays of humanity. I will give the House an illustration. This case happened in May, and it has already been before the House in the form of Questions; but I think the House should hear the story. It is the case of an old man and his wife charged with "taking forcible possession" of an outhouse after they had been turned out of their holding. They had nowhere to go to, unless they lay down to die on the roadside. The agent who went to the place, in his evidence before Messrs. Warburton and Caddell, the magistrates, said—

"I closed up the door; I nailed up one door, and built up the other one; I put up a hasp and a staple to the dwelling house and built up the outhouses with stones. I next visited the place the same evening; I found a woman in possession of one of the outhouses, and saw himself going in after. The defendants are husband and wife; I asked them both to leave, and the female replied that they had no place to go to, and that the weather was cold."

The following conversation then took place—

"Dr. Levis (the landlord).—'I would ask you to deal leniently with them.' Mr. Warburton.—'It is a long time to keep possession since February.' Dr. Levis, J.P.—'Yes; but I am the person who has suffered most by it, and I would ask you to deal as lightly as you can with them, as they will give up possession to the parties with whom they agreed.' Mr. Warburton.—'How long have they been treating with him?' Dr. Levis.—'I cannot say, as it was only this morning for the first time they came to me, and they then said they were prepared to give up possession.' Mr. Warburton.—'Now, in this case both of you have made yourselves liable to a penalty of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. You have been keeping possession of this place in spite of all remonstrances and cautions of police, bailiffs, and everybody else, and you have been there for nearly three months—since the 20th of February. The Act leaves no option to us but to impose imprisonment. However, as Dr. Levis has said so much for you, we will take it into account.' The magistrates then sentenced the old man to one month's imprisonment, and his wife to a fortnight. Female Defendant.—'Oh, make it a fine on the old man; he is very delicate and feeble.' Dr. Levis.—'I hope you'll reduce the imprisonment in the old man's case.' Mr. Warburton.—'We cannot, Dr. Levis. It is a long time to be over-holding possession.' Female Defendant (weeping bitterly).—'Oh, we never went to gaol before, and the poor old man is delicate. Wouldn't you put a fine on him, gentlemen?' The Bench were inexorable."

Thus, an old man of 75 years of age, scarcely able to stand, and so deaf that he knew nothing of what went on during his trial, was sentenced to a month's imprisonment for the "crime" of taking shelter from the inclemency of the weather in an outhouse on the holding from which he had been evicted. Now I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has released these two poor wretches; I daresay he has. But whether he has or not, what a light this case sheds on the temper in which your Act is administered! I will not detain the House much longer. I think I have said enough. Instead of keeping the House for an hour, I could keep it for three hours with cases of this kind if the conditions of debate would permit. But I want to state one or two pieces of evidence as to the effect of all this harshness, this brutality—this odious brutality—on the minds of the people. As to increased respect for the law, has it promoted even quiet or the exterior observance of the conditions of order and peace? It has not. One of the sections of the Crimes Act which the House will remember that we had prolonged debates upon is what is called the Star Chamber Section, allowing private preliminary inquiries to be held without any prisoner being arrested. That section has been put in operation in the county of Donegal; and I just want to read to the House the evidence of a man whose authority and weight will not be denied. You are very fond of attaching importance to Ecclesiastical Rescripts. This is a little Rescript from the Bishop of Raphoe; and this is what he tells the Government as to the effect of their Star Chamber inquiry in the county of Donegal. He says—

“For the maintenance of good order among the people I am, by my position, more deeply concerned than any magistrate, and I cannot look on without protest while some of the most peaceful districts in Ireland are being thrown into a state of utter confusion by the needless operations of a secret Coercion Court.”

Dr. O'Donnell, Bishop of Raphoe, then goes on to describe the work of that Court to be “a standing menace to peace and incitement to violence.” He says—

“The little town of Dungloe is in the midst of a population whose character for intelligence, industry, and peacefulness is not surpassed by the good name of the inhabitants at any point on the Irish seaboard. Until a few weeks ago its townspeople lived in a state of enviable quietude, such as the strained relations between landlord and tenant would allow few neighbouring districts to assume. As a matter of fact, the locality has always been remarkable for the amicable settlement of agrarian disputes. . . . A Resident Magistrate thought well to establish his Star Chamber in its midst. The leading men of the town were summoned on short notice before him, with no option but to decline answering or appear before the public in the odious character of informers on their neighbours. . . . These townspeople of Dungloe, some of them in a most delicate state of health, were made to come from Derry Gaol long journeys on outside cars at late hours of the night, and in torrents of rain, rather than have the name of yielding to the behests of this mischievous Court. I implore the people to be true to their Christian duty, to Ireland and to themselves, by not allowing even such insensate provocation to drive them into violence. They have not begun the disturbance. Let the whole responsibility of disorder rest on those whose tyrannical administration has called it into being.”

That case is only one of many others showing the course which these proceedings run in Ireland at the present moment. Some sort of action is taken in a Coercion Court; a crowd assembles to greet the prisoners; the police very needlessly attempt to disperse these, for the most part, innocent and harmless crowds; then a disturbance begins, bătuning and bludgeoning begin, and disorder spreads. But all this has no effect in drawing the minds of the people towards your Government. They are not reconciled to it; they take every opportunity, on the contrary, great or small, of showing that their sympathies are for those whom you imprison, and that they have none for you or your law. Sir, I shall not be suspected, even by hon. Gentlemen opposite, of exulting in that. I do not. It is the object of all of us to bring the minds of the people of Ireland into something like harmony and sympathy with our law and government. But what do we find on every occasion? I never take up The Freeman's Journal or some other Irish paper without seeing an account of some demonstration by a crowd with bands and cars to escort somebody to prison, or to escort him on his way out of prison. Last Friday there was a priest brought up at Limerick for holding an unlawful meeting on the River Shannon. He went out in a boat, and five other boats joined him about 400 yards from the Clare side. The wind was blowing from the shore, and the tide was ebbing, but still the police heard enough words uttered to make a case for the Crimes Act Court, and I do not object to it; but when the priest went to the Court he was followed by a large contingent on cars and horseback, and one car carried a boat on the top of which was the inscription “Going to gaol for boating.” When they got to Limerick again the prisoner was greeted by a large crowd; again there was disorder and a collision with the police; and, after all the importance attached to the action of the clergy in keeping the peace in Ireland, a conference of the priests of West Clare met last Friday and passed a resolution—

“That the prosecution of Father Gilligan only raises him in our estimation, and is another proof of his readiness to endure suffering in the cause of our oppressed people.”

How long, I ask, is this to go on? Under such a system as this—a system which has alienated and is alienating the minds of the people from the law, and throwing all their sympathies on the side of the offenders against the law—under that system no civil virtue can ever grow or ever thrive. The gross, savage ill-usage of the people, of the humble people, whom it is desired to terrify, the needless arrests, the humiliation, the constant intrusion and dominion of the police everywhere—that is no atmosphere for the preparation for freedom. But the just spirit of England recollects itself and is awake.

I do not appeal to that spirit merely outside of this House; I appeal inside this House to the experience and the principles which have made England what England is, and I protest against blind and futile persistence in the principles and the practices which have made Ireland what Ireland is. This House may not, will not assent to my Motion, but I hope that hon. Members will lay seriously to heart the true character of what is now going on in Ireland. I do not want to make this speech an attack on the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary personally in any way. He is not more responsible than the majority of this House. He is only doing logically—rather harshly—what you gave him an instrument to do. But on you a great responsibility rests. I am quite aware that you have no intention of shirking that responsibility, and I am quite aware that my hon. Friends here do not shirk this responsibility. But I say that the responsibility is a grave one; I say that the state of Ireland is becoming not better from day to day, but is becoming worse. I ask you at least, if you will not vote for my Motion, to weigh its propositions; and I think that before many months are passed, if you test those propositions by all that comes up from Ireland, you will see the necessity for doing away with a system which is deepening the confusion in Ireland, and which tarnishes the credit, the honour, and the renown of this Parliament and of the people of this country. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the operation of ‘The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,’ and the manner of its administration, undermine respect for Law, estrange the minds of the people of Ireland, and are deeply injurious to the interests of the United Kingdom.”—(Mr. John Morley.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George’s, Hanover Square): Mr. Speaker—[Interruption—I had hoped to begin by complimenting the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House on the spirit of, at least, the end of his eloquent speech. But I cannot compliment him on the spirit in which his allies seem disposed to listen to a reply to that speech. Mr. Speaker, I cordially endorse one sentiment that has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, when he said of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that he was not responsible for what is now proceeding in Ireland, but that that responsibility rests upon the Government as a whole, and on the majority which elected them. [Cries of “No!” and Interruption.]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): You had no mandate from the Election.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am really surprised that when this side of the House has listened without one single interruption to the speech we have just heard, in the very first sentence—and one, I hope, not conceived in any aggressive spirit—an endeavour should be made to interfere with the reply. It is not on my own account, but I think I may venture to say on account even of the dignity of these debates and the greatness of the issues at stake, that hon. Members opposite must try to contain themselves. I must apologize if I have been somewhat warm in these remarks; but the task is a great one to reply in a debate of this kind, and I wish to do so at least with consecutive reasoning—

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Go on.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman says “Go on.” I intend to go on; but the right hon. Gentleman has never been interrupted in the opening of his speech, as I have been now. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was accepting, on behalf of the Government, the responsibility of what is proceeding in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman appealed to the experience of the principles that have made England what it is, and he said—“Let us apply them to Ireland.” We are applying to Ireland the principles that have made England what it is; but it is owing to the persistent effort made on the other side to introduce a new standard of morality, a new standard of law, and a new interpretation of the duties of citizens, that Ireland is what it is. The right hon. Gentleman said, at the beginning of his speech, that he was asked to discuss this question without having full information in his hands. I do not know that he was asked to discuss this question.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I was obliged to do so.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, as a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman said he was asked, and he says now that he was obliged. But the challenge he made to this House was placed on the Table, I presume, with full knowledge of the facts, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman cannot complain that it was necessary to supplement that which was already in his knowledge with fresh facts before he discussed the Motion on the Paper. We noticed that there was a little consternation at the moment when we accepted his challenge. We were struck with the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), instead of asking that the question should be immediately discussed, said that three or four days afterwards he would ask the Government for a day.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Nothing of the sort. I asked that a day should be fixed at once.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman is really defective in his memory. He got up in his place, after the Motion had been read by the right hon. Gentleman, and said that he would on Monday next ask the Government to fix a day. That was three days.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The next Parliamentary day.

MR. GOSCHEN: Then Friday is not a Parliamentary day for that purpose? Why did not the right hon. Gentleman ask for a discussion at once? We were perfectly prepared to meet this Motion—in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne—in every respect. The right hon. Gentleman said he was going to challenge the Government in every respect. Well, we are prepared to reply to him in every respect. I call the attention of the House to the words of this Motion. They are these—

“In the opinion of this House, the operations of the Criminal Law and Procedure Act and the manner of its administration undermine respect for law, estrange the minds of the people of Ireland, and are deeply injurious to the interests of the United Kingdom.”

One would have thought from this Motion that there existed in Ireland respect for the law which we had undermined, that this country was in possession of the affections of the Irish people, which we, by our procedure, were estranging. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman did not address himself to this part of the case, and, indeed, it would have been difficult for him to attempt it. Our Predecessors did not bequeath to us in Ireland a state in which there was respect for law, or any hope of affection on the part of the majority of the Irish people for this country; and, in fact, those who have got good memories will find that speeches, extraordinarily like the speech just delivered, have been delivered, only in somewhat more violent language, against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and his Friends by their present allies. Undermining respect for the law was one of the favourite expressions used by hon. Members now sitting below the Gangway at the time when the right Gentleman was supreme. I have wondered from what pen this Motion must really have proceeded. Was it from an Irish pen or an English pen? I thought that possibly it was rather an English pen, which had assumed that respect for law had existed previously, the existence for which has always been denied by hon. Members below the Gangway. But a more accurate examination of the case seems to reveal the fact that this Motion is only a translation of passages spoken in 1883 by hon. Members from Ireland. There is an extract from a speech of the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) which sounds very like the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. Speaking in August, 1883, the hon. Member said—

“The whole system of Crown prosecutions in Ireland was . . . infamous. The Government, by using this system, were responsible for all the crimes committed last winter in Ireland. The system created more crime than it punished, besides disgusting and disheartening anyone who desired to have respect for the law.”

That is a confirmation of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. There are other extracts which show that what we are now going through is but a kind of reduplication of debates that took place under our Predecessors, and there is no single charge made at present which—with a difference in details—has not been made in previous Parliaments. The hon. and learned Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin (Mr. T. C. Harrington) said of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—

"The means by which the right hon. Gentleman had worked up the Administration in Ireland had done more to injure law and the administration of justice than any system which was ever introduced into any country in Europe."

In another speech the hon. and learned Member said—

"If they would study the working of the law in Ireland, instead of being surprised that the law was not respected, they would be surprised that the law was even so much obeyed as it was."

Well, it may be the case that the law is respected in Ireland, or that it is not; but let it be observed that if in their whole tone and spirit these speeches are but a parallel to those made now, there is this great difference—that when you examine the charges that are made by the right hon. Gentleman they are light indeed in comparison with the charges that used to be made against the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. At all events, I think it must be said that we now know the worst. We may accept it that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, though he said that he could continue it for many hours, at all events contained the choicest specimens of maladministration on which he could lay his finger. Let us remember the fierce light—to use the right hon. Gentleman's own words—now beating upon every magistrate, every police constable, every Police Inspector, every Judge in Ireland. Never has an Administration been subjected to such Argus-eyed watchfulness on the part of its opponents as the present Administration. Yet, after all, with the ubiquitous power of the League in every quarter in Ireland, and with all the means at the disposal of hon. Members opposite for the discovery of everything that goes on, we now know, as I said, the worst—we know the substance of the case that is to be brought against us, and the House will be able to judge whether it justifies the sweeping condemnation that our Administration undermines respect for the law—that respect for the law which we are endeavouring to enforce. The right hon. Gentleman certainly adduced one or two pathetic cases, and one in particular; but I think that if we were to make the attempt it would be found that there are still in Ireland, though in reduced numbers, cases of oppression due to the action of the National League, which are as revolting and as heartrending as any scenes which have been placed before the country in connection with Ireland in times past, and I think it only right that one or two such cases should be brought before the notice of the House. One would have gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the state of Ireland was perfectly peaceable, that all social and agrarian trouble was at an end, and that, but for the appearance of the police on the scene occasionally, we might hope to see a contented and peaceful Ireland. Well, Sir, is that the fact? Will the right hon. Gentleman himself contend that it is the fact? Is not the right hon. Gentleman one of those who, above all others, is aware that the agrarian and political questions are separate? He has been anxious that they should be regarded as separate; but when he makes it his argument that those engaged in this agrarian struggle are practically political prisoners he forgets his own contention and his own principle which lies at the bottom of many of his views and his speeches. Now, the main substance of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was the case of Mr. Dillon, which he dwelt on at great length—and I speak of Mr. Dillon as he himself spoke of him, by his name. At the commencement of his remarks on that part of the case, he dwelt upon the importance of that hon. Member in this House—he dwelt upon the respect in which Mr. Dillon was held in Ireland, and pointed to the serious character of the imprisonment of a Gentleman who was so dear to the whole people of Ireland, and who was fêted on the road to prison. Does the right hon. Gentleman forget that there is another hon. Member of this House whose influence in Ireland even exceeds the influence of the hon. Member who has been imprisoned? Does he remember the case of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), who was imprisoned by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian? Had that hon. Member not also a position in Ireland such as that which the right hon. Gentleman now claims for the hon. Member for East Mayo? But I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman introduced the subject of that influence if he did not, and could not, prove that the hon. Member was unjustly imprisoned. The right hon.

Gentleman said he was no lawyer, and would not deal with the merits of the case; but he proceeded, nevertheless, to dwell at considerable length on the merits of the case. He admitted, indeed, that the language of Mr. Dillon was culpable, but suggested, as I understand, that the language was not illegal. He was not very clear on the point—that is to say, on the subject of the legality of the Plan of Campaign; but it came to this—that the Plan, in his judgment, at all events, had never wrought any injustice. Legal injustice it might have wrought, but not substantial injustice. But does he found upon that argument the doctrine that the Plan of Campaign is not illegal? The right hon. Gentleman is naturally silent—he must be silent, because the Plan of Campaign has been pronounced to be illegal by the very Judge whom he has been quoting with approval. Now, there is every respect shown for the judgment of Chief Baron Palles; but Chief Baron Palles himself has condemned the illegality of the Plan of Campaign. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured very assiduously in this House to treat the offence of the hon. Member for East Mayo as a political offence; but that is one of the charges that is always made against the Government and the majority in the country. The charge is that we are imprisoning men like the hon. Member for East Mayo and other hon. Members, not for acts illegal in themselves, but because they are our political opponents. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), in face of his own experience of the time when he was Home Secretary, accuse us of throwing political opponents into prison? Does he, sitting next the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, contend that the hon. Member for Cork was put into prison because he was a political opponent of his right hon. Friend? And if you do not hold that with regard to yourselves, by what right do you hold it with regard to men every whit as honourable as yourselves, and who are as anxious to do their duty by Great Britain and by Ireland? How can you say that in our case we are endeavouring to put our political opponents into gaol? I will leave it to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) to prove, at a later stage of the debate, why he contends that in our case we imprison men because they are political opponents, while in his own case he would contend that such a charge ought never to be made. I will examine the point whether it was for a political offence and as a political opponent that the hon. Member for East Mayo was put into prison. The admission has been made that his language was culpable; and the Plan of Campaign which he advocated has been condemned by the Judges in whom hon. Members on the other side have most confidence. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) did not read out any portion of the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo; but I think it right to bring out distinctly the point which he was urging—

“I say that when I recommended the Plan of Campaign as a policy to the tenantry of Ireland, I did it deliberately, and I never concealed from the people of Ireland that I believed in it, because it is a policy that would make the fate of the traitor an unhappy fate.”

[Cries of “Go on!”] Yes; I am going on. This is not an expression, therefore, which dropped casually from the hon. Member in the heat of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman said that we ought not to have any cant about those words, and he spoke about the Trade Unions of this country, and of the melancholy revelations that were made in connection with them. But I never remember—I wonder whether he does—any man holding the great position of a Party Leader such as the hon. Member for East Mayo in the face of his countrymen not only palliating, but defending and recommending, a policy which would make “the fate of the traitor an unhappy one.” This is the plan which is condemned by the highest authorities of the Church to which the hon. Member belongs. [Laughter.] It cannot be denied. Hon. Members may jeer at it in this House; but if the right hon. Gentleman opposite quoted an Ecclesiastical Rescript from one Bishop in Ireland which he said we should not like, I think I am entitled—he having introduced the subject of Ecclesiastical Rescripts—to say that this was precisely the crime which was denounced by the highest authority of the Church of Ireland.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Would the right hon. Gentleman read on as he promised?

MR. GOSCHEN: Hon. Members will have the opportunity of reading the whole of the speech of the hon. Member; but I have more to read. After a recommendation of the Plan of Campaign and recounting its triumphs, he concluded—

"I have come here to say I counsel the people of Ireland, whenever they are unjustly treated by their landlords, to adopt this policy and to work it well."

And well they worked it where they dared! We know the methods by which it is worked, and we know the sanctions by which it is worked, and the incidents to which it leads after it has been worked. We know the effects of the policy that would make the "fate of the traitor an unhappy fate." And this is the language of an ally of the right hon. Gentleman, who says we are "undermining in Ireland respect for the law." In this respect for the law which is enforced in language such as I have quoted? Sir, it is this law which we would wish to undermine; it is just this law which we are endeavouring to do our best, in the face of an opposition such as never before has been directed against the Executive Government in Ireland, to supersede by the law of the Queen.

An hon. MEMBER: Read the context.

MR. GOSCHEN: Hon. Members wish for more of the hon. Member's speech. He said—

"I say that I like it—the Plan of Campaign—better now than I ever did before, and I say to the tenants of Lord Massereene that if they stand to their guns like honest and brave men I pledge myself that as long as I live, and the men who are working along with me, they will have at their backs the support of Irishmen and the Irish race all over the world."

They will have at their backs the support of the Irish race all over the world while they are working the policy that would make "the fate of the traitor an unhappy fate." [A laugh.] I observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, by a solitary cheer, endorses that policy of the treatment of traitors. But, then, hon. Members may possibly assume that it is on account of the poverty of these tenants that the hon. Member for East Mayo went down to that estate. Now, on the question whether it is only in defence of poverty that these methods are adopted, we have the evidence of Father M'Fadden, of Gweedore, who, on the 17th of April, 1888, said—

"Mind, I give no thanks to a man for not paying rent because he is not able to pay. That man deserves no thanks; he deserves no applause. It is not in the cause of poverty that we are fighting."

It is well known that—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Where are you quoting from?

MR. GOSCHEN: That is taken from The Derry Journal of the 20th of April. I hope that is a satisfactory reference. It is rarely that we are able to satisfy hon. Members below the Gangway by these quotations; but this, I presume, is the authentic language—the unchallenged language—of one of those gentlemen who are encouraging the tenants in that Plan of Campaign for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle and his Friends have now no word of condemnation. That is the spirit in which they are fighting. It is not in the cause of poverty; it is not to rescue these tenants from the effects of bad seasons—

"We do not thank the man who cannot pay his rent, but we do thank the man who, being able to pay, will not pay his rent, in order to promote the objects of the National League."

I was trying to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in his discussion as to the parallelism between this agrarian "combination"—that is the favourite word—and the Trade Union combination. Said my right hon. Friend—"These Trade Unions have given up their crime because their proceedings have been made legal; do the same as regards the combination of the tenants, and crime will cease in their case also." That was substantially my right hon. Friend's argument, I believe. I hope I am not misrepresenting him. I judge by his silence that that is his argument. I invite the House to follow me in this. He says that as we have legalized Trades Unions, so we ought to legalize combinations amongst tenants in the direction of the Plan of Campaign. But is there no difference between the two? In the case of Trade Unions the combination is that a certain number of persons say—"We will all together refrain from doing that which we have a perfect right to do, and a perfect right not to do." On the other hand, the tenants in their combination under the Plan of Campaign say—"We will all together combine to refuse to pay our just debts which we are bound by law to pay, which we are able to pay, and which, by a law passed by the Administration of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was the head, was considered to be a fair rent." And Her Majesty's Government are asked to pass a law by which tenants are to be allowed to combine in order to agree together to pay the rents, which are due to the landlord, to some other person until they—the landlords—accept any proportion of the rent which the tenants are willing to allow them. I think I may say that a more preposterous suggestion was never made by a responsible statesman, and that is not the whole of the position, because these tenants, while they are to be authorized by law not to pay that which they are now bound to pay, are, nevertheless, to remain on the landlord's property as long as they like. I confess I should like to see the draft of the Bill which would carry out the views of the right hon. Gentleman. What I wish to impress upon this House is this—and I think hon. Members opposite will agree with me to a certain extent—that this agrarian trouble is only indirectly connected with the political trouble. Supposing you were to grant Home Rule tomorrow, would the Plan of Campaign still be necessary or not? That is a point upon which the right hon. Member for Newcastle ought to be able to give an opinion, because it is he who says that this agrarian question ought to be settled before Home Rule is granted. I wish to put it to the House, would the Plan of Campaign be necessary if Home Rule were granted?

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Certainly not.

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly not. The hon. Member has given an answer which I am prepared to accept. But if not, why not? Would the tenants suddenly get richer, or be better able to pay their rents?

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Yes; but as the right hon. Gentleman has asked me, it is because the tenants would then get the benefit of the legislation from which they were excluded by the Act of last year.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN: Quite so. That is just what I expected. There would be fresh agrarian laws passed by an Irish Parliament, which would render all Plans of Campaign unnecessary. That is precisely the contingency expected and foreseen by the right hon. Member for Newcastle. He knows his friends. He is acquainted with the tendencies of their prospective agrarian legislation. He knows it would be no longer necessary to send the police, or to despatch the most eloquent of their Members to endeavour to persuade the tenants not to pay debts which they are prepared to pay, and which they would pay but for such interference. It would not be necessary, because they would be relieved by law from all inconvenient payments. But then I say that one sees that, after all, it is not a political object for which they are contending, but it is through the political agitation that they wish to attain the agrarian result which they have in view. It is not the political offender, but the agrarian offender, who in this case is condemned by the law of the land for language which was an incitement for those not to pay, who, by the confession of Father M'Fadden himself, are able to pay. It was for that he was thrown into prison. Then the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the procedure, and shows that it was by the retrospective operation of the Act that Mr. Dillon was convicted. But the right hon. Gentleman did not contend—and it is most important that this should be thoroughly understood—that it was any retrospective creation of a new offence. That was not the contention. The attempt is sometimes made in the Press to suggest that our action amounted to making that an offence which was not an offence before. But that was not the case, and the precise procedure was discussed in the House, and it was decided that after a district had been proclaimed the procedure in that district should be under the Crimes Act and not under the ordinary law. I trust I have made the point plain to the right hon. Gentleman. "But," he said, "why not proceed under the ordinary law? Why not appeal to a jury?" Surely, said he, even I might know that a Louth jury would be a good jury, and a jury on which reliance could be placed. But I do not know whether the right hon.

Gentleman forgot that with regard to an admitted offence, for which Mr. Dillon was tried by a Dublin county jury, the jury disagreed, and the right hon. Gentleman himself brought home to us the probability of a jury being influenced, when he dwelt upon the extraordinary enthusiasm with which Mr. Dillon was received in every direction as a prisoner, so that he himself made out a case for the application of the procedure under the Act. Well, Mr. Speaker, so much for the case of Mr. Dillon. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has gone through many individual cases, some of which will be dealt with by the Solicitor General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary, when they address the House. Of course, the House and the country will see the great advantage that right hon. Gentlemen opposite and hon. Members from Ireland have in choosing their line of attack, as it is impossible to foresee all the particular cases on which they will dwell when we come to close quarters on this matter. My right hon. Friends will be able to deal seriatim with the various cases which have been brought before the House by the right hon. Gentleman. But there is one case with which I can deal with at once, and that is the Killaleah case, upon which the right hon. Gentleman dwelt at some length, where the judgment was reversed on the ground that there had been no conspiracy to induce to abstain from selling. The right hon. Gentleman will remember the case. He amused the House by extracts from the judgment. But I doubt whether he told the House that the very Judge to whom he referred stated, in the clearest manner, that there was an offence. [Cries of "No, no!"]

"There is a good deal of evidence," said Chief Baron Pilles, "that other persons on other days, commencing, I think, on the 9th of March, acted similarly towards the police stationed in that particular part, and I see no reason to doubt that the magistrates had evidence from which they would have been compelled to arrive at the conclusion that each of these persons, at least the greater number of them, had bread with which they might have supplied the police if they would; and I think the evidence showed clearly that their refusal to give bread to the police was a refusal in pursuance of a common act."

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That is not an offence.

MR. GOSCHEN: We will see—

"I rather think there may be evidence from which a jury might have concluded that the sole object was to injure the police, and so there might have been a conspiracy punishable at Common Law."

I do not think it was a very candid interpretation of the right hon. Gentleman. "There is no offence," says the right hon. Gentleman; but here the only Judge to whom the right hon. Gentleman has appealed says—"I rather think there was evidence from which a jury might have concluded"—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): "Might?"

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes. "Might have concluded." Does the hon. and learned Gentleman think that the Judge would have made use of such a phrase as that lightly?

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): That is a very common expression.

MR. GOSCHEN: My hon. and learned Friend near me (the Solicitor General for Ireland) also says that it is a common expression to indicate that there is evidence. I do not wish to say absolutely that there was a crime; but when a Judge says that the magistrates had evidence from which a jury might have concluded that the sole object was to injure the police, I think we must accept his judgment. The right hon. Gentleman tried to put this case as if these poor people were being most maliciously and unfairly treated by the police. The fact is that there was a conspiracy with the sole object of refusing bread. [An hon. MEMBER: The Judge said he thought there was evidence.] Whether I am right or wrong, hon. Gentlemen will admit that this is an important point. Here is what Baron Dowse says—

"The evidence given of the refusal of various parties to supply bread to the police, in my opinion, constitutes evidence from which a jury would come to the conclusion that a conspiracy existed to starve the police, and not to supply them with bread."

I do not know whether the right hon. Member can deny that there was a conspiracy. That reminds me of a curious point that I should like to put to the House, and that is that in many of these cases no defence whatever is made at the time. The charge is made, and no defence is made; and why? Because it would not suit the purposes of the agitators in Ireland to prove that there was no conspiracy, even in order to prevent conviction. One of the chief engines of the action of the League would be destroyed if in Ireland they admitted there was no conspiracy. What would then be the effect of the threats of the hon. Member for East Mayo to make the life of the traitor unhappy? No; they do not like to deny in Ireland the existence of conspiracy. But in this House, when we come to close quarters, and when we read out from these judgments, to which they themselves have appealed, that there was evidence from which a jury might conclude that there was a conspiracy at Common Law to deprive the police of bread, they say—not distinctly, but they imply—that there was not a conspiracy. I am not aware whether the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) ever contended in Ireland that there was no conspiracy. He may have said—"You have got the wrong man;" or, "You have tried the right man in the wrong way;" or, "Your procedure is wrong." But he has not denied that conspiracy existed to deprive the police of bread. Then, I ask, is that an offence or not? Of course, it is no offence in the eyes of those who think that the police are simply a brutal force, hired by the Executive to put down the people of Ireland. I know they go to considerable lengths. But it is hardly possible that right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench will say that a conspiracy to deprive the police of bread is a creditable, a legal, and a justifiable mode of action. At last I have come to a point which is not cheered even by the right hon. Gentleman. The House will understand that in this case, of which the right hon. Gentleman makes so much, these men had not been proved, to the satisfaction of the Judges, to have conspired to induce other people not to sell to the police. That was the point. But, at the same time, the Judges commented upon the evidence that there was a conspiracy. There may have been—nay, there must have been, since these learned Judges have said so—a miscarriage of justice in this case. I will not imitate the conduct of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, whenever a judgment of a Court is given against them, immediately proceed to attack the integrity of that Court. There may have been a miscarriage—there was a miscarriage of justice in this case; but I appeal to the common sense of the House and of the people of this country, who will read the statement which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman—[Home Rule cheers]—aye, and who will read the replies which will be made by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland to the specific allegations which have been made, whether, given the difficulties of the situation, were has made out such an overwhelming case as to discredit the whole of the magistracy in Ireland? Are there no cases in which magistrates have made mistakes in this country? Are there no cases in which magistrates err, and where their judgments are put right by a higher Court? I think it is eminently unjust if, from one or two cases carefully selected to prejudice this House, we should allow a stigma to be placed upon the whole magistracy of Ireland. Well, I will now turn to another part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, although he did not dwell much upon it himself, but touched it only with the lightest hand. The right hon. Gentleman said there was no progress towards order, as I understood it, under this Act. He would not admit that we had made any progress. I think that he said, towards the end of his speech, that we should not suspect him of wishing to make the government of Ireland impossible, but that we should believe he would sympathize with any progress in Ireland. Well, I think I can satisfy him that we have made some progress in the direction of reducing the number of those crimes which make a man's life unhappy. Here are the statistics of persons Boycotted. On the 1st of July, 1887, the number of persons comprised in wholly Boycotted cases was 870. On the 31st of January, 1888, there were 208; and on the 31st of May there were only 112. At all events, we have done some good in protecting persons from Boycotting. The number of persons partially Boycotted on the 31st of July, 1887, was 3,965; and on the 31st of May, 1888, it was only 1,278. Well, then as regards agrarian outrages. To begin with offences against the person, there were four murders in the first five months of 1887, and there were three murders in the first five months of 1888. I will say something, if the House will allow me, in respect to those murders in a minute or two. Of other offences against the person there were, in the first five months of 1887, 38; and in the first five months of 1888, 20. Of agrarian outrages against property, there were 76 during the first five months of 1887, but they fell to 39 in the first five months of this year. Of offences against the public peace, there were 125 in the first five months of last year, and 86 in the first five months of this year. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) will see in these facts some satisfactory progress towards eradicating the mischief which has so long existed in Ireland. But it is not only a question of the amount of Boycotting, or of the amount of agrarian outrages; the question is whether the punishment of crime is more successful now than it has been. In two cases of murder, in the cases of Quirke and Fitzmaurice, convictions have been obtained by the process of the Crimes Act which would not have been obtained without the Crimes Act. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"]. Well, hon. Members say "Oh, oh!" but I think I shall be able to prove my point. In both these cases there was a change of venue, and in one of them the evidence could not have been got at all but for the power of preliminary inquiry. Are hon. Members aware that in the case of Quirke, his old wife, in the presence of whom he was murdered, in this land in which we are undermining respect for law—that this old woman, at first in fear of her life, refused to give evidence against the murderer of her husband? He was brought to justice in the end; but how was it done? It was done under one of the clauses of the Crimes Act, this clause which renders possible a preliminary inquiry, and the woman herself gave evidence; but if she had had to give evidence in public in the ordinary way, she would have been afraid of her life. Here are her own pathetic words—

"I was in dread of my life, and I am in dread of my life still, and I am in dread during my days; and it was this dread which prevented me telling all to the police the first day. Only for my dread, I would have told all."

This woman is Boycotted, I believe, at the present moment; is Boycotted, because the murderer of her husband has been convicted. Fancy the position of this woman, with no one to help her, no neighbour daring to come near her, with no one to protect her but the police. The old woman further said—

"God help us, to be alone there all by myself and the Almighty God; only the police to be coming there, making company for me; to be alone there without anyone by me. And I was in dread by day and night there; that is what I was. I was in dread to speak a word out of my mouth. I was in dread I'd be shot. I'd be in dread I'd be shot out in the field to-day if I had not one of the police after me. I would be in dread to go for a gallon of water if I would not have one of them after me. I believe there would be no fear of me though if I held my tongue, and signs on it I did not say anything to anyone; I keep my mind to myself."

She held her tongue in fear. What is this organization, and who inspires it? Can hon. Members below the Gangway opposite not discover the instigators of these proceedings? Can they, with all their powers and all their ubiquitous influence, not attempt to prevent outrages such as this? A man murdered in the presence of his wife, and the wife fearing to say one word; and because she has said that one word, she has to be protected, not by her neighbours, but to be protected even when she goes out to fetch a gallon of water by the police; and then it is said that we, by interfering to put down crimes like this, are undermining respect for law and estranging the affections of the people of Ireland. In this case the murderer has been brought to justice. There is another case in which the murderers have been brought to justice, and that is the case of Fitzmaurice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) gave us a number of pathetic cases of persons who were injured by the police. He kept out of sight, but he could not have kept out of his recollection, some of those crimes which still stain the agrarian history of Ireland. He must have known, and the country knows, that these crimes are still in progress, and that while these crimes are still in progress, we cannot abandon the task which has been placed upon us of eradicating this mischief. [Laughter.] I am surprised that hon. Members below the Gangway opposite indulge in laughter. I think the country would judge them severely if they thought that they could indulge even in a moment's merriment when facts like these are brought out. I will recall the case of Fitzmaurice to the House, and we cannot forget this case. This case shows that Ireland is still in such a state that the Crimes Act must be maintained. What is the case of Fitzmaurice? Fitzmaurice was murdered in the presence of his daughter. He had been summoned to the presence of a meeting of the local branch of the National League by the local secretary. He had been pointed out to the hatred of his neighbours, and the result was that Fitzmaurice was killed in the presence of his daughter. His daughter was able to recognize the men; but mark this fact, the priest cautioned her, warned her as to recognizing the men, saying there had been blood enough shed already. Why did he say that? Did he know that there was any unholy organization still in that neighbourhood which would bring this poor girl to account if she recognized the murderers of her father, and if she did her duty as a daughter? Did he think that there were men who, following the behests of some terrible organization, would hound her down? The girl was too brave; the girl did denounce her father's murderers. The venue was changed under one of the clauses of the Crimes Act, and the murderers were executed for the crime which they committed. No assistance was given to the girl, no help was given her in her trouble, but she was cruelly Boycotted. Let the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne mark this—that the local secretary of the League has been committed to prison for organizing the Boycotting of Norah Fitzmaurice. The right hon. Gentleman may bring forward cases where there has been a miscarriage of justice, cases where harshness has been committed, and where magistrates have made mistakes; but what are the cases he has been able to put forward compared with such terrible instances which show the need there is for us to proceed in endeavouring to maintain order in Ireland? I have already detained the House at great length; but I wish to add that the Plan of Campaign itself has been broken down on the Massereene estate. Let me sum up the evidence of the progress we have made. We have decreased the number of offences against the person; we have decreased the number of Boycotting cases; we have been able to bring murderers to justice; and we are now seeing signs of the breaking down of the Plan of Campaign on some estates where the most stubborn efforts have been made in order to sustain it. The tenants are beginning to find out that it is not to their interest to follow up the Plan of Campaign, and that the arm of the law is strong enough to protect them if they defy the orders of the National League. We see some progress towards better times, and do not believe that all this indignation is felt against us by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite because we are breaking down, but rather because there is already some success attending the efforts of Her Majesty's Government. We are too successful now. It was precisely the same in 1883; when the Crimes Act of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was beginning to be successful, it was then that it was denounced in the loudest and most vehement terms by hon. Members from Ireland. We know our progress can be but slow. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne asks, have you succeeded in winning the affections of the people of Ireland; have you succeeded in making progress in that direction? Well, does not he and do not his friends do all in their power to make this task for us almost impossible? Are they not endeavouring to persuade the country that we are not only pursuing a course which to them is odious, but that we are doing so with odious motives, with the desire to crush the people of Ireland? They do that, and then they say we are not making progress. Although we think we see progress in many directions, we shall certainly find it difficult to win the affections of the people of Ireland in one way which seems to be open to a great many right hon. Gentlemen opposite. We cannot follow them in sacrificing all our previous principles. I recognize the gratitude of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite for the surrender of principles which right hon. Gentlemen have offered as a sacrifice to the people of Ireland. We will sacrifice much, but we will not sacrifice the interests of the British Empire; we will not sacrifice the unity of the Empire; we will not sacrifice those principles which lie at the base of all civilization, and which are attacked by the methods which are employed in this campaign; we cannot in that way compete with right hon. Gentlemen on the Bench opposite. We do not think, and here I go entirely with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley)—we do not think we have completed our task in endeavouring to maintain order. We know we have other duties to perform to the people of Ireland, and we are anxious to perform them. But as the time when we may hope to discharge them draws nearer, we see more and more fierceness in the Opposition, as if hon. Members were determined we should not attain our object. As we get nearer to the point where we might realize our hopes of benefiting the people of Ireland we meet with greater and greater opposition—opposition simply intended to thwart us in the task which we conceive it to be our duty to perform. There are measures which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley) scoffed at for the improvement of the material resources of Ireland. Why did he scoff at those measures? Those measures are demanded by his hon. Friends below the Gangway night after night with great earnestness, measures which we will do our best to bring forward. We know that as the richer country, it is our duty to do all we can to assist and develop the material resources of Ireland. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne in this, that we cannot hope to buy the affections of the people of Ireland. We do not think that by the expenditure, the most profuse expenditure of public money, we shall be able to destroy any sentiment which is deeply implanted in any people. I do not hold that any more than any right hon. Gentleman opposite. But that does not relieve us from the obligation to do our best to promote the material prosperity of Ireland, not because we are thereby sure to win, as we hope, her affections, but because we think it is clearly a duty imposed upon us. We do not despair, and we wish to hasten the time when we may realize the object which everyone knows we have at heart—namely, to multiply the number of owners of land in Ireland. That is a measure for which we are as anxious, perhaps, even more anxious than right hon. Gentlemen opposite; because we wish to put an end to this agrarian struggle, and we know that if we can once settle the agrarian struggle, we shall be better able than now to deal with the political issues from which right hon. Gentlemen opposite at present seem to shrink. We have done something during these last few years. I have spoken of other matters, but we have done something towards putting Home Rule into the background. [Cries of "No, no!"] Yes; if hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway watch the speeches which are made by their right hon. allies, they will find that the question of Home Rule for Ireland is now being subordinated to other questions and left in the background as far as possible. Well, we are anxious to go forward in the direction I have indicated. We are anxious to go forward in the direction of multiplying the owners of land in Ireland, and we are anxious, in Ireland as well as in England, to decentralize as soon as it is possible. We have our hopes as regards Ireland; they are not shattered by the opposition that is offered to us in this House; they are not shattered by the opposition which is offered to us in that country. We shall go forward steadily in our course, not undermining respect for law, but endeavouring to maintain it; not estranging the affections of the people of Ireland, which, alas, have not yet been possessed by the people of this country, but striving with justice and with steadiness to treat the Irish people as subjects of the Queen, and to treat Ireland as an integral portion of the United Kingdom.

Mr. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) said, both inside and outside the House the greatest efforts had been made on the part of the Liberal Party to defeat the action of the Government, who obtained a majority on something very like false pretences, and which had been consistently used for mutilating the liberties of the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was mistaken in supposing that no more would be heard of Home Rule. The Liberal Party were at the present moment engaged in trying to put an end to the iniquitous system which prevailed in Ireland, but the time would come, and that soon, when they would be able to carry a measure of justice for Ireland. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's treatment of Mr. Dillon's case, it came badly from the right hon. Gentleman to attempt to justify the unjust treatment of Mr. Dillon by a tu quoque argument accusing Mr. Gladstone of injustice to Mr. Parnell.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that his contention was, that while Mr. Dillon had been justly treated by the present Government, Mr. Parnell was justly treated by Mr. Gladstone's Government.

MR. R. T. REID said, he was unable in that case to see the relevancy of the argument. Then it was hardly worthy of the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that Mr. Dillon's language was an incentive to violence and murder.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not suggest for one moment that Mr. Dillon contemplated murder or anything of that kind. But he did suggest that the language fell upon the ears of persons to whom it might appear as an incentive to murder and outrage.

MR. R. T. REID said, that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have read other parts of Mr. Dillon's speech, where Mr. Dillon strongly deprecated outrage and endeavoured to keep the people from the commission of crime. With reference to the Killeagh case, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to appreciate its importance. Certain persons against whom there might or might not be evidence upon which a jury could act were brought before a tribunal not a jury, and it was contended that there was not authority in that tribunal under the Crimes Act with a case of conspiracy, if conspiracy there was. Nevertheless the persons were convicted, and now it had been decided that there was no evidence in any way to support the conviction. Such a case must shake their confidence in the magistracy. If they perused the records of convictions it would be seen that it was only in cases where there was no chance of conviction in ordinary circumstances, or where savage sentences were required that perambulatory magistrates were resorted to. Suitable men had been selected and sent round the country to try this or that particular offender. Having studied a multitude of these cases—some 600 or 700—he had come to the conclusion that the Crimes Act had been worked in a spirit of persecution, and not of prosecution, and that some of the cases were wanton and petty. The Mayor of Cork, for pushing a policeman, an offence which in this country would be punished by a fine of a penny, was sent to prison for a fortnight. After the language used by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer about murder, what was to be said about those men who had been sent to prison for selling newspapers? These cases began on the 25th of October and, except in one instance, ceased on the 9th of January, during which time 11 persons were prosecuted for the offence. Corcoran, a foreman printer, was sentenced to two separate terms of imprisonment, with hard labour, for one month, though the son of the proprietor, Mr. Crosbie, swore that Corcoran was not responsible, and had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the paper. The last person sentenced was a man named Ferriter, a secretary of a branch of the National League, who, on the 2nd of March, was condemned to three months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for selling a copy of United Ireland containing accounts of meetings of suppressed branches of the National League. But United Ireland published then and was publishing now reports of those meetings. Another class of cases was where the police were concerned. With one exception, no policeman had been seriously injured in any riot in Ireland, and in the first instance the Constabulary were driven by their superiors into collision with the people. During the last four or five months, however, baton charges by the police were of weekly and almost of daily occurrence. One of those charges had been described to him by a friend, not a Member of the House, who said that he had never seen anything more brutal in the whole course of his life. The police batoned men, sometimes women, and in one case a poor blind boy. Of course, the crowd would retaliate, and then they were brought up in batches before ex-policemen, who had been appointed Resident Magistrates, to be sentenced. A savage spirit seemed to have arisen among the police, for which the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was responsible. Then cunningly-prepared traps were laid by policemen for shopkeepers. Persons were sent round asking for goods, though these persons sometimes had not any money to pay for them.

Mr. R. T. Reid

After the Killeagh case he would say that every man convicted on such a charge had been improperly and wrongfully convicted. The police behaved as they did because they were encouraged by their absolute immunity from the consequences of their action, as was evidenced by the quashing of the verdicts of wilful murder found by Coroners' juries against them in certain cases. At Youghal a lad was stabbed to death. A jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the police, and the verdict was set aside by the Attorney General entering a nolle prosequi. In Mitchelstown three persons lost their lives. A verdict of wilful murder was returned against six or seven policemen, and this Government, who were the supporters of law and order, instructed counsel to appear before the Queen's Bench and take every futile and frivolous objection that could be conceived to get the verdict of the Coroners' jury quashed. A private inquiry was held among the police themselves, and all responsibility was thus got rid of, and thus these four men lay in their graves and no attempt had been made by the Government of this Constitutional country to bring any one to book or even to satisfy the requirements of decency by having a public inquiry for the purpose of satisfying the minds of the people. In these circumstances it would be astonishing if the police cared two straws for what the Irish people thought of them. That evening the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply to a Question put to him on the subject, denied, on the authority of the police themselves, that the Constabulary had been guilty of violence to the people on the occasion of Mr. Dillon being sentenced to imprisonment. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, however, was contradicted by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Rowntree), who had been a witness of what had taken place. Was the ipse dixit of any single Irish constable to be accepted in preference to the deliberate statement made in that House by an English Member of Parliament? The position of the Irish police would be hopeless unless they knew that there were congenial spirits among the Judges by whom they would be tried. He had examined the details of some 700 cases, and he must say that the extraordinary nature of the conclusions arrived at and the brutality of some of the sentences imposed by the Resident Magistrates upon those who had been convicted upon the most flimsy and the most unreliable evidence was absolutely degrading to the judicial office in the eyes of the people. What would be said by the Judges of this country if it were to come out before them that an attempt was being made to keep back evidence on the part of the Crown or to pack juries? Such flagrant acts as those he had referred to ought to be at once brought to the knowledge of the constituencies of the country. The Resident Magistrates were in constant communication with the Government in connection with the discharge of their executive functions. These Resident Magistrates thought that it was fitting that they should step from the judgment-seat to take part in a street brawl. Thus one magistrate, having given judgment in a particular case, had taken up his stick and had headed a baton charge by the police upon a number of defenceless and innocent people. Was not such conduct as that enough to make people believe that all law in Ireland was a farce? Again, it could not be denied that the Resident Magistrates had continually imposed sentences of one month's imprisonment in order to prevent the person charged from having an opportunity of appealing from the decision. The Court of Appeal appeared to partake very much of the character of the original Court. For his own part, he did not care what had been the custom or the practice in Ireland with regard to increasing sentences upon appeal; he was satisfied to know that such a thing had never been done in England or in Scotland. The object of increasing sentences upon appeal was to place a penalty upon those who exercised their right of appeal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the Crimes Act had been worked against crime. He believed only one murder had been detected by virtue of the first section. Of the rest of the charges brought to their notice, some were political, some arose out of collision with the police, and some, he was afraid, arose out of petty or personal malice. But the great bulk were connected with some agrarian cause. The Act was being worked in the interests of the landlords of Ireland. Which was the better man—Lord Clanricarde, with his £20,000 a-year, or Mr. Dillon, who was imprisoned? Lord Clanricarde had never once been near his property for 14 years, and had not spent 1s. upon it, while nothing could be more condemnatory of the deadly policy of the Government than the fact that it had necessitated putting a man like Mr. Dillon—a man of the purest life and of the highest character—a man whose friendship he wished he could claim, and whom he admired and honoured as much as any man he knew—into prison instead of taking part in the peaceful government of his own country. There were now in prison 17 Irish Members of Parliament, all of whose constituents sympathized with them and were ready to return them again as their Representatives. Hundreds of men, of women, and of even children had been put into prison under this Act, while emigration was largely increasing. People were leaving in very much larger numbers from Ireland to be our enemies in America. The National League was more flourishing than ever. It would last to the end of the present Government. The victims of this Government had been received with acclamation in England and Scotland, with English and Scottish Members of Parliament on the platform beside them. It had been the boast of the Tory Government that the National League had been crushed, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had that night, by a slip of the tongue, perhaps, admitted that the League possessed a tremendous and ubiquitous power. This was a proof that the force of a Government could not prevail against the will of the people. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not claim that the landlords were any better than the tenants. Instead of that, the right hon. Gentleman referred to a Papal Rescript. That was the end of the great Tory Government; instead of being able to enforce the law in Ireland by means of their Coercion Act, they crawled to Rome, with a view to getting the support which they were apparently not likely to obtain from any of their countrymen. Such a policy had only been made possible by a wilful betrayal of the constituencies. The Gentlemen who called themselves Liberal Unionists were returned at the last Election on the basis that they would not support coercion. Some pledged themselves in terms, some impliedly, and all of them took the benefit of a public declaration. He did not refer to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because nobody knew what he was—whether a Liberal Unionist or a Tory. But the noble Lord the Member for the Rossendale Division of Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) was bound to give some explanation. Step by step his Party was becoming the rump of the Tory Party. They had to do exactly as they were told by the Government, because if they did not the Government would send them to the country without the Tory support, and then they would be not merely beaten, but annihilated. He did not think there was a constituency in the country in which a Liberal Unionist would be returned without Tory support. It was the presence of that Party in the House that prevented the Opposition from having any prospects of success in the Division on this Motion; and although he was afraid that victory on this occasion was hopeless, he was sure the time could not be far distant when the people of England would return to their old love of freedom, and would for ever put an end to a system of government cruel and ruinous to Ireland and dangerous and disgraceful to themselves.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): There has been no lack of strong language on the part of the Opposition, and it will be for the House to say whether there is a corresponding strength of argument and of fact. The hon. and learned Member who has just addressed the House (Mr. R. T. Reid) characterized the proceedings under the Crimes Act as a revolting travesty of the judicial function, and the right hon. Gentleman who commenced the debate (Mr. John Morley) accused the Government of chicanery in the carrying out of that Act, and further characterized their proceedings as scandalous. I do not intend, Sir, to enter into competition with the right hon. and hon. and learned Gentlemen in the strength of the language I shall employ. I shall content myself with dealing with facts. I shall take up the statements which have been submitted to this House as a foundation for these charges; I shall go through them in detail, and I shall ask the House to come to the conclusion that, in this case, strength of language has really been used in substitution for strength of case, or, in other words, to cover the weakness of the assailants. The particular case which has been most strongly brought before the House and which has been put forward as an illustration of what took place in other cases, particularly with regard to Boycotting prosecutions, was that known as the Killeagh case. I will tell the House exactly what took place in that case, and ask hon. Members to consider how far the circumstances of that case warrant the conclusions which have been drawn from it. Five men were summoned on a charge of conspiracy to compel and induce the traders of Killeagh not to deal with the police. A combined refusal to supply bread to the police was clearly proved. Each of the five was proved to have on several occasions refused the bread. It was also proved that intimidation existed. The evidence was that David Barry, who had first agreed to supply bread, afterwards went back of it, stating that he got such a fright that he would not be the better of it for a week, and that he would not be a black sheep among the rest, and that his own brothers would denounce him at the meeting on Sunday. Those are among the facts of the Killeagh case, and two of the Judges in the Court of Exchequer who decided the case stated most clearly that there was evidence proved in that case on which a jury might find the prisoners guilty of the indictable offence of conspiracy punishable at Common Law. It was said that the Judges did not go further and say that such a verdict would have been right. But we all know, even those of us who are not lawyers, that when a Judge says there is evidence in a case on which a jury might find a particular verdict, he means there was evidence which would warrant that holding. That is the whole of that case, and surely it does not justify the comments which have been made on it. It is a case, not of innocent men, but of men shown to have been guilty of a conspiracy at Common Law for the purpose of starving the police. If there is evidence in any case that a conspiracy is entered into for the purpose of injuring an individual, or a class of individuals, the offence becomes indictable, and that evidence existed in this Killeagh case. But, although these men were guilty of conspiracy to starve the police, it was held that the section of the Act under which they were tried did not apply to their case. Sir, how can it be said that this case throws any light at all upon the prosecutions throughout Ireland for the offence of Boycotting? I may point out that in the whole of that case, from beginning to end, the word "Boycotting" does not occur. Will it be denied that the proof of a Boycotting conspiracy involves the proof of a conspiracy containing the element of "combined intimidation"? The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley) can hardly, I think, deny that. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) cannot deny it, for, speaking on May 24, 1882, he said—

"What is meant by Boycotting? In the first place, it is combined intimidation. In the second place, it is combined intimidation made use of for the purpose of destroying the private liberty of choice by fear of ruin and starvation."—(3 Hansard, [269] 1551.)

The simple fact about the Killeagh case is this—that as regards proof it fell short of a Boycotting conspiracy as defined by the right hon. Gentleman, and ranged itself within another class of criminal conspiracy indictable at Common Law—namely, a conspiracy to starve. If the magistrates made a mistake upon that point, is it, then, to be paraded before the House as throwing a lurid light upon the whole administration of the Crimes Act by the Resident Magistrates? Is it to be taken as a test case with regard to Boycotting conspiracies, seeing that the word Boycotting was never used by one of the witnesses for the Crown? It has been said, and the question has been asked, Why did the magistrates not state a case? ["Hear, hear!"] I am ready to confess that they should have stated a case. Hon. Members opposite are paying the very highest compliment to Resident Magistrates in Ireland, if they imagine that they ought absolutely to be infallible in everything. If the magistrates went wrong in this particular case, surely it was nothing so very remarkable, considering that the decisions of the superior Courts in England and in Ireland are frequently reversed. Well, Sir, the Statute contemplates fully that the magistrates may occasionally go wrong in this matter of stating a case, and provides for the event in a manner which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne seems to me to have overlooked. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to consider that the accused were in the power of the Resident Magistrates; but, Sir, I would repeat that the Act foresees that Resident Magistrates may go wrong, and if they refuse to state a case, it empowers the party aggrieved to go to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that Court, if it think proper, can direct the magistrates to state a case. It has been suggested a day or two ago by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy), during some of the short debates which have taken place after the answer to a Question, that it was useless to go to the Court of Queen's Bench, because they would not direct magistrates to state a case. If that means that the Queen's Bench would not administer the law fairly between the Crown and the subject, I must decline to enter into any argument upon that matter at all; but I understand the suggestion was based on the case of Brosnan. The version which has been given of that case might lead to misapprehension. That was a case in which the Resident Magistrates refused to state a case, in which the prisoner went to the Court of Queen's Bench, and they refused to order a case to be stated. The facts were peculiar. The Resident Magistrates came to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that the point on which they were asked to state a case had been already decided. The Court of Queen's Bench also, rightly or wrongly—and they have not been shown to be wrong—came to the conclusion that the point had already been decided, and on that ground they refused to order a case to be stated. An appeal was taken, but the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that, the order being one made in a criminal matter, was not the subject of appeal, and, therefore, the question was never decided whether the Court of Queen's Bench was right or wrong. Because in that instance they refused to state a case, is it to be argued for a moment that the Queen's Bench, where a substantial question is shown to exist, would decline to order a case to be stated? I refuse to enter into an argument upon that point. The right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne referred to what he considered to be the absence of protection in cases which come before Resident Magistrates, and which involve nice points of law. Does the right hon. Gentleman quite realize the protection which exists in these cases? The right to have a case stated on a question of law—unless the application be frivolous—with an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench whenever the magistrates refuse to state a case, exists in every case, whatever may be the length of sentence. Therefore, if a point of law exists in any case, it can be brought before any of the divisions of the High Court of Justice which the accused may select.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Who is to bear the expense? That is a very important point.

MR. MADDEN: I am endeavouring to impress on the House, in opposition to the argument of the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, that in every case where a point of law is involved, there is a right to have a case stated, with a right to go to the Court of Queen's Bench if the magistrate refuses to state a case. But that is not all. Two Judges of the Exchequer have decided differently, I am bound to say, from eight Judges on this point. The learned Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and one Judge of the Court of Exchequer have stated, it is true, that on a writ of certiorari and habeas corpus the depositions cannot be looked into, but a majority of the Court of Exchequer are of opinion that they can. Now, I want to apply this as a test. That decision was laid down by a majority of one of the Courts in Ireland in February of the present year. As long as that decision stands, it is in the power of anyone, so long as he is under the sentence of the Resident Magistrates, to go to the Court of Exchequer, and have the case decided by that Court on a point of law. [Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The sentence had expired in one case.] I wish, then, to know how many cases since February of the present year have been brought in the Court of Exchequer under that jurisdiction? That is a test which I ask the House to apply. If there really existed in Ireland those cases in which it was desired to have a case stated, why were they not brought before the Court of Exchequer under the decision which I have mentioned? I ask the House to look at this one broad fact, which I hope hon. Members will remember in connection with the decision of Resident Magistrates, which are now impugned, that, except in one single instance, not a case has been brought forward since February last under that decision. There is another fact to be noted. In addition to this careful provision for the class of cases which the right hon. Gentleman had especially in his mind—cases of legal nicety—an appeal lies to the County Court Judge. Now, there are no Judges in the kingdom who hold positions so independent of the Crown as County Court Judges. They are not influenced by either hope or fear with regard to promotion; they are only influenced by a desire to do their duty between the Crown and the subject. What has been the record here? The broad fact is, that out of all the cases which have been appealed to them, the proportion in which the decisions have been reversed are very few—only some four or five. Looking at them impartially, these are tests which I think the House will do well to apply when they are asked to say that substantial justice has not been done. What becomes of the contention that innocent persons have been convicted when we have had an appeal on points of law, and when the County Court Judges have power to hear new evidence on questions of fact, and yet in the vast majority of cases the decisions of the Resident Magistrates have been confirmed? Then as to the prosecutions for the Plan of Campaign. It has been suggested that the Killeagh case had some relevance to the prosecutions connected with the Plan of Campaign; but there is no analogy between them. What was the ground of the decision in the Court of Exchequer in the Killeagh case? The absence of proof of coercion on the part of the prisoners. What is the essence of the Plan of Campaign? It is combined coercion. [“No, no!”] What is the Plan of Campaign? [An Irish MEMBER: Voluntary association.] The Plan of Campaign is a coercion of the minority by the majority. To do what? You have the rents, even what are admitted to be the fair rents payable to the landlords, taken absolutely out of their hands. Is there no evidence of coercion there? If the tenants chose to pay their rents to-morrow, they cannot get them back, because they are placed in the hands of trustees and taken out of their control. Then as to the backsliders. Is there no coercion as to them? The foundation of the conspiracy known as the Plan of Campaign is mutual and combined coercion. I do not ask the House to accept my statement on the subject. The question of the legality or illegality of the Plan of Campaign has often come before the Courts. It has been pronounced to be illegal by the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal, and in the judgment laid on the Table of the House in the case of “Blunt v. Byrne.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has that judgment been reported?

MR. MADDEN: Yes. The decision of Lord Chief Baron Pilles has been published, and in it he says—

“In answer to the application which has been made to me on the part of the defendant, it is my duty to tell you that, in my opinion, a combination for the purpose of carrying out what is called the ‘Plan of Campaign,’ as explained by the speeches to which I shall hereafter call your attention, is essentially an illegal association; that any meeting for the purpose of promoting it is in law an illegal assembly; that the Crown, or any magistrate, has the power to disperse any meeting called for that purpose; and that when a magistrate has notice of such a meeting it is his duty to do all that in him lies to prevent, or, if necessary, to disperse it. I have heard with surprise the assertion that to the present time there has been no legal decision as to the legality of the Plan of Campaign. Let not that be said for the future. If you find a verdict in this case, every word that I say (which is being taken down by the shorthand writer) will be before the Court of Exchequer, and can be brought before the Court of Appeal, and from it to the House of Lords, and by my present direction to you I leave open for the determination of the highest Court in the Realm, whether I am, or am not, right in my view of the law.”

The Plan of Campaign has also been the subject of decisions in the Court of Queen's Bench and in the Court of Appeal, and has been condemned as an illegal conspiracy. The ground of these decisions is the existence in the Plan of Campaign of the element of mutual coercion, which was held not to exist in the Killeagh case. But we have been charged with prosecuting men for political offences. Can it for a moment be maintained that there is a political element involved in the Plan of Campaign? The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) some time ago gave a definition of a political offence, and he said any offence committed against the State or against a class was a political offence. But that definition is certainly one which no lawyer or statesman would assent to. What is Boycotting? It is directed against individuals, and so is the Plan of Campaign. It is absurd to say that Boycotting or taking part in the Plan of Campaign is a political offence because the individuals injured form part of a class which may be regarded as obnoxious. The right hon. Gentleman has also brought other charges against the Government, and one of these has reference to the Return of cases in which sentences have been increased on appeal. I do not quite follow the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. His point appears to be that cases mentioned in the Return are cases under the ordinary law, and not under the Crimes Act. That is so; but how can the right hon. Gentleman regard it as a point in his favour. These cases show that the power of increasing sentences on appeal is within the jurisdiction of County Court Judges, and that such jurisdiction is exercised in ordinary cases. They simply show that the course pursued is not exceptional; that it is part of the administration of the ordinary law in Ireland, and therefore there was nothing exceptional in its being applied to offences under the Crimes Act. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeds to criticize the return of cases; and he says that one of them is a case where the person who was fined for an offence under the Fishery Law appealed, and the County Court Judge, finding that the magistrate had not imposed a fine amounting to the minimum penalty, increased it. But the right hon. Gentleman did not mention that the County Court Judge also increased the alternative imprisonment in the event of the fine not being paid, which he was under no obligation to increase and that this increased term of imprisonment was actually undergone. So that that case is a perfectly valid instance of a sentence being increased on appeal. The right hon. Gentleman referred to certain cases in connection with Boycotting conspiracies, especially to the Milltown Malbay Boycotting case. An old woman, Hannah Connell, whose son took an evicted farm, could not get any bread or buy a farthing candle, and was three days and three nights starving, until a Mrs. Moroney took pity on her. It was proved before the County Court Judge that the men who were prosecuted told her to go out of their shops when she asked for goods, and gave as a reason that she was Boycotted. There was also evidence that the boys threw stones at her. It was proved by the son that he went to the meeting of the National League and asked for liberty to fish. They would not listen to him, and he was turned out of the room. That was a perfectly clear case of Boycotting. Then complaint is made of the police, because when they were being Boycotted they went to various shops and asked to be supplied with goods, and, on being refused, prosecuted some of those who refused them. This it is said is creating crime. I cannot see that. To say so, is to confound the creation of crime with the obtaining of evidence for the conviction of crime. In one case which was mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman, the prisoners themselves actually pleaded guilty; and in another, the clearest possible evidence of intimidation was forthcoming, it being proved that a number of men went to a field where a man was working for a Boycotted person and forced the man to leave his work. The cases brought before the House by the right hon. Gentleman were not cases which he was forced to deal with, but were culled by him, with the best assistance at his command, as illustrations of the harshness of the Government in Ireland.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I said they were illustrations of the harshness of the Resident Magistrates.

MR. MADDEN: But this is an attack on Her Majesty's Government, not an attack on the Resident Magistrates. The question is—What is the case made against the Government in those cases which have been selected for the purpose of impeaching Her Majesty's Government? Oh? but it is said—It was the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) who made the suggestion in the form of a question the other day—"We never entrusted the Resident Magistrates with jurisdiction over so difficult a question as the Law of Conspiracy." The Act of 1882 has been gone through in this House over and over again, and every Member knows that its provisions are infinitely more stringent than those of the present Act. Moreover, I say that under the Act of 1882, jurisdiction was entrusted to the Resident Magistrate in a class of cases infinitely more difficult than those which are dealt with by the Act now in force—I mean that class which involved decisions on the law of unlawful assembly. The case of Mr. Blunt, although that was a case of unlawful assembly under the present Act, turned on the law of conspiracy, and every word of the judgment which I have read in that case could have been delivered with regard to a case under the Act of 1882. That being so, what becomes of the suggestion that we have entrusted jurisdiction to the Resident Magistrates which would not have been given to them by right hon. Gentlemen opposite? So much for there being any new departure, either in the class of cases or in the class of magistrates to whom they were entrusted under the present Act as compared with that of 1882. Now, Sir, I have gone through the instances which were mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. and learned Member who last addressed the House (Mr. R. T. Reid) referred to certain cases on which I will say one or two words. He referred specially to cases in which persons were punished for selling newspapers. First of all, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked what that had to do with crime. My answer is that it was for publishing, with a view to furthering the objects of an unlawful organization, reports of its proceedings that those men were punished. These prosecutions are brought forward in support of the indictment against the Government as evidence of harshness of administration. In the first place, a caution preceded prosecution in every case. ["Oh, oh!"] I speak from information which has been furnished to me, and I state to the House that in no case was anyone prosecuted for selling or publishing newspapers without being previously warned, and further that no person was punished if he undertook not to repeat the offence. Is that the kind and class of prosecution which they bring before the House to support this indictment? With regard to the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) it has been said that he was convicted without having the case against him duly proved, without its ever being proved that he had done the acts with which he was charged. But did the hon. Member himself ever disavow it, either before the Court below or the County Court Judge? It is said he was convicted without legal evidence of the offence charged. If that was so, he was not bound to go before the County Court Judge at all. He was entitled to have the case legally proved against him, and was within his right in insisting upon that. If he was convicted without legal evidence, he might have had a case stated for the opinion of the Superior Court; but that is not the course he takes. He appeals to the County Court Judge. I will say one word with reference to the action of the County Court Judge. It was stated that he was asked to give what is called a "speaking order," by placing the evidence on the face of his order, so as to enable his decision to be reviewed. The County Court Judge had no more power to do that than any Member of this House. The order and the conviction appealed from might be affirmed, reversed, or varied by the County Court Judge, but he had no power whatever to make such an order as was suggested. Therefore, what is the use of making suggestions of that kind? If the suggestion is, that he was convicted without legal evidence, he might have gone to the Superior Court direct from the magistrate; but what is the use of saying the County Court Judge had not made a speaking order, when the magistrates had made a speaking order, and it was in the power of the person convicted to have the question decided by a case stated from them? Sir, the House is asked to condemn the Government on various grounds. It is asked to say, that in administering this Act they have been guilty of harshness; and, that they have been guilty of what the right hon. Gentleman calls chicane; and, as to the latter, I appeal to the judgment of the House as to whether there is a particle of evidence of any such thing. There are the judgments of the highest Courts in Ireland on the subject of the illegality of the combination against which the action of the Government has been directed. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he might enter into a combination in England which would be perfectly lawful in England, and for which in Ireland he would be had up before the Resident Magistrates. That I absolutely and entirely deny. I am able to point to a case which came before an English Court not long ago, and which was decided by a Judge who will be treated with respect by hon. Members—Lord Coleridge, the Lord Chief Justice of England. That was a case of conspiracy which the Lord Chief Justice in his judgment described as Boycotting. He decided that it was a criminal conspiracy, and he referred with approval to the judgment of an Irish Judge—Lord Fitzgerald—in an Irish case laying down the same principles as to the law of combination. And then we are told that you may enter into a combination which is legal in England but illegal in Ireland. Upon the whole facts laid before the House I submit that the case which is attempted to be made against the Government by the Opposition has failed; that this Act has been fairly administered; that although there has, no doubt, been some error, yet that no case has been made against the Resident Magistrates, and that no case has been made against the Government of unfairness or harshness in the administration of the law in Ireland.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present, House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. J. SINCLAIR (Ayr Burghs) said, that under ordinary circumstances he would never have thought of opening his lips for the first time in a debate in that House on so important a matter as the Government policy in Ireland; but he could not forget that the mandate with which he came from the electorate of his constituency—a mandate not two years old as was the case with many Members of the House of Commons, but a mandate not yet a fortnight old—was based mainly, he thought he might say exclusively, upon the very issues that had been raised by the Motion now before them. Therefore it was that he ventured to take part in the debate. It was not his intention to enter into any detailed statement of what was considered wrong in regard to Ireland, either in the operation or the administration of the Criminal Law Procedure (Ireland) Act—a matter which had already to a considerable extent been dealt with by previous speakers; and what he and his hon. Friends complained of would no doubt be amplified still more by others far more competent than himself to deal in the matter. But what he should like to do was this. Taking for granted the details, he would ask what was their general character, and what were likely to be their effects so far as it was possible to read them from the light of history? Their first accusation was, that these proceedings, carried on by the sanction, and under the direction of the Government in Ireland, undermined respect for the law. That was no new story, either as regarded a measure of coercion or a Tory Government. They could go back to three years ago, and recall the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) when he said in reference to a matter of this kind—

“I say that even by this one Act the Tories have done more to lessen the authority of law in Ireland than all the Radicals have said or done during the past five years—I might almost say, than all the nationalists themselves have said or done.”

It would be interesting to know whether the right hon. Gentleman still adhered to that opinion, or whether he believed that since that time the Tory Party had redeemed their character by repentance and reformation. Most hon. Members on that side of the House, where he believed the right hon. Gentleman still sat, thought that not only were his words just and true at the time they were spoken, but that they were even more abundantly just and even more demonstrably true of the Tory policy at the present hour. That he took to be the meaning of the first clause of the Motion before the House. Now they took their stand on the principle which had been expressed in this wise, that the law did not create right, but that, on the other hand, right must dictate the law. If there were any truth in that dictum, he thought that when they found that the law had not been dictated by what they deemed to be right, and that, on the other hand, it went forward to the creation of what they believed to be wrong, it was no wonder that the respect and reverence which they should otherwise count upon on the part of the people for the law should be no longer forthcoming. They found, for instance, in reference to the Crimes Act, that it created a number of artificial offences; and what were the usual effects of these? Not to impress the people with the idea that the law was something sacred, something great, something noble, but rather to manufacture opportunities and out channels of temptation in the direction of the commission of crimes which the moral sense of the man within did but very slightly or very insensibly condemn. And that was not only the case when the law was unjust; it was sometimes true of laws which were wise and good when they were unduly and harshly administered. They were then like grapes, which when too much pressed produced harsh and unwholesome wine. They said, further, that these proceedings estranged the minds of the people of Ireland. He had heard of a worthy old lady who declared that the doctrine of total depravity was a blessed doctrine if only one could only live up to it, and so they might say that the doctrine of the equality of treatment as between Great Britain and Ireland was a blessed doctrine if only the Government would act up to it. He was especially interested in this particular aspect of the case because it referred to the treatment of the hon. Member for East Mayo, who was not in the House. He had had the pleasure, or rather he should say the honour, of taking part with him in a meeting a short time ago at Campbeltown, and he (Mr. Dillon) afterwards delivered what was practically his last public speech in the town of Ayr before going to prison. Now, in the former of those speeches Mr. Dillon dealt at great length with the question of agrarian disturbance in Ireland; and having listened to that speech, and read the speech for which he was prosecuted and sent to prison, he was bound to say that there was no substantial difference between them. But what did they find? The Government did not think it their duty, perhaps they did not think they were able, to take hold of Mr. Dillon because of what he said at Campbeltown. Why? It might be said by Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that Mr. Dillon was not on that occasion addressing Irish tenants. But that argument would not hold water, because the words of a man of Mr. Dillon's position went swiftly over the whole face of the country, and the tenants of Ireland and the people of Ireland were too deeply interested in the movements and utterances of their Members not to have been certain to read what he had said at Campbeltown. But Campbeltown was not so very far from Ireland after all; only 30 miles of sea separated the two countries at that point, and yet they saw the difference of the treatment measured out by the Government in respect of substantially similar speeches delivered in the two places. He had heard with the greatest surprise the Chancellor of the Exchequer putting such an interpretation on Mr. Dillon's words in the speech for which he had been convicted, an interpretation suggested rather than expressed, which he did not consider consistent either with high honour or charity. It was a strange thing if words of the kind could not be used without certain people putting the very worst interpretation upon them, and that, he thought, was an unfortunate indication of the spirit that was running through the whole operation and administration of the Government policy with regard to Ireland. What results did the Government expect from their present policy? Did they expect the people to become more peaceable, more loyal, more contented, and more well-disposed towards the British Government? Surely not. The Government flattered themselves, in the language of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton in 1833, that under the shelter of these oppressive laws they would be able to apply remedial measures with effect; but it was just the reverse; those laws would blight their remedies, and "throw their withering shadow over all their concessions." The policy of coercion as applied to Ireland seemed to him to be like the Sultan's horse, of which it was said that no green thing would grow on the spot where he trod. They might drive that prancing steed throughout the length and breadth of Ireland; but they must not look for the sweet flowers to spring up in the deep wounds of the living flesh of Ireland which his hoofs had made, for only those who had been nurtured in the generous breath of freedom and justice could be counted upon for the side of loyalty and law. Now, he came to the third point raised by the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle—namely, that these proceedings were deeply injurious to the interests of the United Kingdom. Perhaps they could not have ventured to make a statement of that kind if this had been the first application of a measure of coercion to Ireland, but now he thought they could safely do it. When thinking of the Crimes Act, the saying of Catharine of Russia often came to his mind, "There are laws which may be written on parchment which cannot be written on the skins of a whole people." Parliament, by pursuing the policy of coercion, were doing something which at no very distant date they would unquestionably first of all regret, and then be obliged to reverse. In that respect the Government and the majority in Parliament and the country which supported them were, in his opinion, doing nothing less than laying out money in the purchase of repentance, and the time would soon come when the saying of one of Ireland's greatest sons would be realized in this case as in many others—"We are very doubtful of our remedies, but the effect of our poisons is sure." They said in the interests of the United Kingdom, that the honour of the country had been tarnished by Irish Coercion Acts, and its unity in the broad sense endangered more by them than by any measure of self-government which could be proposed. More than that, in these times, they had to look to the very safety of the Kingdom, which, by these proceedings, might be imperilled. He thought he might venture to apply two adjectives to this policy. First of all he said it was heartless. He did not refer to these harrowing cases of imprisonment and arrest with which they were all so familiar, although with reference to those matters he might remark that that only disgraced a man which he had deserved to suffer, and therefore it was no wonder if some of these proceedings, so far from producing the effect intended by the Tories, raised the men who suffered by them in the esteem and admiration of their country. But this was a heartless policy, because it showed no real helpful commiseration for the admitted wrongs which existed in Ireland, and, on the other hand, it showed no real heartfelt sympathy with the just claims of the Irish people. Then, not only was it a heartless but it was a hopeless policy. It was hopeless in view of the lessons of the past, in view of the existing state of things in Ireland, and also because it gave no assurance of any better state of things even at the termination of the 20 years continuance prescribed for it by Lord Salisbury. Hon. Members were familiar with the beautiful pictures presented in Bunyan's Allegory. One of them was that at the interpreters' house there was shown a fire which burnt against a wall, close by which stood one who poured water on the flame, yet it burnt higher and hotter, and the secret of which was that behind the wall, and out of sight, stood another who poured oil upon it. It was so here—there burnt in multitudes of the Irish hearts and homes the aspiration for freedom from oppression and for self-government. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had poured water upon it; how much water and how cold he would not venture to say, but the flame continued to burn higher and hotter, and why? Because it was fed from an invisible source by a precious oil, the main ingredients of which were the love of justice, the love of country, and the love of liberty.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, two or three matters had been brought under the notice of the House in connection with the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle on which he should like to say a few words. It had been stated that night that the Crimes Act itself was a breach of faith with the nation, and the Unionist Party had been accused of winning the election of 1886 on false pretences; that was to say, it had been affirmed that the Unionist Party stood on the cry of one Parliament and equal laws for the United Kingdom. He thought he had put that accusation strongly and clearly before the House. Now, as far as he was concerned, he pleaded not guilty to the charge. He knew Ireland a great deal too well to give any such promise or pledge. He did not need the speech of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Redmond) at the Chicago convention to convince him that, after the events of 1886, it would be the clear and bounden duty of the Irish Members to make the Government of Ireland by England impossible, and therefore on every platform on which he stood in Tyrone he had declared that if the ordinary law proved to be inadequate he would vote for strengthening it and making it adequate. Thus the charge to which he referred did not apply to him personally, and he was certain if the charge as against other Unionist Members were investigated the defence would be found to be as sound and solid. The present Debate was naturally coloured by the imprisonment of Mr. Dillon. He did not count that a small matter; on the contrary, he thought it a very sad and serious matter for the country. What he complained of was that hon. Members on that side forgot that Mr. Dillon had been in gaol before. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, if they did not forget it they kept very quiet about it, which was the next thing to forgetting it. Mr. Dillon and many of his friends were sent to gaol some years ago without being charged with any specific offence, and they were kept there without trial. That was in 1882. Now to send Mr. Dillon to gaol in 1882 charged with no specific offence, and to keep him there without trial was a part of the "resources of civilization." To send him to gaol in 1888 charged with a specific offence, tried before a competent tribunal—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Did hon. Gentlemen deny that a County Court Judge was a competent tribunal? To send Mr. Dillon to gaol after trial by a competent tribunal was barbarism and inhumanity. Wherein lay the difference between the two cases? In the one case, that of 1882, Mr. Dillon was sent to gaol under the auspices and with the sanction of a Liberal Government, at the head of which was the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Mid Lothian. In 1888, he was sent to gaol on a specific charge, tried before a competent tribunal, and sentenced under the auspices of a Conservative Government with Lord Salisbury at its head. That was really the only difference that he could see. If they turned to the Liberal Press of 1882, and if they consulted the Liberal speeches of that time, they would find practical unanimity as to the wisdom of the action of the Liberal Government and vociferous cheering at Leeds and the Guildhall for the "resources of civilization." But if they turned now to the same Liberal organs and to Liberal speeches, there was nothing but weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. He came now to the Motion before the House. It covered a very wide area—[Ironical cheers—] what he had said was no doubt inconvenient, but it was perfectly relevant to the Motion. It was not for him, a mere layman, to enter on the subtleties of the law of conspiracy, or to decide whether Resident Magistrates had always been right in the decisions they had given under the Crimes Act. There was a plentiful crop of lawyers in the House, who in such a discussion would be in their native element, and he would cheerfully leave it to them with two remarks. His first remark was that magistrates and Judges were not infallible either in England or Ireland, and his opinion, as a layman, was that it by no means followed that because the decision of an inferior Court was reversed it was necessarily incompetent. So far as he had been able to observe, much of the trouble which had arisen proceeded from the decisions of two out of three judges of the Exchequer Court, both of whom were famous lawyers. As he understood it, the point was whether on a habeas corpus Motion there was an appeal, on which question there were eight Irish Judges against two. He meant to go into the case of Mr. Dillon more minutely, and he hoped to show clearly why he should give his vote against the Motion. He had no personal feeling whatever against Mr. Dillon, who had said many things of him in Ulster which were utterly untrue, although he was sure Mr. Dillon believed them. But he had sat down deliberately in view of the whole case to investigate it on its merits as an honest juror would do. He did not know Lord Massereene, nor did he know any of the landlords whose estates were under the Plan of Campaign, and if he could urge any claim for intervening in the debate, it was that in a case of this kind he stood indifferent between landlord and tenant. He held that there were Members on that side of the House who would not challenge his contention. He had studied the Plan of Campaign as published originally in United Ireland, he had read Mr. Dillon's speech at Tullyallen on the 8th of April last, published in The Freeman's Journal, and he had read his speech at Keenagh, in the county of Longford, which served as a kind of glossary to the Plan of Campaign; he had read the defence of Lord Massereene offered by his Lordship's agent; he had read the reports of the trial of Mr. Dillon before the Resident Magistrates, and also of the appeal at Dundalk, and he had also read yards of leading articles complaining of the conduct of the Government and challenging the action of the Court. He should like to know how many hon. Members had done as much. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Probably it had not been done by many hon. Members. The first question that he submitted to himself as if he had been a juror in the case was this—did Mr. Dillon in his speech at Tullyallen advise and advocate the Plan of Campaign? Having read that speech as a juror, he replied that no honest man could give anything but an answer in the affirmative to that query. Mr. Dillon had shown how the Plan of Campaign had succeeded on several estates, he spoke of the unbroken story of success, which was not entirely consonant with fact, and he showed with great power what happened to people who were unfaithful to it. He (Mr. T. W. Russell) was not going to take any meaning out of his words such as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done that evening. It was unfortunate that Mr. Dillon had often spoken in a way which allowed certain conclusions to be drawn. In 1882 he declared that if certain cattle were put on some fields they would not prosper. He (Mr. T. W. Russell) knew that it was said that this might bear an innocent meaning; but, he repeated, that it was very unfortunate that the hon. Member should indulge in words susceptible of two constructions being placed upon them, and it was especially to be deplored that this was done upon a public platform in Ireland before an audience of peasants. While Mr. Dillon was speaking on that platform the Plan of Campaign was actually in operation, and it was absolutely idle to deny that Mr. Dillon was advocating the Plan of Campaign on the Massereene estate. He then asked, was the Plan of Campaign an illegal combination, and was it an offence to advocate an illegal combination? What was the Plan of Campaign? He would define it to the best of his ability, and he did not think that hon. Members would be able to cavil at his definition of it. In the midst of an acute crisis a rent strike was agreed upon. The rents upon the property were either fixed by judicial arrangement, or they were the subject of ordinary contract. The landlord offered an abatement, not an all-round abatement, but one which he deemed applicable to each case; his proposal was refused by the tenants, who made an all-round offer, which included the well-to-do farmer, who made and could pay his rent, as well as the poor cottar who had not made, and who could not pay his rent. The landlord refused this all-round offer, and the rent offered to the landlord was paid by the tenants to trustees into a sort of war-chest to be used against the landlord if necessary, and then the Plan of Campaign was complete. He maintained that the Plan of Campaign, as indicated in the original document, was absolutely indefensible. In the first place, it asserted the right of one party to a contract, or arrangement to vary its terms at his pleasure; and, secondly, it asserted that a well-to-do farmer who had made his rent, and was well able to pay it, should not pay it, because the poor cottar had not made his rent, and was unable to pay it. These two points were of the essence of the Plan of Campaign; and, in his opinion, they were grossly unfair and unjust. What was more important was that the Lord Chief Baron of Ireland, whom hon. Members below the Gangway professed to regard as an unbiassed Judge, had held that the Plan of Campaign was absolutely illegal, and that every meeting convened to advocate it was an illegal meeting, and was liable to be dispersed by force. That was not a pronouncement such as Mr. Justice O'Brien's in another case, it was a solemn and deliberate judgment which had been upheld by the Court of Appeal in Moroney's case. For his part, he could not go behind this decision of the Lord Chief Baron. The result was that he found that Mr. Dillon did advocate the Plan of Campaign; he was bound by the decision of the Lord Chief Baron that the Plan of Campaign was an illegal combination, and therefore he was obliged to find that Mr. Dillon had advocated an illegal conspiracy. He then asked, what was the defence which had been put forward on behalf of Mr. Dillon; and here he came to the real

germ of the whole question. It had been maintained that night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that when Mr. Dillon spoke at Tullyallen the county of Louth had not been proclaimed under the Crimes Act. He wished to state frankly that that was not a defence that had been put forward by Mr. Dillon himself. Was he to be told that Mr. Dillon was only going to advocate the Plan of Campaign in places where it was safe for him to do so? He said that Mr. Dillon at Louth gave no countenance to such an idea, and it had never been put forward by Mr. Dillon himself, and he should never think of imputing to Mr. Dillon that he was capable of putting it forward. He said that no man who respected Mr. Dillon could possibly put forward this defence, that it would only go into a county where he was safe to advocate the Plan of Campaign. Certainly, he should not think of imputing any such motive to him. He now came to the case of the Massereene tenants; and in respect to them the contention was that their case was a desperate one. He had no doubt that, with regard to some of them, they were over-rented, as was the case on many other estates in Ireland. But he desired that the facts in reference to the Massereene tenants should be put fairly before the House. He must first ask whether there were judicial tenants upon the property, and it was a remarkable fact that only two of the judicial rents as fixed by the Commissioners had been appealed against. The tenants, whose rents had been judicially fixed, had had not only the original reduction, but they were entitled to the reduction under the Act of 1887. He denied that any fair-minded man could say that the Plan of Campaign was necessary in the case of those tenants. In the next place, he asked whether there were tenants upon the estate who held their land under ordinary leases? He had no doubt there were, and the door of the Land Court had been opened to them—a door which had been opened to them by a Government that had nothing but a coercive policy to offer to the Irish people, but which had been kept closed by right hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the Front Bench below him. It was the present Government which had opened the door locked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): It was opened to them by the Plan of Campaign, not by the Government.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he would tell hon. Members below the Gangway what the Plan of Campaign had produced. It had produced the Crimes Act. Hon. Members below the Gangway had obtained a temporary Plan of Campaign but a permanent Crimes Act as the result of their herculean labours. Hon. Members below the Gangway contended that the Plan of Campaign was perfectly justifiable, inasmuch as there were £7,000 of arrears of rent due upon the estate. But he said that the Plan of Campaign was perfectly unjustifiable in the case of those tenants. He might be told that those arrears constituted a reason for the Plan of Campaign being directed against the estate; but the fact was that Lord Massereene had offered to do freely what the Bill of this year intended to do—namely, to deal with the arrears upon the same basis as the Commissioners had dealt with the rents. What did the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) demand? He demanded that, and nothing more; and, therefore, he (Mr. T. W. Russell) repeated that, as far as arrears were concerned, the application of the Plan of Campaign to this estate was wholly unjustifiable. His next inquiry was, were there perpetuity leaseholders on the estate—holders of town parks and demesne lands? No doubt there were, and these were outside the Act. It might be that there were a few such tenants; but would the fact of there being a few such tenants justify the application of the Plan of Campaign to the whole of the tenants without any discrimination? He said no man could fairly rise in his place and answer that in the affirmative. Now, he wanted to show the House what sort of men some of the tenants on this estate were. He could understand great efforts being made in the case of poor cottars, who were unable to live on the land they tilled on the Western seaboard of Ireland; but he said frankly that a good deal of sympathy would be wasted in the case of tenants such as he was about to describe. He had a dozen cases. First there was the case of Peter Roche, who was described in The Drogheda Independent as "one of the standard bearers of the Plan," who held two large farms under Lord Massereene and a third on a neighbouring property. This man held 50 shares of £10 each, fully paid up, in the Dundalk and Newry Steam Packet Company, 13 of which were seized and sold for £57 14s. 3d. in satisfaction of his rent. Would anyone tell him that the House ought to stand behind a man like that? He asked right hon. Members on the Front Bench below him why they had excluded such wealthy tenants as these from the operation of the Acts of 1870 and 1881? It was because they felt that such tenants were able to take care of themselves, but now "old things have passed away, and all things have become new." Did anybody think that the Plan of Campaign was justified in the case of Roche, who had other property probably besides what he had mentioned? There was another case in which the landlord seized eight head of cattle, 30 sheep, and 36 lambs. This was a poor struggling tenant who was unable to pay his rent! But it was only fair to say that the rent was paid after all. He had heard something about law costs to-night, and he stood there to assure the House that not one of those tenants ever instructed a solicitor to take up their defence; they had pleaded that they had never authorized a defence, and that the law costs had been heaped upon them without their knowledge or sanction. He would take the case of Michael Smith, a road contractor in addition to being a farmer, who assured the agent that he had never given instructions for the defence of his action, and had positively told the solicitor of the League that that was the course he intended to pursue. A defence was, however, filed by the League, and the result was that Smith was made liable for £37 costs. Lord Massereene, hearing that he was to have £8 from the Grand Jury, attached the money and paid himself, and Mr. Smith had to pay these costs simply because a defence was filed by a solicitor whom he had never seen and never instructed. [An hon. MEMBER: How did he get the writ?] That could be very easily managed. He would now take the case of James Burn. This tenant was evicted on the 4th of October, 1887, and at his eviction the hon. Member for Shoreditch (Mr. Stuart) was present. He had been formerly under agent on the Antrim estate of Lord Massereene. In 1864, when the particular farm became vacant, he obtained it on a lease of 31 years, at a rent which was £38 under the Government valuation; attached to the farm were several houses, from which he derived a profit rent of £42 a-year. He was one of the first to take up the Plan of Campaign, and other tenants soon followed. He refused an abatement of 10 per cent; it subsequently came to the knowledge of the agent that he was the sole owner of 20 shares in the Dundalk and Newry Steam Packet Company, which were attached, and on the last day for redemption these were bought back by Burn, who received the abatement referred to for which he had publicly expressed his acknowledgments. Then there was the case of Patrick Brannigan, who held a farm under a judicial lease at a rent of £126. He did not reside upon the estate, but he was a very active campaigner and joined in the protest against the rent. It was discovered before he was formally evicted in October last that he was the holder of ten £10 shares fully paid up in the Dundalk and Newry Steam Packet Company, besides shares in another Company. These shares were attached, and on the day before he was to be evicted he came to Lord Massereene's agent, paid the full amount due, together with costs, and was restored to his holding, being forgiven £10 in costs. This was another case to which they were asked that evening to extend their sympathy. He did feel for small tenants in times of acute agrarian distress, but he could not get up to the altitude of expending much sympathy on the holders of share property and of other property of this kind, and who had farms of such a size that right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench in 1870 and 1881 thought they ought not to be brought under the Acts at all. The third defence was the success of the Plan. He wanted to know whether success was to be set up as the test of the righteousness of anything. But he challenged this so-called success. He absolutely challenged the statement. He knew it had succeeded on estates like the Dillon estate, where the holdings were small and the tenantry were numerous; but he denied that it had succeeded at Lugga-curran, at Coolgreany, on the O'Grady estate, or on the Ponsonby estate. On the contrary, it had failed and had imposed nameless hardships on the people who had succumbed to it. They had been compelled to strip their farms and sweep them as clean as a billiard table. People tenderly reared and brought up and living in decent houses had been obliged to herd together like swine in out-houses. This Plan had inflicted nameless horrors and disabilities on people who declared when persons went to visit them that they had been forced to join it and wished they saw the end of it. If hon. Members wished proof of that fact, and proof which could not be challenged, let them go to Murray's Magazine and read in the article by Mrs. Bishop, a lady who visited Ireland the other day, and who was not of the same way of thinking as he was, what she had to say about a dozen well-to-do families whom she found living under these circumstances, who had been forced out of their comfortable homes, who bitterly lamented it, and prayed God that the Plan might soon come to an end. He did not care whether the Plan had been successful or not; he was not going to stand up to vindicate successful villany. The next defence was the most potent of all; it was found in every Liberal newspaper and on the lip of every separatist Liberal; it was that Mr. Dillon should not have been condemned because he was Mr. Dillon. He deeply deplored the fact that any Member of that House should be brought into such a position; it betokened a diseased and disordered state of society. [Cries of "Oh!"] Why, the Chief Secretary himself would not challenge that statement; but until there was a section of the Crimes Act declaring that that Act should not apply to Mr. Dillon or any other Member of Parliament, no one had a right to demand that Mr. Dillon or any other man should go through Ireland inciting the people to do an illegal act. He desired to make his position entirely clear. Parliament had placed the Crimes Act upon the Statute Book. The Government were engaged in a great effort by its means to restore the sovereignty of the law in Ireland, and having had his share in placing that Act on the Statute Book, and he avowed it and gloried in it, he would be no party to weakening the hands of the Government in their resolute effort to enforce it. They and their instruments in Ireland might make mistakes; it was only an Irish Parliament that would not make mistakes. Very few mistakes had been made; but he should be no party to weakening the hands of the Government in the administration of that Act. He held firmly that so long as the Act in question was upon the Statute Book, it was quite impossible for the Government to allow the Act to be set at naught. Now he came to the question of Boycotting, and in his mind there never would have been this Crimes Act had it not been for the Plan of Campaign and Boycotting. Now, he was quite aware of the policy of the Liberal Party in relation both to the Plan of Campaign and to Boycotting. As a Party they did not adopt the Plan of Campaign as a plank in the Liberal platform, nor did they advocate Boycotting as a part of the Liberal propaganda. The time was not yet come for such a thing; but they delighted to honour the patentees of both these plans. It was one of those cases where liberty in non-essentials was lawful, and by-and-bye there would probably be subtlety of intellect enough on the Front Opposition Bench to prove that these things were not only admirable, but even Christian methods of political warfare. They had not come to that yet, but they might by-and-bye. It depended on the necessities of the position entirely; there was nothing too strong for a Liberal candidate now. When he (Mr. T. W. Russell) came to speak of Boycotting he did not mean exclusive dealing, but something else. Of course, if shopkeepers combined to prevent the police or obnoxious people getting bread or the necessaries of life, the task was a very difficult and a very delicate one; and he did not wonder that mistakes should be made in trying to enforce the law. He wanted to show Boycotting as he knew it. Take the case of Dowling as it appeared before the Judge Curran the other day. He said that that case perfectly illustrated the whole of the subject. What were the facts on which Dowling was convicted?

Here were two brothers in legal possession of a farm in the County of Kerry; they were joint owners, one paid his share of the rent and the other did not. The landlord evicted them both in order to get legal possession of the farm, and he put back into the farm the brother who paid the rent. The League deified the brother who paid no rent, but the other brother who did pay was Boycotted; from the day he paid his rent to the day of his death he lived under the protection of two armed policemen. Here was the National League shown in all its beauty, and he recommended the consideration of this matter to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley). Let them inquire still further. This man lived for some time under police protection. At 4 o'clock one morning last January, with the cold moon looking down on the scene—[Ironical laughter]. He noticed that not only in the House, but at public meetings he was in the habit of addressing, members of the Party which sat below the Gangway had a great objection to hear of this case; he could not understand why. On a January morning this old man got up, and with his daughter started for the fair at Listowel. The police started with him, but he told them when they had got a mile or so on the road that they might go back. They went back, and in a few minutes afterwards that old man, who had done no man wrong, but had striven to be an honest man, was foully and cruelly done to death before the eyes of his own daughter. Here came the point about Dowling. The trial took place; Norah Fitzmaurice swore at the trial of her father's murderers that she was afraid—and he asked the House to listen to this—that she was afraid to tell her priest that she knew the men. Could anything be more eloquent? The poor peasant girl, broken hearted and bereft, afraid to confer with her own priest on such a matter. Yes; but when the truth came out, what did this reverend gentleman say? He (Mr. T. W. Russell) quoted from the evidence. What did the priest say? This man, Father Sheehan, who ought to have comforted and shielded this brave girl in the absence of her murdered father, said to Norah, "You will get a deal of bother if you give evidence. There has been enough life lost already." This brave girl, he thanked God, rose to a higher altitude than that of her spiritual adviser; she did give evidence, and on her evidence her father's murderers were brought to justice. Let the House see what happened immediately. He would not dwell upon the fact that after the trial the Judge who conducted the trial, and who sentenced these men, was made the subject of furious tirades in The Freeman's Journal and The Nation, two newspapers owned and edited by Members who sat below the Gangway. This girl's father's murderers were taken back to Tralee. They were received, when they had been found guilty and sentenced, by a cheering crowd of people at Tralee—these people to whom the Opposition were so eager to submit the interests of himself and men like him. How was Norah Fitzmaurice received when she went back? She was Boycotted, and when she went on the first Sunday to the House of God itself, this man, Dowling, had the baseness to attempt to empty the chapel with the priest at the altar. He tried to Boycott the brave girl in the House of God. That man was tried by two Resident Magistrates; a Question was asked on the 24th of April in the House as to Dowling's sentence, so much interest was taken in him as all that. Dowling got six months under this very Crimes Act, and he (Mr. T. W. Russell) told the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that he was proud that he had helped to forge the weapon that punished him. He was denouncing Boycotting, and he was going to produce the evidence of a Nationalist on that very point. [Ironical cheers.] Aye, a Nationalist known to hon. Members below the Gangway, and as pure a Nationalist as lived. He was not founded on the Plan of Campaign model he (Mr. T. W. Russell) admitted, still he was a Nationalist of the purest type. In a public pamphlet Mr. Rolleston—[Derisive cheers]—Yes; hon. Members below the Gangway would hear what he said about them by-and-bye. Mr. Rolleston, in a public pamphlet, and he asked the House to listen to what Mr. Rolleston said in answer to a Gentleman who once sat on the Opposition side of the House, used these words—

"I have no right to feel any great astonishment or reprobation at Mr. Laing's position. A little more than two years ago, I myself, in a passing allusion to the subject, wrote that Boycotting, however illegal it might be, was in many cases justified by the magnitude of the legalised crime against which it is directed. I wrote as I have been forced to see, with very imperfect insight into the subject. It cannot, however, be pleaded for Mr. Laing that he has as little. I am that sure he sees as little as I did then the intimate, the necessary connection between Boycotting and violent crime. But by his own account he sees with perfect clearness what I did not see, or foresee—the manner in which Boycotting has been extended to punish not only those who try to benefit by landlord oppression at their neighbour's expense, but also all who are in any way guilty of thinking or acting for themselves. A tenant will be boycotted if he does not join the Plan of Campaign, if he makes and pays his rent for his own farm. United Ireland calls for the Boycotting of jurymen who, in cases of disagreement, desire to convict agrarian prisoners. Witnesses who give evidence against agrarian criminals are Boycotted, and not one Nationalist leader dares to risk unpopularity in the defence of these innocent sufferers. I have known a man ruthlessly Boycotted by a whole country side, and his life attempted, simply for taking a situation from which a drunken and dishonest bogranger was dismissed, who used to take money from the neighbours to let their cattle break in upon his master's land. The Coercion Act saved that man. He stood to his post, prosecuted his enemies whenever he could. At last they got tired of it, and he is now, I believe, rather a popular person in the neighbourhood. I or any other man would ten times rather have spent six months in Tullamore Gaol, with or without prison clothes, than in the state of persecution in which this man lived for longer than that time. And, measuring his release against Mr. O'Brien's imprisonment, I am not prepared to call the Coercion Act a purely oppressive measure."

Was it because a magistrate here and there might have made mistakes, might have erred in administering the law—was it because the Lord Chief Baron with his highly trained legal intellect could find flaws in evidence and procedure which were not even visible to his co-Judges in the Queen's Bench, much less to the mind of an ordinary man—was it because of these things, that he (Mr. T. W. Russell), forsooth, was to be asked to vote for a Motion of Censure on Her Majesty's Government? He should do nothing of the sort. Now, as to the administration of the Crimes Act. What was the contention of the Opposition? It was this—that some, at least, of the Resident Magistrates were incompetent. For the present let that be so. He desired to call the attention of the House to this fact, that since Her Majesty's Government came into Office they had appointed but three Resident Magistrates. [Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Oh, oh! Oh, oh!! Oh, oh!!!]

The hon. and learned Member for North Longford might cry "Oh, oh!" till 12 o'clock, if he liked; but he (Mr. T. W. Russell) said, so far as he was aware, and he thought it would trouble the hon. and learned Gentleman to find any more—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I say they have appointed a dozen.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was perfectly certain that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not be able to prove what he said. To the best of his judgment, and he kept a pretty strict look out on Irish politics, Her Majesty's Government had only appointed three Resident Magistrates. [Cries of "Give us the names!"] He was going to give the names. Everyone of the three was a highly trained and competent lawyer. The first was Mr. Hodder. Would anyone deny Mr. Hodder's competency to discharge the duties of a magistrate under the Crimes Act? Would anyone deny Mr. Shannon's capability? The third was Mr. Cecil Roche. He knew all these gentlemen, and what he had to say was that they all had very respectable places at the Bar. [Cries of "No, no!"] Oh; but he had lived in Ireland 30 years, and he maintained, from his own knowledge, that these men had all respectable positions at the Irish Bar, and were entirely competent for the work they had to do.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal): Shannon never practised at the Bar.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, but there were lawyers who had practised that were not worth much. Now, what he maintained was that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had been burdened with the tools Lord Spencer had left behind him; the right hon. Gentleman had these gentlemen on his hands; and the thing that astounded and astonished him (Mr. T. W. Russell)—he could not get over it—was that these men were entirely fit to administer the Crimes Act in 1882. But, said the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), they had no Law of Conspiracy to administer. Yes; but they had a great many things to deal with that were not in the present Crimes Act. He protested against the persistent attacks upon these Resident Magistrates, both from below the Gangway and from above the Gangway. These attacks were to be expected from Members below the Gangway, and no one was surprised when they came from that quarter; but for men, who had sat at the banqueting table with Lord Spencer when he bore testimony to the services of these very men, to join in any such attacks was something little short of a scandal. These men were performing difficult and dangerous duties under the most trying and disadvantageous circumstances, and it was not censure but high praise they deserved at the hands of this House. A good deal had been said in the country about the conduct of Dr. Webb and Mr. Hickson, County Court Judges, in increasing sentences on appeal in certain cases under the Crimes Act. A Return had been laid on the Table giving some information upon the subject. He did not care one straw for that Return, or for what it might contain. What he asked was, had these County Court Judges, who were not removable, a legal right to act as they acted? That was the question he wished to put. The Court of Exchequer, the favourite Court of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, had decided that these men had a legal right to act as they did act. Very well, that being so, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, these County Court Judges having a legal right to increase sentences, what right, legal or otherwise, had the Government to interfere with them? He maintained that the functions of the Courts of Law in this country through a not inglorious past had been to stand between the people and the Crown, and if the Government had dared to interfere with these County Court Judges he said that then the House might have passed a Vote of Censure upon the Government for their interference. These Judges had a legal right to act as they did, and the Government had no legal right, no moral right to interfere, and they would have been worthy of censure if they had interfered, and the House had no manner of right to challenge the action of the Government for the conduct of men with whom they had no business to interfere. He should vote against this Motion, because he did not believe any one of its propositions. He honestly believed there was more, and not less, respect for law since the Crimes Act was enacted; he believed, indeed, that it might have still further estranged the minds of evil-doers, but he also believed it had made life possible and enjoyable for many thousands of honest men. He did not believe it to be injurious to the common interests of the United Kingdom. The great function of law was that it should be a terror to evil-doers, and a protection to those who did well; the law was for the transgressor, not for the righteous. Addressing the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, the other day the Moderator of the Irish Assembly assured his Scotch brethren that not one of the 600,000 Presbyterians in Ireland was one whit the worse for this tyrannous code. The same thing could be said for every law-abiding citizen in Ireland, and, after all, they were not in such a wretched minority as people thought. This law, and the manly resolution which had been displayed in its enforcement, had affected all those—and he asked the attention of hon. Members to this—it had affected all those who did not pursue political ends by fair Constitutional means, but who resorted to the compulsion of their neighbours as a fair means of political warfare. It certainly did interfere with them. Did they doubt what he said, because, if so, he appealed again to a witness who was not on his side. He asked the House to listen to what Mr. Rolleston had to say upon the point—

“And when Norah Fitzmaurice, on her return to Kerry, is fiercely boycotted, and two of her persecutors sent to gaol—miscreants proved to be guilty of something even baser than murder itself—a Parnellite Member gets up in Parliament, with the tacit approval of his Party, to protest against the severity of their sentence. I have striven long—perhaps too long—to resist the evidence of for this solidarity of crime. I can resist it no longer. Too clear it is to me that approval or support of the Irish National League means a consent to iniquities than which the chronicles of the world's worst causes, bloodier though they sometimes be, can show nothing more abominably vile.”

That was from a man who believed in “Ireland a Nation,” but who did not quite see that the Plan of Campaign was going to make her one. So long as he (Mr. T. W. Russell) had health and strength he should protest against what was nothing more nor less than the assassination of free political thought in Ireland. He said to Irish Members below the Gangway, in all candour—“You wish an Irish Parliament; I do not.” But that was neither here nor there. He agreed to fight it out, but let hon. Members wage their fight as all honest political fights had been waged in the past. This House was free, they could go to the sovereign people of this country; they had the people to go to—[Cheers—and he could go too. Let them go to that sovereign people; let them carry their plans if they could, but he protested against an Irish Parliament being secured at the expense of character, at the expense of the freedom of those who honestly differed from them. It was not thus that Irish patriots fought in the olden times; at least he did not read Irish history in any such way. It certainly required a great stretch of imagination to picture Thomas Davis defending the Plan of Campaign, and it was a great demand on the imagination to fancy honest John Martin claiming the right to Boycott his neighbour because he did not agree with him. He conceded the right of hon. Members to get whatever they could by fair means in that House, but he denied their right to punish people who did not agree with them, and who thought that hon. Members, in trampling down all free thought, and in obliterating the difference between right and wrong, were the enemies and not the friends of Ireland. He, for one, most heartily rejoiced that there was an Act of Parliament which declared in the clearest terms, that if hon. Members would do these things, they should and they must take the consequences of their action.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, he thought he should best consult the convenience of the House if he confined himself mainly to one topic, and dealt chiefly with Mr. Dillon's trial and the Massereene tenants. His hon. Friend who had just sat down, and who claimed to speak impartially, evidently knew nothing at all of the case of the tenants on that property. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was present at the trial of Mr. Dillon, and he was proud to stand beside him on that occasion. It was his good fortune during the last few weeks to see much of Mr. Dillon, and the more he had seen of him the more he had been impressed by the nobility of his character, by his patriotism, and by his deep human sympathy. This opinion did not materially differ from that of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who, speaking at Battersea, not long ago, said that Mr. Dillon was able and eloquent, and of high honour and character. Yet this man of high honour and character was to be sent to prison as an ordinary criminal without trial by a jury. It was that of which they complained. Being in Ireland he was strongly urged by the tenants of Lord Massereene's property to visit them. He did so, and heard their story and also the story of Lord Massereene from his late and from his present agent. He also heard the story of the priest of the district, and he thought he was now in possession of the whole of the facts, which he believed were such as would convince many hon. Members who disliked the Plan of Campaign that there was much to be said for the course advocated by Mr. Dillon in the speech for which he was prosecuted. What were the facts? In 1886 there was a general fall of prices, and Lord Massereene's then agent, Mr. Wynne, advised his Lordship that all the rents of the property ought to be reduced, and recommended a reduction of 15 per cent in the case of non-judicial rents and of 10 per cent in the case of judicial rents. He gave the same advice to other owners. Lord Massereene refused to make any reduction at all. What was more, he dismissed his agent for his leniency to the tenants and for giving such advice. The tenants then met in a body and sent a deputation to Lord Massereene, who declined even to receive them or to make any reduction whatever. The tenants then entered into the combination known as the Plan of Campaign. They refused to pay their rents unless abatements were conceded to them of 25 per cent in the case of non-judicial rents and 20 per cent in the case of judicial rents. He had often said in public that there were in the Plan of Campaign features which he disapproved and disliked; but he had also said that the essence of the Plan was combination, and that combination was necessary and important in the circumstances which he had described. It was indeed the only way in which the tenants could meet such men as Lord Massereene and Lord Clanricarde. The Plan of Campaign was a desperate remedy for a most desperate evil. There never would have been a Plan of Campaign if the Government in 1886 had, in answer to the demand of 86 out of 101 Irish Members, proposed legislation to deal with the agrarian crisis, and the Plan of Campaign would have disappeared last year, or even this year, if the Government had dealt with the question of arrears in response to the almost universal demands of the Irish Members. When the tenants entered on the Plan of Campaign Lord Massereene put his affairs into the hands of the firm of well-known Dublin solicitors, Messrs. Dudgeon and Emerson, whose function it was to put down combinations by proceeding in a manner which they were familiar with. They took law proceedings of the most expensive character against the tenants of this property, and loaded them with law suits of every kind. It appeared that about 130 tenants originally adopted the Plan of Campaign. Out of these about 38 settled at various times. But these solicitors issued 47 writs of summons in March last year in the Superior Courts, 37 in June, 47 in September, and 24 in April of this year. They instituted proceedings in bankruptcy in nine cases, and in 70 cases they issued ejectments in the County Courts. Besides that there had been numerous seizures which the firm had carried out themselves. By proceedings of this kind they harassed the tenants with law costs—in one case where the rent was £130 the costs of the ejectment had amounted to £124. In another case of bankruptcy, in which the tenant owed £43 rent and there was only one other creditor for £5, the costs amounted to £120. Ten tenants in all were evicted, and their farms were now derelict. In one case where there was resistance 10 persons were sent to prison under the Coercion Act for various periods with hard labour. More recently the solicitors of Lord Massereene had endeavoured to draw away the people from the Plan of Campaign by offering more favourable terms than before. In many cases of tenants on Lord Massereene's property the Land Commission had given their judgment on fair rents; in other cases the Land Commission had given their decision under the Act of last year with respect to judicial rents. As a matter of fact, the Land Commission had made very large reductions of rent in many cases to an extent greater than was originally asked for, the average reduction being 23 per cent, while under the Act of last year the judicial rents had, on an average, been reduced 15 per cent. Under the advice of his present agents Lord Massereene had recently offered to make his tenants the same abatement of arrears, both in respect of original and judicial rents, as the Land Commission had given. There could not be a doubt that if this offer had been made two years ago instead of being kept back to the present time, there would have been no combination, no ejectments, and no trouble whatever; but if the Plan of Campaign had not existed he would never have offered these terms, and to that extent the Plan of Campaign had been successful. At that moment there was no longer any difference between Lord Massereene and his tenants on the subject of abatement; but there still remained two great difficulties in the way of a settlement—namely, the costs which had been piled up by Lord Massereene's solicitors and the re-instatement of the evicted tenants. Unless those two questions could be settled amicably between Lord Massereene and his tenantry, there could be no peace on the property. He had often heard it stated that there would have been a settlement upon the property if Mr. Dillon had not gone down and made a speech. He ventured to say that that was not the fact, and he could prove it to the satisfaction of the House. The offer to which he had just adverted was made by Lord Massereene through the parish priest, Father Toofe, who was one of the two priests in the district not favourable to the Plan of Campaign. Father Toofe consulted the Archbishop of Armagh on the subject, and in reply his Grace sent a letter, which presented the case of the tenants in as calm and unprejudiced a manner as possible, and showed the real difficulties now standing in the way of a settlement. The Archbishop wrote—

“ I am sorry to say I can see in the proposal made but very slight reasons to hope for a satisfactory settlement. It appears that at this stage of the dispute the amount of reduction is a secondary consideration. The costs seem to me to be one main obstacle. From what I have heard I believe that the tenants, with the best will in the world to do so, would not be able to meet their costs or anything approaching to the amount. True, the solicitors say that their costs have been swelled by the useless defences taken by the tenants. From the information I could gather I am led to believe that these costs have been piled up to such enormous figures by vexatious actions taken in the Superior Courts while the decrees of a County Court would have served all practicable purposes equally well. But, apart from the many questions, I see in the solicitors' letter indications of an intention which, if carried out, would render an amicable settlement of the dispute, and one that would lead to permanent peace, impossible—(1) It appears from the letter that Lord Massereene wishes to deal with the tenants individually. That means war, not a peaceable settlement. (2) It appears his Lordship intends to make victims, and I am very much mistaken if that intention does not shut the door against all amicable arrangement. He may perhaps succeed in patching up some kind of temporary arrangement on these terms; but it will leave an amount of smouldering discontent which is likely to break out into a fresh flame of still greater violence."

That letter very accurately described the present condition of things, and pointed out very clearly the difficulties in the way of a settlement. He had since seen Messrs. Dudgeon and Emerson on the subject, and had done his very utmost to bring about a settlement. He impressed upon them his belief that Lord Massereene must give way on the question of costs and the re-instatement of evicted tenants, but he was sorry to say that Messrs. Dudgeon and Emerson stated that Lord Massereene was inexorable on the subject of evicted tenants. It was under those circumstances, and knowing the facts he had mentioned, that Mr. Dillon made the speech complained of. He took it that that speech meant that the tenants should stand by the evicted tenants. Mr. Dillon considered that they were bound in honour, having entered into combination, to stand by those who had suffered for their cause, and he begged them not to come to an agreement unless they could make an agreement affecting all of them. With that view of the case he entirely agreed. He believed that Mr. Dillon was acting rightly in giving that advice, though he did not undertake to father all the speech Mr. Dillon made. It was true there were some expressions of a rather doubtful character, and though he would rather not have used them he did not agree with the interpretation that had been placed on them by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Substantially he agreed that after what had taken place the tenants on Lord Massereene's property were bound as honourable men not to come to a settlement unless it dealt with the case of the evicted tenants. He would illustrate this by what occurred on his visit to the property. He met 12 of the poorest of the tenants on the property, who were miserably poor people, all holding land under £8 a-year. They had joined the Plan of Campaign two years ago, and were now three years in arrear. Only two months ago the Land Commission reduced their rents by more than the abatement they originally asked—namely, by 27 per cent. Lord Massereene's solicitors had offered to make them the same abatement for arrears as the Land Commission had made in respect for rent if they would abandon the Plan of Campaign and pay their rents. They said they were very well satisfied with the terms offered them. To his inquiry whether they were going to agree to the terms they said—"No; we mean to stand by the Plan of Campaign, we mean to stand by the evicted tenants." He would ask hon. Members opposite what advice he should have given these men. Should he have told them that he disapproved of their conduct and recommended them to abandon the evicted tenants? [Mr. W. H. SMITH made a gesture of assent.] If the right hon. Gentleman thought so, he disagreed with him on the point of honour. As a matter of fact, he did not then know the facts of the case; but with the knowledge he now had, he should not hesitate to tell these tenants that they were bound as men of honour to stand by the evicted tenants. He did not know whether that declaration would bring him within the Criminal Law; but he presumed that, if the law were as laid down by the Judges in Mr. Dillon's case, had he spoken in that sense, he would have brought himself within the Criminal Law. He was quite ready to go back to Ireland and make a speech in that sense to those tenants only subject to this—that he should be tried by a jury. He was convinced that no jury in the United Kingdom would convict him of crime for giving advice of that description. No jury could have been found in Ireland which would have convicted Mr. Dillon of the offence with which he was charged. The Government had shown they knew that by the pains they had taken to procure his trial before Resident Magistrates. That showed that the Government was perfectly aware that they could get no jury in Ireland to convict Mr. Dillon, and it would have been equally difficult in any other part of the United Kingdom. It was the province of juries to temper the Criminal Law in such cases as this, and to distinguish between what were political and what were criminal offences. Their belief was that if it were any offence at all it was a political offence, and a political offender ought to have been tried before a jury and not sent to prison like an ordinary criminal. One main complaint they had to make against the Coercion Act, especially in the case of Mr. Dillon, was that men who had been convicted of purely political offences had been treated by the Government as ordinary criminals. It was the first time in history that a Government had treated their political opponents as ordinary criminals. There was not in the history of the country a precedent of that kind. Many references had been made to the Coercion Act of 1882, and it was said that Mr. Dillon and others were sent to prison under it. Yes, but they were not treated as ordinary prisoners, but as political prisoners. If we could imagine the two great antagonists in this case—the Chief Secretary and Mr. Dillon—side by side, and could take the verdict of the country upon their case—if the question could be put which of the two was the real patriot and the benefactor of Ireland, he ventured to think that by a considerable majority the verdict would be in favour of Mr. Dillon. The same majority, however, would not desire to treat the Chief Secretary in the manner in which he treated his political opponents; its desire would be that his only punishment should be the contemplation, in retirement, of the wreck and destruction of his Irish policy.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, he thought he could congratulate the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) on taking a more rosy view of the opinion of the House than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). Apparently, the right hon. Gentleman was of opinion that the House would, by an overwhelming majority, approve of the action of Mr. Dillon and disapprove of the action of the law and of the Government. He imagined that to-morrow night the right hon. Gentleman would no longer be of that opinion. Then the right hon. Gentleman informed the House

how the Government ought to have acted in settling the Irish Question; he said that if they had consulted the wishes of the Irish people there would have been no more difficulty at all. Well, but what part of the Irish people did he mean? He certainly did not mean that part of the Irish population which he (Colonel Saunderson) had the honour to more or less represent. He (Colonel Saunderson) could quite conceive that if they did away with immunity from crime they would have no more criminals. There were a section of the Irish people who held certain views and who had adopted certain courses, and he could quite understand that if their advice had been followed they would have been perfectly satisfied, and they would not have adopted those courses which the Government and the law in Ireland at the present time were confronting. Then the right hon. Gentleman made some very brave statements as to his intentions. Why did he not make those speeches in Ireland? He said he was ready to make them, but he never did make them over in Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman really sympathized with Mr. Dillon and his views, why did he not get up in Louth, when he was over there, why did he not get up at Woodford, when he was over there, and boldly state that he sympathized with the Plan of Campaign and with the resistance which a certain section of the Irish people were offering to the law of the land?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he spoke at Woodford in precisely the same sense as he had spoken in the House that night.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he did not exactly know in what sense the right hon. Gentleman had spoken. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman said he was ready to make the same speech in Ireland, but with a very remarkable reservation: he must have the choice of a jury. He did not find so much fault with the right hon. Gentleman for his visit to Louth; but he did find great fault with him, considering the knowledge the right hon. Gentleman possessed of the affairs in Ireland, for his visit to Woodford. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well, he must have known, from his well known intelligence, the condition and the character of the neighbourhood of Woodford, to which he went to throw oil upon the fire, to incite as far as he could—at least that was how he read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches—to incite the tenantry to continue resistance to what he (Colonel Saunderson) believed to be the law of the land. The right hon. Gentleman must have known, when he went to Woodford, that in that neighbourhood, in the course of seven years, nay, a little over six years, there had been 11 agrarian murders, 54 violent outrages, seven cases of firing into dwellings, 49 cases of threatening letters, and that there were 95 persons wholly Boycotted, 119 persons partially Boycotted, and 31 happy Irishmen under police protection. That was what they called in Ireland a hot neighbourhood. Knowing this perfectly well, as the right hon. Gentleman must have done, he went over there and backed up the efforts which were made by Irish agitators to hound on this inflammable and criminal population to further resistance of the law. He left the right hon. Gentleman to the judgment of every right-thinking man in the House of Commons and the country. He would now proceed to say a word or two on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had had ample preparation for the task he had to perform. Not only was he a gentleman of great talent and ability and remarkable ingenuity of intellect, but he had also the assistance of 85 hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who were as sharp as needles, who read every speech—especially his (Colonel Saunderson's)—who lost nothing that took place at any Petty Sessions Court in Ireland, who examined with the keenest interest all the proceedings of the magistrates of whom they were so fond; and yet, with all the ability which undoubtedly did exist below the Gangway, and with his own acumen, the right hon. Gentleman made out the very weakest case that had ever been presented to the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to him to be a just man labouring under difficulties in hot weather. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that in 1890, when an appeal was made to the country, the result would be the same as in 1880. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman gave them two more years of life. He thought, from the speeches he had heard, and from the articles he had read in newspapers, that his Party was on the point of disruption, that a General Election was in the immediate future, but now they found that they had two more years of life. He ventured to prophecy that this Government and this Unionist Party, with two years of life yet before it, would have ample time to settle for many a long year this Irish Question. The right hon. Gentleman made use of one extraordinary argument—he attacked the Government for locking up Mr. Dillon; and why? Because he said Mr. Dillon was a man of vast power, ability, and popularity. Well, he never in his life heard such an argument as that for not locking up a man who broke the law. Was it possible that in the 19th century—which was supposed to be a century of civilization—that because a man had succeeded, no matter how, in gaining power and attaining to popularity, which was really a very evanescent property, he might with impunity defy the law of the land. Surely the right hon. Gentleman could not have been serious when he made that the ground of attack on Her Majesty's Government for shutting up Mr. Dillon. The right hon. Gentleman had gone on to ask, how could you shut up a man who is received by deputations and Boards of Guardians, and as a culminating point, as a mark of power and popularity, has had the unprecedented honour of receiving an address signed by 150 Members of Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: No Irish Member signed that.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he was afraid, with all due respect to the hon. Gentleman below the Gangway, that he must discount these 150 Members of Parliament. Eighty-five were bound to sign when they were told. [Cries of "No, no!"] Did hon. Gentlemen deny that? Did hon. Gentlemen opposite deny that they had to sign the pledge? [Cries of "No, no!"] Besides, Mr. Dillon did unquestionably represent the policy of the Separatist Party, and, therefore, even if no Irishman signed the address, he could quite understand any Separatist Member signing it, because Mr. Dillon was the great exponent of the policy that the Separatist Party had adopted. So he did not at all wonder at the Address. Then the right hon. Gentleman had gone on to say that there had been a great deal of loose talk about the Plan of Campaign, and had defended, so far as he (Colonel Sanderson) had understood him, the Plan of Campaign on this ground—he said the reduction proposed by the Plan of Campaign in many instances had not been so large as the reductions granted by the Land Court. Now, the objection to the Plan of Campaign by himself (Colonel Sanderson) and his Friends was not that the reductions the Plan of Campaign proposed were in excess of the reductions granted by the Land Court. That was not the ground they had taken in opposing it; certainly not. He was not now saying whether the reductions proposed by the Plan of Campaign were greater or whether they were less than those granted by the Land Court. As he said, those were distinctly not the grounds upon which they opposed the Plan. They opposed the Plan of Campaign because they submitted to the House and to the country that no organization had a right to force upon them what the law did not decree. They refused absolutely to be bound by any organization in Ireland, whether it called itself the Plan of Campaign or whether it called itself the National League, and that was their objection to the Plan. The Plan of Campaign had now been declared to be illegal by the Judges of the land; it had even been declared to be immoral by the Pope. [Ironical cheers.] Fancy living to see the day when hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite would deride the Pope? Why, he ventured to say that a very short time ago, if he had ventured to laugh at the authority of his Holiness, hon. Members below the Gangway would have risen at once and have said that he was insulting their religion, and now they were the first to deride him when he found that their policy was opposed to the Ten Commandments. Those were the reasons why they on that (the Ministerial) side of the House had taken objection to the Plan of Campaign. The right hon. Gentleman had done him the honour to quote a speech he had made at Ayr, and he was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had done so, because he thought that was rather a good speech. He (Colonel Sanderson) had made a statement in that speech which the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned. He had not made that statement in the heat of the moment, because he generally spoke with great deliberation. He had stated his belief that the settlement of this question would never ultimately be reached until they had their heel upon the necks of these people, and the right hon. Gentleman had said—and he (Colonel Sanderson) was sure that he believed absolutely what he did say—that in saying that he (Colonel Sanderson) referred to the Irish people. He had never meant anything of the kind. He had meant hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. [An hon. MEMBER: It is the same thing.] He had made that statement in answer to a speech made by Mr. Dillon himself. Mr. Dillon, in a speech he had made in Dublin, had declared that this was “a life and death struggle out of which only one party would come alive.” Well, if anyone came alive out of this struggle, he (Colonel Sanderson) meant to be the man—that was, if he could. Then the right hon. Gentleman had gone on to attack the action of the police in Ireland in what he had called these “got up cases.” But the right hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well, if he knew as much about Ireland as he ought to know, having been Chief Secretary in that country, that no man could come forward in Ireland to establish a Boycotting case, except at the peril of his life, and that the only course that could have been adopted was to break up this conspiracy by the action of the police, and by making those prosecutions; and whether the action of the Government had been a success or not he left the House to judge from a telegraphic despatch which he had just received to the effect that Judge Curran, in addressing the Grand Jury in the County of Kerry—a county which, he was sorry to say, had had the worst reputation—had said that—“Moonlighting had almost disappeared, and Boycotting was a thing of the past.” Well, he must say—and he thought he spoke for every hon. Member on that (the Ministerial) side of the House—that he hailed with unbounded satisfaction the Motion that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had placed on the Paper.

He hailed it for this reason, that this debate would have the effect of crystalizing and putting into a permanent shape the policy of their opponents. He (Colonel Saunderson) had spoken a good deal about the country, sometimes with success and sometimes with the reverse; but the difficulty he had always found was to dress up and place before the people the policy of their opponents. He used the words "dress up" advisedly, because their opponents never supplied them with any clothes of their own. Their policy changed from day to day. They were a short time ago wild about the Home Rule policy, but they had learned from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that for the time being Home Rule was a thing of the past, and that a new issue altogether had been placed before the country. Therefore, they had hitherto found great difficulty in enforcing upon the people of the country that there were two policies placed before them, and that they had to choose between them. He thought this debate would make the issue clear and distinct. [Cheers and Laughter.] He was extremely glad that he had at last said something with which hon. Members opposite could agree. [An hon. MEMBER: You are always funny.] He and his Friends differed from hon. Gentlemen opposite on the proper understanding of fundamental principles. They differed altogether as to what the word "liberty" meant. [Cheers.] Yes, absolutely, he admitted that. He admitted that he held old-fashioned views. He believed that "liberty" meant what he always understood it to mean—what the Liberal Party as well as the Conservative Party in former times held it to mean—namely, that it was the right of every man in this country to do what he pleased within the boundary of the law, and that to allow a man to do what he pleased outside the boundary of the law was not "liberty," but license. Now the Separatist Party held entirely different views as to what liberty meant. So far as he understood them, liberty, in their minds, meant that a man might do what he pleased even outside the boundary of the law so long as he happened to be either a Nationalist Member of Parliament or a Member of the National League. He (Colonel Saunderson) could not conceive that that definition of the word "liberty" would find permanent access to the minds of the English people. Then they disagreed altogether as to the meaning of "legal obligation." He and his Friends had always understood that "legal obligation" meant the obligation of every citizen of this country, or indeed any other civilized country, to obey the law until that law was changed. But according to the definition of "legal obligation," which they had learned, especially from the Front Opposition Bench, if a law was a bad law its badness was to be decided, not by the House, but by the various persons in the country with whom the law interfered, and they were perfectly justified in breaking it and setting it at defiance. Crime was to be punished with the utmost severity—even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) would agree with that—so long as it was free from the garments of Irish Nationality; that was to say, so long as it was invisible. If they could only dress up crime, in the opinion of the Irish Nationalists or Land Leaguer it was to be altogether above the law of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby spoke of the National League as a perfectly legal combination. How could any man, how could any Member of the House who had held the position of responsibility which had been held by the right hon. Gentleman, hold for a moment and have, he might say, the audacity to state before an intelligent audience, that this National League was a perfectly legal combination in face of the fact that an Act of Parliament passed by the British Parliament had declared it to be illegal. The National League had been proclaimed, and in many parts of Ireland it had been suppressed, and yet they found the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby defending the action of Mr. Dillon and other Members of the Party below the Gangway who, when they got down to parts of Ireland where the Land League had been suppressed and made speeches there, advocated their action and said that the combination was a perfectly legal one. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, he must say, adopted methods in his attack upon the Government without parallel in the history of Parliamentary warfare. What did the right hon. Gentleman say—what did he say the other day at Stockport? Why, he informed his audience that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in imprisoning Mr. Dillon was doing it simply out of spite to revenge himself for the blow Mr. Dillon gave him at Ayr. [Cheers.] He could quite understand hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite cheering that. That was also their opinion; but he ventured to say that no statesman in this country had ever yet adopted so mean a method in trying to injure a political opponent. It was not his (Colonel Saunderson's) right hon. Friend who had caused the imprisonment of Mr. Dillon; it was caused by Mr. Dillon himself; it was owing to the fact that Mr. Dillon had chosen to state it as his deliberate intention to go on defying and breaking the laws which this Parliament had passed. He would say this for Mr. Dillon, that he was above-board in his statements. He had some respect for an enemy who openly stated what his intention was and carried it out, and he would say this for Mr. Dillon, that he had been very clear and distinct as to what his intentions were—namely, to defy the Government and to defy this Coercion Act which Parliament had passed. It was because Mr. Dillon had thus deliberately violated the law of the land, and not because the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had any spite against him, that Mr. Dillon now found himself in an Irish gaol. But these were not always the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby about Mr. Dillon and about the organization of which he was one of the chiefs. He (Colonel Saunderson) did not like to weary the House with quotations. [Cries of "Go on!"] He meant to go on, for it would be a pity to lose any of the refreshing eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman. He had taken some trouble with the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He had arranged them in years—he kept them in bins, like port wine. He had them in various vintages which he occasionally, as circumstances required, decanted, and he had tried to discover, but had absolutely failed in discovering,

how it was that Gentlemen who liked the vintage of 1881 and 1882 of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby could swallow and digest and smack their lips over the vintage of 1888. He would ask the House to listen for one moment to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said about Mr. Dillon and his organization in this House in 1881. He said—

“We have heard the doctrine of the Land League explained by a man who has authority to explain it,” that was to say, Mr. Dillon—

“and to-morrow every subject of the Queen will know that the doctrine so explained is a doctrine of treason and assassination. To-morrow the civilized world will pronounce its judgment on this vile conspiracy.”

That was the vintage of 1881, and now he (Colonel Saunderson) would pour out a little of the 1888 vintage. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“To-morrow the Government were going to send to prison Mr. John Dillon, a man who had done more to defend the poor and the oppressed in Ireland than any other man.”

Here they had the right hon. Gentleman standing up before the House of Commons, a man, according to the best authority, in whose veins coursed the blood of the Plantagenets, deliberately adopting as the policy of his Party the doctrines of treason and assassination. He could understand any man changing his mind. It was done every day. They had a right to change their minds as often as they liked; but he maintained that they had no right whatever to expect others to follow them in that change unless they gave a logical account of how that change had taken place; and never yet had the right hon. Gentleman, either in the House or at any of the many meetings which he had addressed from time to time, stated he had altered in one iota the view he had entertained of the organization he now employs as one of the chief engines of his policy. He was glad that Mr. Dillon was the main subject of this debate, and that it was his imprisonment which had called forth this Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, because Mr. Dillon was the chief exponent, the principal embodiment, and the very life-blood of the National League. They could not disassociate Mr. Dillon's speech at Louth from the speeches which he had made at other places. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said he thought that probably Mr. Dillon regretted, or might regret, the words he had recently used in Ireland. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was mistaken in this belief. The reason he said so was, that he happened to hold in his hand three separate speeches delivered by Mr. Dillon, in which he iterated and re-iterated the same sentiments. He maintained that it was against men of this kind that the Crimes Act had been directed, and ought to be directed, if Ireland was to become a civilized country, and was not to be handed over to a criminal agitation which was sapping its very life-blood. What did Mr. Dillon say at the Rotunda last year, in speaking of the action he intended to employ? He said—

“If there is a man in Ireland base enough to back down and turn his back on the fight now coercion is passed, I pledge myself in the face of this meeting that I will denounce him from public platforms by name, and I pledge myself to the Government that, let that man be who he may, his life will not be a happy one in Ireland or across the seas. I know perfectly well what I mean, and you know what I mean.”

He should rather think they did. Making a man's life not a happy one in Ireland had already been exemplified by the case of Fitzmaurice, and now by the case of his daughter, and by hundreds of others who had been persecuted and tormented by the nefarious organization which it was the bounden duty and which he believed it would be the ultimate honour of this Government to destroy. But immediately afterwards, in the following month, Mr. Dillon went down to Limerick, and, showing how this subject dwelt in his mind, said—

“I say that the man who stands aside in such circumstances is a dastard and a coward, and he and his children after him will be remembered in the days that are near at hand when Ireland will be a free nation.”

What a happy country Ireland would be when she was a free nation, when a man, because he dared to follow his own wishes and opinions, was denominated as a dastard and a coward, and was held up to public execration and was hounded on to death and destruction. But he found that the same idea rankled in the mind of the hon. Gentleman, and in a speech which he made in Kildare on the 28th May last, it appeared that he held the same opinions. This system of intimidation had always been, and would always be, the backbone of the policy of the National League.

“Do we not know perfectly well?” said the hon. Member, “that we tried every means. Those who went before us tried good means and they tried bad means, a good many of them, and they did not succeed; and there never was the slightest bit of success until we hit upon the dodge of making it hot for the man who took his neighbour's land.”

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle need not therefore believe for a moment that the words that he had condemned were words that had sprung unbidden to the lips of the hon. Member for East Mayo. They were the words which accurately described now as they had described all along the only means by which hon. Members below the Gangway and the organization which they led had carried on their work in Ireland. Then the hon. Member for East Mayo went down to Louth. In one instance, which he should quote to the House, they would find that this principle of intimidation dogged the steps, or did dog the steps, of Mr. Dillon until he was put out of the way. This was a case that occurred on the estate of Lord Massereene. Within the last few days a tenant on the estate at Cullen, who had permitted the time for the redemption to expire, paid his rent and was restored to his holding, the sum of £12 being accepted to cover outlay in the action. Matthews's rent was paid by his son, James Matthews, vice-president of the local branch of the National League. On being questioned by the agent, he said his father had paid one year's rent into the Plan of Campaign. He was asked to whom he paid it, and he replied that he did not know, as his rent was paid through a window in a place in Cullen, and his father could not see to whom he paid it. On being interrogated as to whether he got a receipt, he said that he did, but there was no name to it. That was a Land League receipt. It merely said that the sum was subscribed to the Plan of Campaign. Matthews was accompanied by another tenant on the same estate, named Gallagher, who had been served with a civil bill process to appear for judgment at the Drogheda Quarter Sessions last Monday. Gallagher also paid his rent. The movements of these two men were watched, and they were summoned to appear before the local branch of the National League on Sunday, June 10. Gallagher denied and Matthews admitted the payment of the rent. The chairman then said "You are a second James Carey"—a man whose fate the House was no doubt well acquainted with. That was the way a man's life was made uncomfortable for him "even beyond the sea." Would this House, would this country, when they understood the real issue before them and the nature of this organization, condemn the Government because they endeavoured to secure for poor men like Gallagher and Matthews that they might live in Ireland without the danger of meeting with the same fate as James Carey? He did not believe the country would. But the hon. Member for East Mayo was not alone in his determination to hound to death, if possible, a man who might disobey the decrees of the organization. He saw the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) in his place, and that hon. Member had made a speech in which he spoke of the classes he meant to destroy in Ireland. On the 29th May the hon. Member said—

"It is now or never, now and for ever that we are called upon to make a stand for the liberties of our citizens and for the undying cause of Ireland. We will obey Rome to the death in religious matters, but we will not obey Rome in politics. We will stick to the Plan of Campaign until some more effectual plan makes its appearance; we will stick to Boycotting, and we will continue to regard every land-grabber and every exterminator as a public pest and a public enemy, more dangerous to society than a leper."

That was to say, if any unfortunate Irishman happened to "back down," or to resist the policy of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, he was to be treated as a pest and a leper. Would the country venture to sanction such a policy as that? The more these things rang in the ears of the people of England the more they would find them rallying to the support of a Government whose object it was to render such things in Ireland impossible. There was recently a banquet at which were gentlemen who had earned the approval of their countrymen by breaking the law, and being, in consequence, imprisoned; and at this banquet the policy of the separatists was clearly defined. If he wanted to know what was the policy of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Benches, he should not apply for information to them, but to those who dictated the policy. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) made a speech of his usual eloquence at the banquet. He said, speaking of the Separatist Party—

"They had won the extended franchise for Ireland, by the use of which they had attached to the Irish cause the Liberal Party. It was not, it appeared, because the Irish cause was just, but because the extended franchise had enabled the Irish Party to return 85 Members that the Liberal Party had adopted that cause."

And then the hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"That they had secured for the tenants of Ireland that great change in the position of the main body of the Irish people by which they were converted from tenants at will into legal joint owners of the soil."

The hon. Gentleman continued to say—

"Such a vast change had never before been achieved in the history of the world in so short a time, except by means of an armed revolution."

And yet hon. Members would go about the country, and perhaps to the Isle of Thanet, and tell the electors that they were defending the cause of the oppressed tenants in Ireland, whom the right hon. Gentleman said had had gifts conferred upon them unparalleled in any country in the world. To adopt the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, of former years, the Government were not fighting against the people of Ireland, but they were fighting to deliver them from a tyrannical yoke. This was the task which they had taken in hand, and in which they believed they would ultimately succeed. At the banquet in question many statements were made; but there was one very signal omission, the health of Her Majesty the Queen was not drunk, and the toast of the evening was "Ireland a nation." In the many speeches which had been delivered by hon. Gentlemen opposite, they had heard no word of "Ireland a nation." He should like to hear right hon. Gentlemen opposite get up and state that "Ireland a nation" was the policy for which they were fighting. But "Ireland taking her place among the nations of the world, free from outside control," was the sentiment of the hon. Member for Cork a few years ago. That policy had been continuously carried on, and the words, if they meant anything, meant the disruption of the Empire. He could not feel a doubt for a moment that, though the Government might lose bye-elections on false issues, when the people of the country were brought face to face with the reality of the policy presented by the Opposition, they would not hesitate to decide in 1890, or whenever a General Election took place, that the policy of the Unionist Party was the one which they should adopt. It was his wish that that policy should succeed, because he trusted to the respect for the law which existed in this country. This he believed to be the backbone of the country, because upon it were founded its greatness, its freedom, and its prosperity; and he had no doubt that when right hon. Gentlemen opposite confronted the people, they would find at the end of their path—which he and his hon. Friends believed to be a path of shame and dishonour—the condemnation of the British people.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. William O'Brien,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, the sum of £2,366,400, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.”—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, it was somewhat remarkable that at such an hour the Government should attempt to press Business of that nature without any kind of explanation. Still, perhaps there would be no objection to the Vote being taken, if it was known what the Government proposed to do with the other Business down on the Paper, in the short time that still remained.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he only asked the Committee to take the Resolution in regard to two Votes for the Army and Navy which were taken the other night, and as to which there was general consent, that there should be no opposition. He deferred those Votes upon which it was agreed opportunity should be given for discussion. The money was urgently required, and he hoped no objection would be now raised.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, he must move to report Progress, as a protest against what was growing to be a systematic practice of taking important Business at such an hour.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Dr. Tanner.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he trusted the hon. Member would not insist on that Motion against what had always been regarded as purely formal Business, and which was in fulfilment of obligations already entered into by the House. No new Vote was asked for; this was merely following the formal procedure with which all Members of experience were familiar, and which required the confirmation in Ways and Means of a Vote agreed to in Committee. There really could be no reason or motive for opposition to a stage always agreed to as a matter of course.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, would not Members have been entitled to move Motions on the Question of the Speaker leaving the Chair?

MR. W. H. SMITH replied in the negative.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, as the right hon. Gentleman had given an explicit answer, and shown that he was merely conforming to the Rules of the House, his hon. Friend would do well not to press his Motion. It was agreed that one Vote for the Army and Navy should be taken, and no advantage was being taken by the Government; and his hon. Friend, with his usual generosity, would surely not persist. If he did, his Friends would be under the necessity of voting against him; and, after that, they might “expect the deluge.”

DR. TANNER said, he would not have attempted to oppose, were it not that the Government were ready on every possible occasion, no matter what the hour, to try and obtain Votes for large sums of money without any discussion. But there ought to be discussion; the country ought to know what the money was for. The other night, when another Vote came under discussion—

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he was sorry to interrupt his hon. Friend, but he begged to be allowed to claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

DR. TANNER proceeded: If he quite understood that the right hon. Gentleman would not follow the bad precedent which had had its effect on the present occasion, of applying the Closure, and checking discussion when a Money Vote was asked for—if the right hon. Gentleman would amend his ways in the future, and appreciate these remarks, he (Dr. Tanner) would show himself amenable to reason, and withdraw the Motion. He did so, however, on the distinct understanding that the right hon. Gentleman would behave himself well in the future.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CONYBEARE felt he owed a word of apology to his hon. Friend for his impatient interruption, and recognized the impartiality of the Chairman.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, the sum of £2,366,400, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [21st June] reported.

First Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the First Resolution."

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, there were several things in connection with the Vote upon which both himself and other Members were desirous of addressing the House.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, it only related to the two Votes he had referred to.

Dr. Tanner

MR. CONYBEARE maintained his objection.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

BAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 286.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked if, under the temporary suspension of the Midnight Rule, it was intended to take any of these Bills?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, it was not intended to do so.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

WALTHAM ABBEY GUNPOWDER FACTORY BILL.—[BILL 273.]

(Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Secretary Stanhope.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) said, if the House would agree to take the second reading of this Bill, he would then propose its reference to a Select Committee. It was to the interest of the public as well as of the War Department that the question should be settled.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) objected.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

CORONERS' ELECTIONS BILL.

(Mr. Wootton Isaacson, Mr. Gourley, Mr. Ambrose, Colonel Hughes.)

[BILL 178.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, he was quite willing to agree that the Bill should not apply to Ireland; but in England the Bill was much needed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he would advise the hon. Member to move the discharge of the Bill, and bring in an amended Bill; he would be in exactly the same position.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

M O T I O N S .

LEGAL BUSINESS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House Copy of the Report of the Committee appointed by the Treasury to inquire into the system of conducting the Legal Business of the Government."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he must object to this, unless the Irish information were included. Surely it was very important to Irish Members.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, the hon. and learned Member had rather misunderstood the Motion. This was a Departmental Inquiry held into the Legal Department of the Treasury. The Committee, after holding many meetings, had made their Report, and it was thought desirable that this Report should be laid on the Table, so that hon. Members interested might see it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 239.]

BUILDINGS (METROPOLIS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Whitmore, Bill to restrict the height of Buildings in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Tatton Egerton, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Mr. Lawson, and Mr. Forrest Fulton.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 305.]

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (NEW LICENCES) BILL.

On Motion of Sir William Houldsworth, Bill to suspend the grant of new Licences for the sale of Intoxicating Liquors, ordered to be brought in by Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, Colonel Bridgeman, Mr. Hobhouse, and Mr. Samuel Smith.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 306.]

PERPETUITY LEASES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. T. W. Russell, Bill to enable the Lessees of Perpetuity and other Leases excluding from "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887," to purchase the interests in their holdings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Lea, and Mr. W. P. Sinclair.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 307.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson), in the absence of the President of the Board of Trade, whether the Provisional Order (No. 2) Bill, set down for Wednesday, would really be taken on that day? It had been postponed from day to day, in consequence primarily of the controversy that had arisen in reference to Salvation Army processions at Torquay. In that question he did not profess to take any interest; but, unfortunately for him, Tralee was mixed up in the same Bill with Torquay. He suggested that, instead of taking the Bill on Wednesday, the interval before Public Business on an ordinary Sitting should be utilized, and all temptation to Members to protract discussion to the disadvantage of the next Business of the day would be avoided. The question he had to raise concerned an expenditure of £5,000 at Tralee, and he was anxious to hear what objection there could be to giving traders of the town a seat on the Harbour Board. But he only desired now to know if the Bill would really be brought on on Wednesday, or perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would give an answer at the next Sitting of the House?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he was unable to give the hon. Member the information; but he would answer the question later.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, the interest of Torquay in the Bill was great, if it could not vie with Tralee, and he had reason to believe that there would be long discussion on the Bill, 87 Amendments having been given Notice of. Possibly much of the discussion might be avoided by another postponement.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 26th June, 1888.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment * (178); High Courts in India * (184).

Second Reading—Suffragans' Nomination (176); Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment (170); Distress for Rent (Dublin) (171).

Committee—Factory and Workshops Act (1878) Amendment (Scotland) (76).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—First Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland)* (179); Gas (No. 1)* (180); Local Government (No. 6)* (181); Local Government (No. 9)* (182); Local Government (No. 12)* (183).

ZULULAND—RECENT DISTURBANCES. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Seeing the Secretary of State for the Colonies in his place, I wish to ask whether he has received any recent news as to the state of affairs in Zululand?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): Having seen different reports in the newspapers from time to time, I telegraphed yesterday to Sir Arthur Havelock, Governor of Natal, asking for information, and I regret to say that I received from him this morning the following telegram:—

“Your telegram of yesterday. Usibepu and followers were attacked and defeated by Usutus near Ivuna 23rd June; it has consequently been found advisable to withdraw police office at Ivuna, which was attacked at the same time. Usibepu took refuge with police. No casualties among police. Force sent from Nkonjeni safely returned yesterday, brought back all from Ivuna, including Usibepu and families, women and wounded of his tribe. Have just conferred with Lieutenant General, Cape of Good Hope, as to sufficient number for force. He reserves opinion until arrival in Zululand, whither he proceeds to-morrow.”

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT (1878) AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

(NO. 76.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act).

LORD BALFOUR wished to point out to the noble Earl in charge of the Bill that it could hardly pass as it stood, because the clause said that the Bill should come into operation on the 1st of April, 1888.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, his attention had already been called to the point, and he proposed to substitute the 1st of September, 1888, as the date when the Bill should take effect.

Amendment made.

Clause, as amended agreed to.

Clause 3 (Amendment of Factory and Workshops Act, 1878).

LORD BALFOUR observed that he had given Notice of certain Amendments, all of them having the same purpose in view, which was to secure that those employed in factories in rural parishes should not be put in a worse position than those so employed in burghs. In the hope that his Amendments would be accepted, he would not trouble their Lordships with arguments upon them.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN remarked that the Amendments in question were perfectly consistent with the scope and purport of the Bill, and would be welcomed by him. At the same time, he thought his noble Friend would agree with him in regard to the subject to which one of the Amendments referred, that the abolition of Fast Days which prevailed in the burghs had not yet extended to the country districts, except, perhaps, in a few special cases. It was somewhat unusual to anticipate by an Act of Parliament the growth of public opinion in any particular direction, however desirable such growth of public opinion might be. There was one other consideration of a practical character, and that was that they must be satisfied with what they could get. In other words, he had doubts as to how far the acceptance of the noble Earl's Amendment might endanger the passage of the Bill through the other House. He would suggest, therefore, that the Amendments should not be pressed at this stage, but should be brought up on Report after there had been an opportunity of consulting those interested in the question.

LORD BALFOUR said, his experience differed from that of the noble Earl, as, in the rural districts which he was familiar with, the Fast Days had been to a great extent given up. He would, of course, accede to the request of the noble Earl. He understood that if he brought up the Amendments again there would be no objection to the form of them.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: Neither to the form nor the principle.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday the 5th of July next.

PARLIAMENT—EVIDENCE BEFORE SELECT COMMITTEES—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CLINTON, in calling attention to the conditions under which evidence was given before Select Committees of the Houses of Parliament in certain cases, said, he was extremely sorry to have to call their Lordships' attention to this subject, especially as he had to do so chiefly on account of a personal matter. He thought it was much to be regretted that the private affairs of individuals and their conduct in reference to the management of their property should be brought before Select Committees without any previous notice being given to them, and without their knowledge, and that, when such evidence had been given, the persons concerned should have no right to see it. A Committee had lately been sitting in "another place" on "Town Holdings," with the object, he believed, of inquiring into the terms upon which leases of land were granted to persons for building purposes. He heard, by chance, that his own name had been very freely used before that Committee. Witnesses had come forward and made certain statements with reference to the management of his property in the town of Redruth in Cornwall, and, among other things, it had been suggested that in consequence of the agitation on the subject of the Leaseholds Enfranchisement Bill he had granted leases for long terms of years instead of on lives. This was contrary to the fact; it had never been his practice to give leases for lives, though he had succeeded to many; he altered the system long before the above agitation was heard of. He had no objection whatever to his conduct being made the subject of public inquiry if it served any useful public purpose; but what he did object to was this—that such an inquiry should be conducted behind his back, and that when he asked to see the evidence he should be told he could not see it until it was too late to take steps to refute it. Of course, the witnesses might have spoken in the most perfect good faith, and with as much accuracy as witnesses who gave evidence of the business and motives of another man could pretend to; but, on the other hand, they might have had a particular object in view, and coloured their evidence accordingly; or they might have a grievance against the person about whom they gave their evidence, and it was only by cross-examination and the opportunities of reply that the value and credibility of such evidence could be tested. He would submit, also, that when inquiries were made as to private property, the agent who managed that property should be called among other witnesses, and that a Committee should not rely merely on what he must be permitted to call for this purpose second-hand evidence. As soon as he heard that the matter had been brought before the Committee he directed his agent to ask for leave to be examined before the Committee and to see so much of the evidence as affected him (Lord Clinton). In reply to that application the Committee clerk, on the 12th of June, said—

"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and to inform you that it has been laid before the Select Committee on Town Holdings. The evidence taken before a Select Committee is printed for the use of the Committee only until it has been reported to the House."

Some persons might have been discouraged by this reply, accepted it as final, and submitted patiently to what would have been an injustice. He hoped their Lordships would not think he was unduly impatient when he said that he was not content with that reply. At all events, on the 14th of June, he addressed the following letter to the Committee clerk:—

"I am not aware whether I am to consider your letter as a definite refusal on the part of the Committee to allow this portion of the evidence to be seen; but, if so, I would respectfully request the Committee to reconsider their decision. I am perfectly aware of the general rule which you quote, and which is laid down by both Houses of Parliament, but I cannot think that that rule is intended to be strictly applied in a case where the conduct of an individual has been called in question, and where evidence has been received which might reflect upon his character. I understand that evidence has been given as to the manner in which my property in Redruth and in other parts of Cornwall has been managed, and this has been done without any notice whatever, and my agent knows nothing of the nature of the evidence given except what he has been able to gather from newspaper reports. It is a serious matter for anyone to be placed, as it were, on his trial before such a tribunal as a Committee of the House of Commons without any notice and without his knowledge, and it is surely unjust that the evidence should be withheld from him until the Committee have agreed upon their Report and his opportunity of reply and explanation has passed away. I think I may therefore fairly appeal to the Committee to allow my agent to know, through the official report of the proceedings, what has been said which affects me, and also that he may have, if necessary, the opportunity of replying to it."

On June 15 the Committee clerk replied to the effect that a copy of that portion of the evidence which affected him (Lord Clinton) would be sent to his agent at Devonport. Their Lordships would observe that there was no answer to his request to be heard, though, by the favour and courtesy of the Committee, he was allowed to see the evidence. He did not propose to comment on the evidence that had been given with regard to his property and his conduct. That was not the time or place for doing so. He would only say that the evidence contained many inaccurate statements, and inferences were drawn from them and motives suggested which were either false or misleading. It was most unfair that upon such evidence, uncontradicted and unknown to the person most concerned, the Committee should base their Report. Several of their Lordships had much the same complaint to make as himself. There were Lord St. Levan, Lord Robartes, The Lord Steward, and also Sir Redvers Buller. Under the present system individuals might be put on their trial before a Committee and not even know that they had been tried until the case had been summed up, the verdict given, and the Court by whom the case was tried had reported to the House which had directed the inquiry. He made no charge against the Committee, but he thought that what had occurred in this case showed the necessity of some alteration in the rules and regulations with regard to the proceedings of Select Committees. The practice of their Lordships' Committees was the same as that of the other House. An inquiry into the sweating system was now going on upstairs. As a Member of that Committee he would not divulge what had taken place; but it was well known that serious charges had been brought against long-established firms and individuals—one of whom was a Member of the other House—and no notice had been given to them that their conduct was about to be impugned. It was not in accordance with the principles of justice and the spirit of English law that charges should be made and no opportunity should be afforded to meet and refute them. He thought it would not be difficult to find a remedy. Witnesses who intended to attack individuals should be asked if they had given notice of their intention, and if they had not, their evidence should be postponed until they had done so; the person concerned should have access to the evidence which affected him, and should have the earliest opportunity of explanation and defence.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was almost in the same position, though not quite, as the noble Lord. He had no personal complaint to make of the Committee of the House of Commons. But he might mention that he saw in the newspapers a summary of a statement made before the Committee in regard to his property in Cornwall, and he took steps to see a copy of the evidence that had been given. He found that evidence full of inaccuracies, but as the matter was not one of much consequence he took no further notice of such evidence. The witness who gave evidence as to the management of his property informed the Committee that, in consequence of the recent agitation, the granting of leases for lives had been discontinued. As a matter of fact, the practice of granting such leases was relinquished 40 years ago. He did not think that the witness desired to be inaccurate, but he certainly was. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that, not only in the interest of private individuals, but in the public interest, where charges against individuals, especially if they related to personal character, were made, those individuals ought to be afforded an opportunity of meeting those charges before the Committee drew up its Report. He did not like to lay down an absolute rule, but he hoped that a Committee of neither House of Parliament would be likely to neglect so obvious a duty.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (The Earl of Onslow) said, he had no doubt that the proceedings which had recently taken place before Committees of both Houses of Parliament had given rise to a great deal of just dissatisfaction. A number of private individuals, such as the noble Lord, and various firms had been attacked, and their reputation to some extent endangered; but he did not suppose that any Committee, either of this or of the other House of Parliament, would for one moment wish to refuse to those individuals or to those firms a full opportunity, if they sought it, of justifying their character and of defending themselves. In the case to which the noble Lord referred, before a Committee of their Lordships' House, he might say that that Committee at once took steps to place themselves in communication with the persons against whom charges were made, to furnish them with the evidence given against them, and as soon as the evidence against them was concluded gave them the earliest opportunity of coming forward to repudiate the charges which had been made against them. He had great confidence in the tribunal of public opinion, and he did not believe that charges, if refuted, would do any permanent injury to the character of the person against whom they were made. On the contrary, great sympathy would be excited for such person. Similar things occurred in Courts of Justice. Charges were made and circulated and remained unrefuted for some time; but by-and-bye the turn of the party attacked arrived, and the verdict justified him and dispelled the charges. No doubt, great inconvenience was often caused by the publication of partial Reports and by the comments made upon them in the Press and in Parliament. He might, perhaps, be allowed to refer to a matter affecting himself, as it illustrated in a striking way the inconvenience attending the present practice of publication. An hon. Member in "another place" had lately referred to a Report of the proceedings before one of their Lordships' Committees, and had characterized the course taken by him in cross-examining a witness as "one of the meanest and shabbiest tricks ever played." He thought that if the whole of the evidence, and not part of it only, had been put before the hon. Member he would have taken a very different view. The witness in question was introduced to the Committee by a gentleman who took the greatest interest in the inquiry, and who challenged anyone to show that he had brought forward witnesses of blemished character. The question which he put to the witness was—"Were you not reduced to the ranks by court martial on one occasion?" and the reply was—Yes; for not obeying orders and telling a falsehood." He thought that he was acting well within his right in challenging the credit of the witness, and he was confirmed in his belief that the course which he took was not wrong by the fact that actions for perjury against witnesses who had been brought in the same way before the Committee were contemplated. It was not a satisfactory practice that reference should be made in one House to proceedings before a Committee of the other House, those who were concerned not having the power of immediate reply. Some people thought, perhaps, that it would be well to lay down the rule that all Committees should hear evidence with closed doors. That would be a course which he could not favour, because the publicity given to evidence was likely to result in this and other cases in a considerable amelioration of the condition of the persons whose unfortunate lot was the subject of inquiry; and, therefore, however great might be the inconvenience to Members of their Lordships' House of this practice of partial publication, it must, he thought, be suffered. He trusted that Select Committees would never consent to take personal evidence without affording the fullest opportunity to those who were attacked to reply.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) said, he thought that Committees ought to be very cautious about hearing evidence which impugned a person's character. Where such evidence was given incidentally the person concerned ought to be apprised of the fact without a moment's delay. He did not quite agree that the case was like an action or proceeding in a Court of Law, where, if evidence was given impugning a man's character, the witness could be cross-examined at once, and the issue could be dealt with there and then. But in Committees, when damaging evidence was given incidentally, the same prompt steps could not be taken, and, therefore, it was the duty of a Committee to restrain a witness who proposed to tender such evidence. The advantage of sitting with open doors was that evidence affecting a man's character could be published in the Press, and the man was thus made aware of the attack made upon him. If Committees sat with closed doors great injustice might be done to persons placed in the unfortunate position to which he was alluding.

COMPANIES CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT (1845) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Rosebery.)

(No. 170.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to enable provident and industrial societies having investments in Companies' funds to be represented on the Boards of those Companies by such of their members as were not ordinary shareholders. The measure had passed through the other House.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

QUESTIONS.

MUNICIPAL BOROUGHS (IRELAND)— THE BALLINASLOE AGRICULTURAL HALL.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Ballinasloe Agricultural Hall, a building erected for public purposes and in part by public money, is at present let at an annual rent of less than £40, which if capitalized at 10 years' purchase would amount to £400; whereas a Town Hall of like proportions and suitability cannot be built for less than £3,000; and, under these circumstances, would the Government suggest some means by which the present Hall could be transferred on equitable terms from Lord Clancarty to the Town Board, and by so doing save the town of Ballinasloe this unnecessary expenditure of a large amount of public money?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The Town Clerk of Ballinasloe states that the Agricultural Hall was erected by means of money raised by the issue of shares, which he believed were bought up by the late Lord Clancarty. He also states that the Hall is let to a tenant for £30 a-year. The Local Government Board cannot say what the cost of a Town Hall of like proportions and suitability would amount to. They have no statutory power to interfere between the Commissioners and the owner of the Agricultural Hall in the manner suggested, that being a matter of private agreement altogether.

As already stated, they will give attention to any application made to them by the Town Commissioners to sanction a loan to provide a building.

MR. HARRIS asked, again, if the Local Government Board would have no power to take over this Hall?

MR. MADDEN: No; that would be a matter of private agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—VENTILATION OF THE LADIES' GALLERY.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it has come to his knowledge that the ventilation of the Ladies' Gallery of this House is defective; whether the present grill in front of that Gallery is so constructed as to render it difficult for those sitting in the second and third rows to either see or hear; and, if he proposes to have that Gallery further ventilated, and to substitute for the present grill one of a less obstructive character?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he was informed that some years ago there were frequent remonstrances on account of the inadequate ventilation of the Ladies' Gallery, and that it was then enlarged and completely remodelled, and that a considerable amount of the ornamental grill was removed; and he was told that since then there had been comparatively few complaints upon the subject. As to seeing and hearing what was going on in the House, the ladies on the back Benches had not as good opportunities as those in front; but he did not think that this disadvantage was caused by the grill, nor did he think it would be possible to mend the matter much in that way, except by removing the grill altogether, and, so far as he could ascertain, that alternative would not be generally popular.

WAR OFFICE—EMPLOYMENT OF RETIRED MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War, What number of retired medical officers are now re-employed; what additional number it is proposed to re-employ; and, whether, subject to good behaviour, such officers, when re-employed, have claim to serve till 65 years of age, the limit of age fixed by Regulation?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): Forty-six retired medical officers are at present employed. The question of extending the system of re-employment is at present under consideration. Such officers are re-appointed for five years, and if they continue to be required and are still efficient the term may be extended till they reach the age of 65 years.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS—EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether candidates for first division of first-class of National teachers, Ireland, will be examined next July on a special set of questions; and, if so, what percentage of answering will be required; and, whether any credit will be given for length of efficient service further than is obtained from being admitted to the examination?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Sir, the Commissioners of National Education state that the reply to the first inquiry is in the affirmative. An answering of 65 per cent, which is the same as last year, will be required. In answer to the second paragraph, I am informed that no credit will be given other than is obtained from being admitted to the examination.

TURKEY (ASIATIC PROVINCES)—ARMENIA—ARRESTS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the arrest more than two months ago on some supposed political ground of a number of Armenians in Constantinople, several of whom are teachers in schools supported by the Armenian community; whether these persons were detained in prison for some weeks, no formal charge having been brought against them; whether they have now, having never been tried nor afforded an opportunity of proving their innocence, been shipped off to Tripoli, where they are at present kept in banishment; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, considering not only the violations of justice involved in such arbitrary imprisonment, but also the irritation which such proceedings produce in the minds of the Armenian subjects of the Sultan, and the consequent dangers to the peace of Asiatic Turkey, will endeavour to obtain either the release of these persons and permission for them to return to their homes, or at least a fair and open trial for them?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) Manchester, N.E.): Our information is necessarily imperfect on these matters; but suspicions of treasonable practices have, rightly or wrongly, been entertained by the Imperial Ottoman Government, and there have, consequently, been arrests. Her Majesty's Government will do their utmost to assist any persons who may have been arrested without cause or wrongly punished whenever they are able to ascertain that that such wrongs have been inflicted. But the mode of representing any such case to the Government must be left to the judgment of Her Majesty's Representatives on the spot, and be regulated by diplomatic usage.

MR. BRYCE asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether the Government would make inquiries in order to ascertain whether this was a particular case for interference by representation?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON: I have no doubt Her Majesty's Ambassador will endeavour, as far as possible, to make himself acquainted with the circumstances.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — INSTRUCTIONS AS TO THE ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC TO COURT-HOUSES.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If any instructions have recently been issued to the Irish Constabulary limiting or interfering with the ordinary right of the general public to admission into public Court-houses in Ireland within the limits of reasonable accommodation; whether he is aware that within the past nine months the Constabulary have frequently debarred the public from enjoying this right of access; if he is aware that, at a public trial on Wednesday, the 20th instant, at Liscarroll, County Cork, a respectable trader of Kanturk, Mr. Thomas Linehan, and several other parties, were denied admission to the Court, which was at the time not half filled; and, in venturing to assert his right to admission, Mr. Linehan was assaulted by a constable to the knowledge of a District Inspector; and, if he will give directions to the Police Authorities as to their duty in this matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Sir, the Inspector General of Constabulary reports that no instructions of the kind referred to have been issued. In the particular case mentioned the County Inspector reports that the police are ordered not to allow the Court to be overcrowded. Orders, however, were given that the friends of the defendants should be admitted. He also ordered that Mr. Linehan should be admitted; but every seat was then occupied. Mr. Linehan afterwards complained to the County Inspector that he had been assaulted by a constable. It is not the case that the alleged assault was committed to the knowledge of the District Inspector; on the contrary, none of the officers present on duty witnessed it.

MR. FLYNN asked, if the hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that Mr. Linehan had asked the County Inspector to give him the name of the constable, whom he pointed out as having assaulted him, and that it was refused; and, if not, would the hon. and learned Gentleman make further inquiries into the matter?

MR. MADDEN replied that as to the specific matter alleged he had no information; but if the hon. Gentleman required him to supplement the information he should put a Question on the Paper.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—COMPLAINT AGAINST RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, in reference to the duty devolving on Resident Magistrates in Ireland, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, of stating a case for the Superior Courts where the application of the defendant or his legal adviser is not a frivolous one. Whether he has any knowledge of the case of Mr. Patrick Corcoran, foreman printer to The Cork Examiner, who was tried on January 9 last by Messrs. Gardiner and Redmond, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, being two terms of one month each; whether he is aware that the magistrates refused to increase the sentence to allow of appeal or to state a case for the Superior Courts, though application was made by the defendant's counsel, Mr. Gardiner saying, in reply to the said counsel, that—if he is aware that the counsel thereupon retired from the case, and declined to defend his client upon the second charge; and, if, in view of these facts, he will make inquiry into the fitness of these two Resident Magistrates to adjudicate in cases under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

"They were not disposed to state a case for the Superior Court, for the simple reason that if they thought the case was a frivolous one they would have stated so at once;"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): It appears that Patrick Corcoran was tried on the 9th of January last, before Messrs. Gardiner and Redmond, upon two separate and distinct charges, and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment of one month on each of the charges. An application was made to the magistrates to increase the sentence, which they refused, being of opinion that the sentence imposed by them was the proper one. An application to state a case was refused, not on the ground stated in the Question, but on the ground that the application was frivolous. It appears from the Report before me that the counsel for the accused left the Court before the second charge was proceeded with. I see no necessity for making any inquiry.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Are not Messrs. Gardiner and Redmond the same magistrates who tried the Killeagh prisoners, and are they not both ex-policemen?

MR. MADDEN: They are the same magistrates.

MR. MAC NEILL: Are they not both ex-policemen?

MR. MADDEN: I am not prepared to state that myself; but the information will appear on the Return which has been furnished to the House.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — FEMALE TELEGRAPH LEARNERS, DUBLIN—EXAMINATION.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.) asked the Postmaster General, How long ago the last examination for female telegraph learners in Dublin was held, and how soon the next will be held; and, whether there is any foundation for the impression that the system of competitive examination by which these offices are distributed in England and Scotland has been, or will be, dispensed with in Ireland?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The last open competition for the situation of female telegraph learners in Dublin was held on March 4, 1885. Since that date vacancies have been filled by transfer from Provincial offices in Ireland, and there are still a small number of applicants for such transfer whose claims have to be considered; but, subject to such occasional exceptions, it is proposed to adhere to the rule to appoint by open competition.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—COMPENSATION TO A POLICEMAN.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that in the attempt to collect the £1,000 ordered to be levied off the barony of Condons and Clongibbon as compensation to the policeman injured on the occasion of the fusillade at Mitchelstown, the Sheriff's bailiff seized a mare and foal valued at £30, the property of a small farmer named Kenealy, at Araglin, to satisfy a claim for 18s. county cess with £1 costs, and that, although a jennet valued at £10 was proffered in satisfaction of the claim, the bailiff insisted on driving the mare and foal a distance of seven miles to Fermoy, and sold them there; and, whether, in the event of legal proceedings being taken by the owner for excessive and vindictive seizure, the Government will interfere?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The Government have no knowledge as to the matters of fact referred to in this Question, county cess not being an Imperial charge over which they have control. Nor would they have any title to interfere in the circumstances referred to in the concluding portion of the Question.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give an undertaking that the Government will not protect these bailiffs for any illegal seizures they may make; and that the British taxpayer will not eventually have to pay this compensation?

MR. MADDEN said, he could give no undertaking of the kind.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman say, as a matter of fact, that the bailiffs will not be defended by the Government in any legal proceedings that may arise?

MR. MADDEN: Each case will be considered on its merits as it arises.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Is it not the fact that the Government have defended and paid the law expenses of bailiffs and police who have acted illegally?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware that any illegality has arisen in this matter, and each case as it arises will be considered.

ARMY (IRELAND)—AUXILIARY FORCES —SLIGO ARTILLERY MILITIA— EQUIPMENTS.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, If the following report in The Irish Times of June 18, from its military correspondent, is a correct description of the equipment of the "Duke of Connaught's Own Sligo Artillery Militia":—

"All the arms, knapsacks, and great coats of the gunners were obsolete, the two latter simply rotten and quite unserviceable, whilst the carbines of the oldest pattern were many grooveless and all unbrowned. Even on parade, it was stated, some knapsacks in the Brigade (issued before the Crimean War to the then Sligo Rifles) fell off, so rotten were straps, buckles, and canvas. The great coats, also relics of ante-Crimean days (1852 their date), literally honeycombed with moths, of unpleasant odour, of many patterns, with capes and without them, and nearly all unable, apparently, to retain even the weight of a button, so many were deficient of these necessary connecting links, were totally unfit

and, if so, whether he will take immediate steps to give this regiment a proper equipment?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) asked whether, in view of the unsatisfactory state of Militia equipment and organization generally, and the suggestions which were put before the War Office Committee, the right hon. Gentleman would consider the advisability of collecting more evidence from officers of experience in the force?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I should like to have Notice of the latter Question. As my hon. and gallant Friend is aware, the calling of evidence before that Committee is not within my control. As to the Question on the Paper, I have received Reports from the officer commanding the Brigade and from the Inspecting Officer of Royal Artillery. One hundred and forty-eight of the great-coats are old, though not so old as stated in the Question; and they have not yet been used for the regulated number of trainings, and can be made use of. The great-coats at present in use are of the Rifle pattern; but I will consider whether Artillery great-coats might not be issued. The arms are in serviceable condition; they are browned every six years; and this happens to be the year for browning after the training.

INLAND REVENUE (IRELAND)—PUBLICANS' LICENCES—ENNIS QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Philip Maguire, a publican in Miltown Malbay, applied a second time for a licence for premises built by himself at Lahinch, and was refused, at the Ennis Quarter Sessions now sitting, being opposed by Captain Walsh and Mr. Cecil Roche, Resident Magistrates, on the ground that he, with others, conspired to refuse refreshments to the police; and, whether, on the occasion, Captain Walsh stated that the licences of all the Miltown Malbay publicans would be opposed at the next Sessions?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: It is the case that Philip Maguire applied three times unsuccessfully for a licence for the premises mentioned in the Question at three successive Quarter Sessions at Ennis. At the recent Ennis Quarter Sessions eight magistrates, including the Chairman, decided that the application should not be entertained until the Licensing Sessions in October. I have no information as to the ground on which their decision was based. It is the fact that the Resident Magistrates mentioned in the Question stated that the police would oppose the renewal of licences held by any publicans who were proved to have joined a Boycotting conspiracy existing in the district referred to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—CLAUSE 120, SUB-SECTION 2—MAIN ROADS (METROPOLIS).

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is intended that Paragraph ii, Sub-section 2, of Clause 120 of the Local Government Bill shall apply to the Metropolis; if so, whether the main roads referred to therein are only those roads which were disturnpiked between the years 1870 and 1878, and what compensatory allowance, if any, will in that case be made to those districts of the Metropolis in which such "main roads" do not exist?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is intended that during the current financial year payment shall be made to the Vestries and District Boards in the Metropolis as heretofore in respect of roads disturnpiked since 1870. It is also intended that the Vestries and District Boards of the parishes and districts in the Metropolis in which there are no such roads should receive a share of the balance referred to in Paragraph 4 of Sub-section 2 of Clause 120 of the Local Government Bill. The clause of the Bill with reference to the provisional arrangement as to the grant in respect of roads in the Metropolis for the current year may require some slight modification to show more clearly what is contemplated, and this will receive attention when the clause is reached.

WAR OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—ARMY ACCOUTREMENTS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any order has been recently given for Slade Wallis accoutrements; and, if so, to whom the order was given, and what quantity was ordered; whether the order, although given to Captain Slade Wallis, was executed by Alexander Ross and Company, of Grange Road, Bermondsey, who, in March last, were struck off the list of Army contractors; and, whether 600 sets of such accoutrements are to be delivered at Woolwich during the present week?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Six hundred pouches of this pattern were ordered from Messrs. Ross and Company before that firm was struck off the list of contractors. Another order has been given to Colonel Slade Wallis, who is responsible that the supplies are equal to pattern. I have no knowledge whence he obtains his materials.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked, whether the War Office admitted the right of one contractor to hand over the work to be performed by another?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the Government did all in their power to deal directly with the contractor; but they could not always be certain as to who made the articles.

MR. CREMER asked, if the Department would receive evidence on this subject?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he would be glad to consider any evidence that might be submitted to him.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE ROYAL NORMAL SCHOOL OF SCIENCE—THE PHYSICAL LABORATORY.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is able to state that steps have been taken to make provision for the temporary accommodation for the Physical Laboratory at the Royal Normal School of Science, imperatively demanded by the requisition of the site of the present building by the authorities of the Imperial Institute?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): After consultation with the Treasury and the Science and Art Department it has been agreed to provide accommodation for the Physical Laboratory. A large room will be erected for this purpose on the ground now in the possession of the Government to the north side of the corridor leading from Exhibition Road to the Science Galleries.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES—BERMUDA— CABLE COMMUNICATION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, as the Imperial fortress in the Mid-Atlantic, Bermuda, remains still without cable communication with the rest of Her Majesty's Dominions, he has considered that, in case of unexpected war, the Governor of Bermuda would be without information of a sudden attack; and, whether, considering that the cost of a cable between Bermuda and Halifax would be comparatively trifling, and might be recouped by the commercial messages of traders and others having business with the Island, he will take the necessary steps to lay the cable?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University) (who replied) said: I invited, and on the 30th of April received, tenders for the laying, working, and maintenance of a cable between Halifax and Bermuda. These tenders are now under the consideration of the Government.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: This is a great question of national defence. Could not the work be pushed on in a business-like way?

MR. RAIKES: The work will be pushed on when the Government has approved of the tender.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS— TORY ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE — TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH THE MAINLAND.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What further steps, if any, have been taken in the protection of life and property to connect the improved light-houses on Tory Island by electric cable with the mainland?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BAUGH) (Bristol, W.) (who replied) said, he had reason to know that Lloyds' were in communication with the Postmaster General on the subject of telegraphic communication with Tory Island, and added that Lloyds' Signal Station Bill was still before Parliament.

EXCISE DUTIES (LOCAL PURPOSES); BILL—THE VAN AND WHEEL TAX.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) asked the President of the Local Government Board, What is the total amount which it is estimated will be received in England and Wales, and in Lancashire (including the county boroughs), from the Van and Wheel Tax; and, whether statistics on this subject will be distributed to Members before the House is called upon to discuss in Committee the clauses of the Local Government Bill relating to main roads?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The total amount which it is estimated will be raised in England and Wales from the Van and Wheel Tax is £168,000, and from the Horse Tax £540,000, or £700,000 in all. No accurate estimate can be given of the yield of the tax in Lancashire or any other county taken by itself.

PUBLIC OFFICES—THE RECEIVER AND ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE— ANNUAL LEAVE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Postmaster General, What period of annual leave is authorized by the Treasury for the clerks in the Receiver and Accountant General's Office?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to state that the period of leave enjoyed by the clerks in the Receiver and Accountant General's Office is one month in the course of the year. In this privilege hitherto a share has not been granted to five officers who, though called clerks, have never been employed on clerical duties. But as I am unwilling to perpetuate what may be thought an invidious distinction, I have directed that, in future, the same privilege shall be extended to these officers.

LUNACY ACTS—COLNEY HATCH ASYLUM—TREATMENT OF INMATES.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following facts in regard to the treatment of a man in Colney Hatch Asylum:—

“John Stickley, an old man of 68, was removed to the asylum last Saturday from Hammersmith Police Court. He was then in a feeble condition and perfectly quiet. On Monday his friends were informed that he was seriously ill, and on Tuesday he was dead. At the time of his death he had a broken jaw and had lost a tooth, and the jury find that his death was accelerated by these injuries;”

whether there is any evidence to prove whether the injuries were caused after the man entered the asylum; and, whether the Government will order an inquiry into the whole matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The facts are stated with substantial accuracy in the hon. Member's Question. The jury found that Stickley's injuries were received after he entered the asylum. The Lunacy Commissioners inform me that the Committee of Visitors of the Colney Hatch Asylum have intimated to them their intention to hold a searching inquiry into all the circumstances attending the death of this patient. The inquiry is to begin on Friday, and the Commissioners have requested to be at once informed of the result.

ARMY—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS —ERRORS IN EXAMINATION PAPERS.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that, at the recent Army preliminary examination held on the 13th and 14th of June, there was an error in the 17th question in the arithmetic paper, inasmuch as one number was written with two decimal points ($\cdot 13\cdot 56$ grains); that in the examination for admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, held on the 20th of June and the following days, there were two mistakes in the algebra paper, inasmuch as in Question 8

$$(4 + \sqrt{15})^{\frac{2}{3}} + (4 + \sqrt{15})^{\frac{1}{3}}$$

$$(4 + \sqrt{15})^{\frac{2}{3}} + (4 - \sqrt{15})^{\frac{1}{3}}$$

as it should probably have been written; and in Question 12: “Is the sum of the first r co-efficients in the expansion of $(1 - x)^{-n}$, &c.” instead of “Is the coefficient of x^r in the expansion of $(1 - x)^{-n}$, &c.;” that the supply of papers in the trigonometry examination was insufficient to accommodate the number of candidates who presented themselves, in consequence of which some papers had to be torn in half, so that while some candidates had the opportunity of seeing at the same time all the questions proposed, others had not the same advantage; and, whether the Civil Service Commissioners will take these irregularities into due consideration before publishing the results of those examinations, and will take steps to prevent their recurrence in future?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): With regard to the double decimal point, the error arose in striking off copies, the proof having been correct. No candidate would suffer, as it was immaterial which point was taken, and either answer would be accepted as correct. As regards the Woolwich paper, Question 8 as printed was unobjectionable, and those who worked it correctly obtained full marks, while those who assumed it to be misprinted and worked it correctly on that assumption also obtained full marks. There was practically no difference or difficulty between the two forms of the question. There was no mistake in Question 12, which was perfectly correct as it originally stood; but notice was given in the examination room before the candidates began to work the paper of a slight alteration introduced in the interest of the candidates to make it easier. As regards the deficiency in the number of examination papers, only six candidates were affected. A slight allowance of time was offered them in compensation, of which, however, only three availed themselves. I need only add that I am sorry that mistakes of this kind have arisen, because this is twice within a week that I have had to answer Questions of this kind. I have requested that greater care shall be taken in future.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—RESIDENT MAGISTRATES — APPOINTMENTS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many Resident Magistrates have been appointed since the present Government took Office?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Ten Resident Magistrates have been appointed since the present Government succeeded to Office.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman say how the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) came to say last evening that there were only three?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Ulster Canal Bill, as revised by the Select Committee, will be taken on the Report stage; are the Government in charge of the Bill; if not, who is; and, what opportunity will be given for preparing and discussing Amendments to it?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) in reply, said, he believed it was proposed to take the Bill. He thought it would be unusual to give any opportunities for discussing Amendments beyond those that usually occur.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I intend to put down a great number of Amendments; and as there will be a Morning Sitting on Friday for the Local Government Bill, that would be an inconvenient time. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would prevail on the promoters to postpone the Bill to next week?

MR. JACKSON suggested that the Amendments should be put down immediately.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—PARTY AGENTS—ELIGIBILITY OF CLERKS OF THE PEACE OR COUNTY TREASURERS.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Clerks of the Peace or County Treasurers, being public servants, are entitled to act as party agents in the Revision Courts or as candidates' agents at Parliamentary elections?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am not aware of any statutory provision or rule of law which would prevent a Clerk of the Peace or a County Treasurer from acting as an election agent. The Clerk of the Peace, however, being charged with certain important functions in connection with the registration of voters, could not properly, in my opinion, act in any way as an agent in the Revision Courts.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—JUDGMENTS IN THE KILLEAGH CASE—SHORT-HAND WRITER'S NOTES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the reason why the Government have refused to lay upon the Table a Copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the Killeagh habeas corpus cases, seeing that a copy of the Chief Baron's address to the jury in "Blunt v. Balfour" has been laid upon the Table; whether the Government will reconsider, in the light of the Killeagh decision, the cases of such prisoners as the Milltown Malbay men, whose sentences for refusal to supply goods have been confirmed on appeal, and who are, therefore, deprived of further legal remedy; would it be possible, under the County Courts Acts, for Rules to be framed by the County Court Judges, so that the convictions they affirm under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act should in all cases refer to the evidence on which the convictions were grounded, so that it may be possible for prisoners under sentence after appeal to test the legality of their imprisonment by habeas corpus; will any steps be taken in fulfilment of the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman, last year reported in Hansard, vol. 315, p. 284, as follows:—

"There will be an appeal in every case to a County Court Judge, and if, on legal technicalities, the County Court Judge is objected to, the Government will be prepared to consider a plan for giving an appeal in cases in which a legal difficulty may be involved to a still higher tribunal;"

and, if he can state how many persons are still confined under sentences confirmed on appeal for conspiracy to compel and induce others to do or abstain from doing certain acts?

Mr. T. M. Healy

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: It would be obviously neither possible nor expedient to lay on the Table copies of the Judgments in all the cases which come before the Courts under the Act of last year. There is an obvious distinction between the Charge of the Chief Baron in the case of "Blunt v. Byrne," which has general application to the combination known as the Plan of Campaign, and the Judgments in the Killeagh habeas corpus case, which—except so far as they dealt with legal questions of habeas corpus and certiorari—were only applicable to the particular parts of the case before the Court. In answer to the second paragraph, I have to say that the decision in the Killeagh cases does not affect the cases of the prisoners referred to in the Question. The facts of the cases were entirely different, and the prisoners have availed themselves of the right of appeal. It would not be within the power of the Court and Judges to adopt the course suggested in the third paragraph. The matter referred to in the first paragraph has already been dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman when this Question appeared first on the Paper. There are at present, so far as can be ascertained from the records at head quarters, 10 persons confined under sentence for conspiracy confirmed on appeal. There are also four persons confined for inciting to conspiracy.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman by whose desire the Paper was laid on the Table of the House of Commons containing the Judgment of the Lord Chief Baron in "Blunt v. Byrne;" and I wish to ask him was it not a decision at Nisi Prius binding practically on nobody; and was not that decision in the case of the Killeagh prisoners a decision in the Court of Exchequer, final so far as they were concerned, and so far as any Court was concerned; and why a decision that was binding on nobody was laid on the Table of the House, while the Government refuse to give us an authoritative decision in regard to a very great matter of public interest?

MR. MADDEN said, that if the Judge's Charge in "Blunt v. Byrne" was binding on no one, he could only express his astonishment that it was moved for by an hon. Member on the opposite side of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should have said binding on any Court.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): The Solicitor General is not asked a Question as to why the Judgment in "Blunt v. Byrne" was laid on the Table of the House, but he is asked why the Judgment in the Killeagh case is refused?

MR. MADDEN said, in his previous answer he stated distinctly that in the Charge of the Chief Baron, the general combination known as the Plan of Campaign was dealt with, and that was a subject of the greatest public importance; whereas in the Killeagh cases the judgments so far as they went outside the legal questions of habeas corpus and certiorari—[Mr. T. M. HEALY: Oh!]
—were only applicable to the facts of the particular case before the Court.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked, did not the Killeagh cases deal with the questions of exclusive dealing, and the principles applicable to that case and the evidence proper to support it?

MR. MADDEN said, no general principles were laid down; and the judgments were easily accessible to the public, for they were fully reported in the public Press; and they did not deal with the conspiracy known as Boycotting in the sense in which the Judgment in "Blunt v. Byrne" dealt with the combination known as the Plan of Campaign.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked, did not the Judgment in the Killeagh cases lay down what were the proper rules to be observed in charges of conspiracy and exclusive dealing under the Crimes Act; and whether, under those circumstances, the Government did not think it important to make public the solemn decision of the Court of Exchequer?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir. It lays down no general rules on that branch of the case; it simply deals with—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman if he will tell the House what is the objection to lay the notes upon the Table; and I wish to ask him whether at the public expense, because the views of the Government were in harmony with the decision in "Blunt v. Balfour," the notes of the Judgment were laid on the Table, and why he objects to follow the same course in the Killeagh case, which was no more amply reported in the newspapers than was the Blunt and Balfour case; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman refuses to lay the Judgment on the Table will he at least lay the portion of the Judgment dealing with the question of conspiracy and exclusive dealing?

MR. MADDEN said, the objection was the obvious one, that all Judgments could not be laid on the Table of the House; that some discrimination must be observed as to what Judgment should be laid upon the Table. It would be impossible to lay on the Table Reports of all the Judgments. Some rule must be laid down. [MR. T. M. HEALY: What rule?] The rule was that a Judgment dealing with certain principles, such as that he had stated, might fairly be laid upon the Table; while a Judgment dealing with the facts of a particular case might fairly be refused to be laid on the Table.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman be kind enough to lay upon the Table of the House this Judgment, upon which we may fairly base our decision when we come to vote the salaries of Resident Magistrates?

[No reply.]

MR. SPEAKER called upon Mr. J. M. Maclean to ask the next Question.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) rose.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the Judgment in this Killeagh case was directly quoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General and other Members of the Government in the course of the debate last night; and whether, if that is so, they are not bound, for the information of the House, to lay a copy upon the Table?

MR. SPEAKER: That does not come under the Rule; but I suppose that the Judgment will be accessible to hon. Members. [Cries of "No!"] Of course, if it were not, and if it were only an official document, and they have quoted from it, they would be bound to lay a copy upon the Table.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that I shall move for the production of the documents quoted by the Government last night in the debate.

Subsequently,

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the expression of opinion which had been given from the Chair, the Government would, without formal Motion, lay on the Table the Judgments in the Killeagh case?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the hon. Gentleman had better put his Notice of Motion on the Paper, and then the Government will decide as to the course they ought to take.

EAST INDIA (MR. W. TAYLER, OF PATNA).

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he is aware that after Mr. Tayler, ex-Commissioner of Patna, had declined the inquiry offered him into his judicial conduct at Patna, Lord Canning nevertheless insisted, in the interest of public justice, that an inquiry should be held into certain cases connected with the Patna riots, and called upon the Sudder Court of Bengal to revise the sentences passed by Mr. Tayler on persons who still remained alive, in order to remedy substantial injustice where such should appear to have been committed; that the Sudder Court accordingly, on June 29, 1859, forwarded to the Government of Bengal a Judgment which the Court had recorded after an examination of the papers; and, whether a copy of the judicial record of proceedings in this case can be laid upon the Table of the House, along with the Correspondence moved for yesterday by the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge)?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): My attention has been called to a letter from the Registrar of the Sudder Court to the Government of Bengal of the 29th of June, 1859, forwarding a Judgment of that Court on the cases of 21 persons then alive who had been tried and convicted by Mr. William Tayler for complicity in the Patna riots of the 3rd of July, 1857. After carefully going through the records of the trials, the Court thought the evidence altogether insufficient to sustain the conviction of 18 of the prisoners. In another case the Court thought the evidence unsatisfactory, and recommended that his sentence should be remitted. In the two remaining cases the conviction was upheld. There is no objection to the production of these documents if the hon. Member will move for them.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. CULLEN, DIVISIONAL MAGISTRATE, DUNDALK.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that on Wednesday last, when the people were quietly and peaceably moving from the Dundalk Railway Station, where they had met the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and his friends, Mr. Cullen, Divisional Magistrate, ordered the dragoons and constabulary to stop the procession, and thereby caused considerable confusion and disorder during which several persons were thrown down and injured; and, whether Mr. Cullen had received instructions from Dublin Castle to act in this way?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: This Question being put down without Notice, I have not had time to obtain a specific Report as to the proceedings at the period of time to which the Question refers. The Police Reports now available deal with the disturbances which prevailed later in the day.

INLAND FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) — ASSAULT AT ST. BOSWELL'S.

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the case that on May 3, Mr. William Gibbie, skinner, Galashiels, was fishing on the Tweed near St. Boswell's, when Mr. Andrew Goodfellow, gamekeeper to Lord Polwarth, ordered him to desist, and, on his refusing to do so, assaulted him; whether on the same day Gibbie gave information of the assault to Constable Telfer, of Langlee, who reported it to the Fiscal; whether on the same day Goodfellow gave information of assault against Gibbie, and whether the Fiscal at once instituted proceedings against Gibbie, who was tried on May 17 and acquitted; whether on the day of the trial Gibbie made complaint to the Fiscal against Goodfellow, and whether the Fiscal intimated to Gibbie's agent on May 31 that he did not intend to take up his complaint; whether Gibbie and his Friend Thomas Young, who was witness of the assault, have since made affidavit before a Justice of the Peace stating the facts of the case, and forwarded the same to the Lord Advocate, asking him take up the complaint; and, whether he intends to institute proceedings against the gamekeeper for the alleged assault?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It is the fact that, on the date mentioned, a man, named Gebbie not Gibbie, was fishing in the Tweed near St. Boswell's, at a place where he had no right to fish; and on being requested to desist by the gamekeeper, Andrew Goodfellow, he refused to do so, whereupon a scuffle ensued, in which the gamekeeper was severely injured, a rib being fractured. It is also the case that Gebbie informed Constable Telford of the alleged assault, but no charge was made by him until after he was charged by the police with the assault on Goodfellow, though he passed two police stations on his way; and when lodging his complaint with Telford, he said that Goodfellow had not struck him at all. Goodfellow gave information of the assault upon him immediately after the occurrence, and Gebbie was tried on May 17, but the charge was found "not proven." Although I have no definite information on the points mentioned in the fourth paragraph, I have no reason to doubt their correctness. On May 31 a man named John Johnston, Secretary of the Tweed Fisheries Acts Repeal and Angling Law Reform League, wrote to me enclosing two affidavits. I made full inquiry into the case, and satisfied myself that there was no ground for any prosecution of Goodfellow, and informed Johnston of this decision. The counter-charge was evidently an after-thought. There was no injury done to Gebbie, although he had a trifling scratch on his neck. I do not intend to take any proceedings.

In reply to a further Question by Mr. A. L. BROWN,

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, he thought probably the Procurator Fiscal proceeded on the fact that one man had broken ribs and one man was not injured.

FINANCE, &c.—SCOTCH CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE EXCHEQUER.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcubright) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the correspondence between himself and the Secretary for Scotland on Local Taxation (Parliamentary Paper, C. 5418). On what principle does he base his calculations that the share of Scotland is one-third of the whole Probate Duty—namely, £1,420,000, to be devoted to the relief of local taxation, will only amount to £156,000—namely, 11 per cent; what is the proportion per cent, and amount, it is proposed to give to England and Ireland respectively; and, whether the present grant to medical relief and to lunatic poor (seeing there is no mention of these grants in the correspondence) will be continued during the present year as heretofore?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to the hon. Member's first Question, I can only give him the same answer which I gave to the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) on the 23rd of April last, that the figure of 11 per cent is based upon a very complex calculation, involving the use of several independent sets of figures, the results of one set being checked by those of another. I added that the net result was nearer 10 than 11 per cent, and that I had every reason to believe that the figures I adopted were favourable to Scotland. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the proportion of Probate Duty to be given to England and Wales is 80 per cent, and to Ireland 9 per cent. The amount of Probate Duty to be given to England and Wales will, on this calculation, be £1,136,000, and to Ireland £127,000, in 1888-9. My answer to his third Question is, Yes.

AFRICA (CENTRAL)—CONSUL JOHNSTON, OF OPOBO.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that Consul Johnston, of Opofo, is coming to England; and, whether it is true that this Consul has recently concluded

Treaties with certain Natives in the interior of Africa without first submitting the terms of the Treaties to the Government at home?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Mr. Johnston has arrived in England. He has from time to time concluded Treaties in the interest of British commerce with Native Chiefs under a general authority to do so given to Her Majesty's Consul in 1884, and in a prescribed form, which has been laid before Parliament.

MR. W. REDMOND gave Notice that on the Civil Service Estimates he should move a reduction in Consul Johnston's salary.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—CASE OF "OWEN WYNNE, LANDLORD, v. JAMES M'KEOWN," MANOR-HAMILTON.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the order made by the County Court Judge at Manorhamilton Quarter Sessions on October 18, 1887, in the case of "Owen Wynne, landlord, v. James M'Keown," tenant, which is as follows:—

"Order of Court.—If the defendant pays one year's rent on or before 11th November 1887, let him be restored to his holding. I reserve further consideration as to the rest of arrears;"

whether he is aware that James M'Keown has recently suffered 14 days' imprisonment on a charge of forcible entry and detainer of the house from which he had been evicted by the landlord, though he pleaded that he had offered a year's rent to the agent, Mr. George Hewson, in accordance with the terms of the County Court Judge's order; whether Mr. George Hewson denied on oath, at the recent trial of M'Keown, the existence of any such order; whether Mr. George Hewson, both before and after giving evidence against M'Keown, did, as a Justice of the Peace, sit on the Bench with Colonel Turner, R.M., and Mr. Moloney, R.M., participating in the work of the Petty Sessions; whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland will inquire into the conduct of Mr. George Hewson; and, whether the Government will consider the advisability of making some compensation to Mr. M'Keown for unmerited punishment and the grave loss sustained by his family?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) detailed the various proceedings in the matter, and said that if Mr. M'Keown felt aggrieved he could bring an action for damages, but the Government had no intention of compensating him.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
CASE OF "SARAH MAGUIRE v. OWEN WYNNE," MANORHAMILTON.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, when at the late sitting of the Sub-Commissioners, Mr. E. O. M'Devitt in the chair, at Manorhamilton, County Leitrim, the case of "Sarah Maguire v. Owen Wynne" came on for hearing, the Chairman, without any inspection of the holding, or inquiry into the question of the tenant's improvements on the evidence of the landlord's valuation, fixed the judicial rent on the basis of the old rent; and, if so, whether the Government will afford facilities to Sarah Maguire for a re-hearing of her case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, he had applied for the necessary information, and he would, when he received it, communicate with the hon. Member.

MR. CONWAY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government shortly to ask the House that the whole Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays for the remainder of the Session may be allotted to Government Business?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is probable that the Government will have to ask the House for further facilities for dealing with Government Business.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, whether these facilities would touch Wednesdays as well as Tuesdays and Fridays?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he could not say what course he should be obliged to take until he made the announcement.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman, if his facilities extended to Wednesdays, would consider the point urged by him early in the Session—that the operation of the New Rule practically deprived private Members of any opportunity of proceeding with Opposed Bills?

SMALL HOLDINGS—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Select Committee on Small Holdings will be empowered to inquire into the subject with regard to Scotland as well as England; and, if Scotch Members will be represented on the Committee?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I do not see any objection to Scotland being included in the Reference to the Select Committee on Small Holdings. If such inclusion is made, Scotch Members will be represented on the Committee.

MOTIONS.

NOTICES OF MOTION AND ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Motion relating to "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," have precedence this day of the Notices of Motion and other Orders of the Day.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE, SUSPENSION OF THE STANDING ORDER.

Ordered, That the proceedings on the Motion relating to "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," if under discussion at 'twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order "Sittings of the House."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887.

RESOLUTION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th June],

"That, in the opinion of this House, the operation of 'The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,' and the manner of its administration, undermine respect for Law, estrange the minds of the people of Ireland, and are deeply injurious to the interests of the United Kingdom."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Sir, I hope the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) who registered that terrible vow to place his heel on our necks, will not be offended with me if I say that the speech we listened to last night seems to me not to demand any very protracted attention except from persons in search of amusement. Whatever else may be said of the Irish Question, I think we are pretty well agreed on both sides of the House now that it is no laughing matter any way. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) did deliver a very clever speech, a highly artful composition, and I am sorry to have to think that the hon. Member was engaged in not uncongenial work in attacking an absent man and in fixing, or in attempting to fix, the stigma of successful villany upon the name and upon the work of John Dillon. The hon. Member had one other characteristic, and that is that somehow or other he always attacks the Tory Government when he can do them no harm, and always comes to their rescue whenever his services are of the smallest value. The hon. Member's speech last night was stuffed with two topics. He abused the Plan of Campaign, of course, and he trotted out once more the two stock horrors from the County of Kerry, which had already done duty in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh. Why two alone? It seems that nobody can exceed that number even in the County of Kerry. I claim that we on these Benches are at least as honestly disgusted with these abominable things in Kerry as Gentlemen opposite or the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I confess that it sometimes strikes me that the Unionist orators seem to be not at all disinclined to dabble their sleek hands in the blood of those miserable creatures in Kerry. When I saw the crocodile tears shed over Norah Fitzmaurice by the hon. Gentleman and by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House,

I could not help thinking of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of Norah Fitzmaurices whom Irish landlordism has flung out to die on the roadside or to meet perhaps a worse fate in the streets of New York, without one word of protest or one tear for their fate from hon. Gentlemen opposite. Is it candid, is it honest for the Member for Tyrone to mention the Plan of Campaign, and these crimes in Kerry in the same breadth, as if there were some connection between them? The hon. Member knows as well as I do that there was no more connection between the two things—[Cries of "Oh!"]
—yes, I repeat there is no more connection between the two things than there is between the proceedings of this Parliament and a murder in the New Cut. Hon. Members opposite may jeer who can do nothing else. I tell them that they will not conceal from the English people the fact that the one county in Ireland from which they can produce even their two horrors, to work upon English feeling, is the one county in Ireland where the Plan of Campaign has never started. Let them jeer as they like. I tell them that the County of Kerry is the one county where the influence of the National League has at all times been weakest and most paralyzed. Not one great public meeting has been held in that county for years. Not one prominent Member of the Irish Party has set foot in Kerry for years past. Kerry has been left in the undisputed possession of the Moonlighters and Her Majesty's Government, and a pretty Arcadia they have made of it. Instead of our having anything to blush for in connection with the crimes, horrors, and the atrocities in Kerry, it is our highest testimony. It is the withers of Her Majesty's Government that are wrung by them and not ours. Kerry is the one county in the whole South of Ireland where the Plan of Campaign was never started, and yet it is the one county in Ireland where murder and Moonlighting are most ripe. In every part of Ireland where for the last year or two we have been carrying on our operations, we defy Her Majesty's Government to trace to us any crime or stain of blood. Yes; no campaign of ours has been stained with blood. There was the case of an armed emergency man who was superintending an eviction, helped by Her Majesty's Government, and shot down an unfortunate tenant. But Her Majesty's Government have confessed their crime, and agreed to give compensation in an action brought by the relatives of the murdered man. They confess that they were trespassers, and went there to commit a murder. If the man they killed had arms, and had known that he had the power of England at his back, he would have been perfectly justified in killing his assailants. But, Sir, I will pass from that. All this disgusting claptrap about crime in Ireland is what American politicians call the policy of the "bloody shirt," and its object is to bring war and hatred between people who desire to live at peace. Thank God, at home as well as in America that policy is seen through and discredited, and it is played out. To come to the Plan of Campaign, I should have supposed that the conscience of the hon. Member for Tyrone would have twitted him with reference to the Plan of Campaign. The hon. Member told us that the Plan of Campaign is responsible for the passing of the Crimes Act. I retort on the hon. Member that he is responsible for the passing of that Act more than any man living. If, when the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) introduced a Bill to suspend evictions in Ireland under certain conditions in the Autumn Session of 1886, the hon. Member for Tyrone had adopted the same tone which he took a few months afterwards towards the Tory Land Bill of last Session, he and his Liberal Unionist Friends, powerless for all else, would have easily prevailed on a Tory Government to legislate that autumn, and the Plan of Campaign would never have existed. What did the hon. Member do? He scoffed at the hon. Member for Cork's statement that there was any urgent crisis to be dealt with, and in the name of the farmers of Ulster he denied there was any special emergency such as there was in 1880-81, and said that the farmers were perfectly well able to meet their engagements. A few months afterwards the hon. Member came cringing to this House, declaring that the landlords would repeal the Union as sure as fate. Let them read his hysterical letters to The Times, crying out "God help and save the unhappy people." Is that a trustworthy guide in the affairs of the farmers? He will learn better, no doubt, next Session, and the Tory Government will learn better. But it has been the Plan of Campaign that has taught them better. I think it was the hon. Member for South Tyrone and those he acted with who were directly responsible for leaving the farmers of Ireland defenceless that winter, and who, therefore, were more directly responsible even than the hitherto unsuspected author of the Plan. It was the Plan of Campaign which first taught you wisdom, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone tried last night insidiously to conceal that the men the Government are endeavouring to crush in Ireland to-day are the men who have taught them that lesson. I will dwell for a moment on the speech of the hon. Member, because he looked upon this point as one of vital importance. With all the artifice, and among all the tricks, and not very creditable tricks, of which I have to complain is the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. What did the hon. Member say? In the first place he had the audacity to talk—and I noticed that right hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered enthusiastically the compliment—of the Land Courts being opened under the Act of last year by Her Majesty's Tory Government. The hon. Member knew as well as I know that they were opened in the teeth of the views and grimaces of Lord Salisbury. Then he told us that the Plan of Campaign on the Massereene Estate was indefensible, because the judicial tenants could get their abatements and the non-judicial could go into Court to have their rents fixed under the Act of last Session. I ask, again, was it honest of the hon. Member to give uninformed persons in England an impression which he knew to be diametrically opposed to the fact? He knows that not merely the Massereene dispute, but every prominent dispute that is still outstanding under the Plan of Campaign, arose before the Tory legislation of last Session, and arose out of a state of circumstances which this House and the Government had solemnly, and on the Statute Book, declared to be oppressive and indefensible. Let me dwell on this point for a moment, for I consider it to be of the utmost importance. This fallacy underlay the hon. Member's speech last night, from beginning to end, and ought to be completely and speedily demolished. What was the fact as to the Massereene dispute and all the other disputes which were outstanding and which have been enumerated? Every prominent dispute under the Plan of Campaign which the hon. Member enumerated with such glee—the Ponsonby dispute, the Massereene dispute, the Coolgreaney and Lugganstown disputes, arose before the Government legislation and because they refused to legislate. I defy the Chief Secretary—I dare say he will pick himself up to answer me in the course of the evening—I defy the Chief Secretary or any hon. Gentleman to point to any single great estate where the Plan of Campaign has been put in operation on which the tenants were free to take full and free advantage of the Act of last year. I defy him to name one. I am sorry to emphasize these things, but I feel bound to do so, and I challenge the right hon. Gentleman now to deny that; in point of fact, the Plan of Campaign is now being used, not to extort concessions in the future, but in order to secure the advantages which the House conceded last year to the general body of tenants in Ireland—to secure those advantages to the tenants on those very estates whose courage and whose self-sacrifice wrung the concession from a reluctant Tory Government, and from the sceptical Member for South Tyrone. I hold that what the right hon. Gentleman is doing in Ireland at the present moment is not dealing with crime or any widespread conspiracy against rent. There is no such thing; he is engaged in victimizing and crushing, if he can do it, a couple of dozen bodies of tenants in Ireland whose struggles have forced Lord Salisbury to swallow his views as to the finality of judicial rents. They are the object of vengeance because they are right and because they are unconquerable. Whatever ridiculous and vague abuse may be showered upon the Plan of Campaign by persons who know nothing of its operations—and if the Plan of Campaign were crushed out of existence to-morrow morning I defy anyone to point out what the right hon. Gentleman would have succeeded in doing except to ruin and exterminate this couple of dozen of bodies of Irish tenants, whose courage and self-sacrifice won the Act of last Session. What all the detestable cant about the crimes of Irish Members and the successful villany of John Dillon comes to is this—that they have refused to desert those men, and that they have declared that, so long as they live, they will not stand by and see them struck down and ruined or offered up victims as a holocaust to the vindictive feelings of the landlords because they won the Act of last Session, and because the Plan of Campaign has proved too much for them. That is the work, the brave work, that the right hon. Gentleman is engaged upon in Ireland, and for doing which he is lauded as the modern Quintus Curtius. It is at the bidding of the Irish landlords that the right hon. Gentleman is engaged in crushing out of existence poor unarmed Irish tenants because they have shown themselves to be more than a match for him. That is the tremendous task which the right hon. Gentleman's soldiers and police and removable magistrates are engaged in, and it is a task which, up to this hour, they have most absolutely failed in accomplishing—so resolutely and ignominiously failed in accomplishing that the right hon. Gentleman, or his agents, have been obliged to skulk over to Rome to invoke the good offices of the Holy Inquisition to strengthen the Imperial arm of England. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked me last night whether there would be any Plan of Campaign under an Irish Parliament, and I venture to tell him that there would not, and I will go a little further and make bold enough to say, that if, when the Tory Government found it necessary to pass the Act of last Session, they had honestly insisted that the Campaigners should be entitled to the benefits of that Act instead of excluding them from the pale of the law, the Plan of Campaign would have disappeared long ago. But instead of taking that course, the right hon. Gentleman preferred to show an iron hand, to hunt down like wild beasts those tenants who had been too much for him in playing Quintus Curtius, and for the landlords, and to lend himself to abominable methods of government as impotent as they are cruel. I am in a position now to repeat my challenge to the right hon. Gentleman four months ago, to point out one single instance where he has conquered the Plan of Campaign with all his bayonets and all his plank beds. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his forlorn hope speech of last night, ventured upon a half-hearted hint that the Plan of Campaign has broken down on the Massereene estate. But if that is the case, what is the meaning of the 25 writs of ejectment, which have been issued by Lord Massereene during the last few days, and of the Rob Roy Macgregor raids which have been made upon the tenants' cattle. The hon. Member for South Tyrone, who held a better brief, did not venture to follow the right hon. Gentleman to that extent. He was content with taking up the more modest position that the Plan had not yet, and he appeared to derive some consolation from the fact, actually succeeded in every single instance. The fact is that the Plan has only succeeded in 19 cases out of every 20. The hon. Member, however, did not point out that the landlords have not succeeded in crushing down the Plan in any single instance. The hon. Member has expressed great sympathy for the sufferings of the tenants who have entered upon the Plan of Campaign. I may console the hon. Member by telling him that the Plan is getting on, and that its supporters may use with regard to it the famous Italian phrase, which used to be so popular among the "No Popery" Party in England, "E pure si muove." Let me mention this. Even since Mr Dillon's imprisonment last week rents have been reduced under the operation of the Plan of Campaign from 6s. to 9s. in the pound in Roscommon and in Galway, while obnoxious agents, such as Mr. Kendal, who acted in a merciless manner, have been dismissed. As the hon. Member has wasted so much compassion upon the tenants who have been evicted it may soothe his feelings to learn that after nearly two years' operation there have only been 280 tenants evicted upon Campaign estates out of more than 60,000 who have fought and won under the banner of the Plan of Campaign, that every one of those 280 evicted tenants is now in a comfortable home, and that everyone of them will yet go back in triumph to their old homes before the landlords have done with their successful villany. I desire to refer briefly to the facts of the Massereene estate. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had the hardihood last night to describe the occupiers on that estate as quite a thriving lot of tenants. Sir, the hon. Member on one occasion described the harvest of 1886 as a beautiful one, and yet, within a couple of months afterwards, he came down to this House to complain of the action of the landlords in enforcing their claims for rent and threatened to break down the union. I admire the hon. Member's courage in running away much more than I do his antics as the jumping cat in politics. There is only one intelligible theory with regard to the hon. Member's oscillations and gyrations on the Irish Land Question, and it is that while he always abuses the landlord in safe generalities, he invariably betrays the tenants when the question is a practical one. The question before the House is—Are the Massereene tenants right or wrong—is their claim to a reduction of rent an honest or a dishonest one? I must apologize for referring to the subject after the clear and lucid statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who went over and investigated the facts on the spot. The Irish people will always hold the courage of the right hon. Gentleman in grateful remembrance. The evidence I have on the subject is a triumphant vindication of the honesty of the tenants and of my hon. Friend John Dillon. Lord Massereene has dismissed his agent for proposing that the rents upon his estates should be reduced, and he then placed himself body and soul in the hands of a firm of Orange emergency solicitors, who added to their business of solicitors the business of common bailiffs. But even those persons informed Lord Massereene that he was wrong in refusing to make the abatement proposed by his agent, and that the tenants were right in insisting upon demanding it. The hon. Member for South Tyrone told the House yesterday that Lord Massereene is now willing to make reductions all round upon the scale of the reductions which are being made in the Land Court.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, that what he had stated yesterday was that Lord Massereene was now dealing with the arrears upon his estate upon the same scale as the Commissioners were dealing with the rents.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I will come to that point of the arrears presently, and probably in a way the hon. Member may not anticipate. What I am dealing with now is the undoubted fact that Lord Massereene has now agreed to give abatements on the scale of those given by a Land Commission appointed, picked, and packed by a Tory Government for the express purpose of discrediting the Plan of Campaign on the Massereene property. Those Commissioners found themselves obliged to award reductions of rent at least equal to, and, in some cases, greater than, those the tenants were asking for under the Plan of Campaign. Here, then, we have the landlord, the agent, and the Land Commissioners vindicating the tenants. In face of facts like these, how can any man have the hardihood to talk to the Irish Representatives of dishonesty or immorality, or affect to treat as an injured innocent this degraded lord, against whom Sir Redvers Buller—I challenge that officer to deny it—was obliged to warn the Castle officials as a drunken and disreputable sot? "These be your gods, O Israel." These are the cherubim and seraphim from whom the Irish Representatives and Irish people are asked to learn morality. Those are the men whom the Government honour while they put a felon's garb on John Dillon. The hon. Member for South Tyrone is anxious that I should attack the question of Lord Massereene's offer as to arrears. Certainly it was one of the crafty devices by which the hon. Gentleman sought to delude the House and evade the real question. The hon. Gentleman spoke last night as if Lord Massereene's present offer as to arrears was a matter antecedent to the Plan of Campaign. Why has Lord Massereene agreed to score out the arrears? Because the Plan of Campaign has taught him wisdom. What are the terms of that settlement? Lord Massereene is, indeed, now willing to make the abatement which he refused point blank to make when the Plan of Campaign was adopted on his estate. He is only willing, however, to make it on condition that the unfortunate tenants, whose demand he now acknowledges to be just, should be crushed to the earth with law costs that were incurred in teaching him to be honest. But, worst and most cruel of all, he insisted, and now insists absolutely as a term of settlement, that a certain list of prescribed men—whom, as it were, he sets out in a schedule—should be exempted from all the benefits of the settlement. What is the meaning of that? The settlement is the price Lord Massereene is prepared to pay in order to get these particular men into his power—to ruin them, to make examples of them, to root them out, and to evict them. Why? Because they are what he calls the ringleaders—that is to say, because they are the bravest and most self-sacrificing tenants, who risked everything in order to stand by their poorer brother tenants, and to compel Lord Massereene to do through the Court what he had refused to do under the Plan of Campaign. The object is to visit vengeance upon these men, to drive them away, and to terrorize every weak creature in the country-side; to cause these men to desert their poorer neighbours, in order that the Chief Secretary may be able to brag of one victory over the Plan of Campaign. This is the plot which John Dillon frustrated by his speech at Tullyallen; and and I think that Mr. Dillon might safely stake, not only his liberty, but his life, upon the verdict of any 12 Englishmen as to whether all this villany—luckily unsuccessful villany—and all the injustice of the landlords and the officials who concocted the plot, were not worthily baffled by the man who infused his own brave and indomitable spirit into the campaigners. I am sorry that I should have occupied the time of the House so long, and that I should have spoken with so much heat; but as long as my voice can be heard, neither John Dillon nor the Plan of Campaign will lack a defender. All the proceedings of the Chief Secretary in Ireland, as enumerated by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), in his speech last night, remains to this hour unanswered and unanswerable in every particular. It now becomes a matter for the attention of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen, rather than of Irishmen, to say how they like the policy of the Chief Secretary in Ireland—to say whether they are proud of the policy, the black vans, the bread-and-water diet of the Representatives of the Irish people. They have now to say whether they are satisfied with the results of the right hon. Gentleman's system of government by gibes and gendarme Judges, and with his candid and ingenious method of answering plain questions. Judging by the honest and hearty words uttered by the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs (Mr. J. Sinclair), I am inclined to think that the Scottish people are not quite satisfied. I doubt very much whether the right hon. Gentleman is altogether satisfied himself, or whether he is as self-satisfied as the House could remember him to be once upon a time. I confess that when the Chief Secretary took the extraordinary course last night of entrusting the reply to the damning indictment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I could not help thinking of Achilles bestriding the prostrate form of Patroclus. Achilles was not in particularly good form last night. He was happy to think that Patroclus would revive that evening. No doubt he had made a last and gallant rally for this debate; but he thought the most devoted admirer of the right hon. Gentleman would own that he was not altogether the sort of man he used to be when he first took up the Crimes Act, and when he used to make those brilliant sarcasms at the expense of the Irish Members and the Irish people. There is one infallible test as to what is thought of the right hon. Gentleman's success in a quarter best qualified to judge—the Irish landlord party. The other day The Dublin Daily Express got hold of a rumour that the right hon. Gentleman was going to resign. The Dublin Daily Express instantly jumped to the conclusion that the rumour must be true, and forthwith preached a handsome funeral oration over the right hon. Gentleman's body. When the news reached Castlereagh, where a Crimes Court was sitting, one of the removable magistrates, Mr. Beckett, immediately said to the Crown Prosecutor—"Mr. Burke, do you propose to proceed any further?" Mr. Beckett was one of the gentlemen of whose legal competency the Lord Lieutenant is sufficiently satisfied. Mr. Beckett thought it was high time to "hedge." He evidently has his doubts about the promised 20 years of resolute Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has advised the friends of the Government not altogether to despair, but Mr. Beckett is evidently not even so sanguine a man as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is one subject to which I must allude, though it can only be one of pain, and perhaps I have said more than I ought to have said on the subject; but I cannot altogether forget that it is not so long ago that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary roused the merriment of the Tory Gentlemen of England by delicate allusions to the weak hearts and sensitive nerves of some of us. I might possibly retort that, on the whole, our hearts and nerves have stood the strain as well as those of the right hon. Gentleman. At all events, I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman can altogether conceal his own feelings in this matter. I congratulate him, at any rate, upon this—that he has learnt at last that the government of Ireland is, at all events, a serious matter. I desire to speak in no vindictive spirit of the right hon. Gentleman; because, unfortunately, we have seen too many Chief Secretaries for Ireland pass along that same miserable path, and my feeling is one of sorrow for them, for they are attempting a fatal and an impossible task. It is not their fault, they are not to blame; they have been set to do the impossible, and, sooner or later, with the measured certainty of a Greek tragedy, they will find that out. The right hon. Gentleman is an able man and a clever man; but I think that the right hon. Gentleman is a beaten and a broken man to-day. He has been beaten from pillar to post through every clause of his Crimes Act, from the Star Chamber clause to the newsvendor, and from the newsvendor back again, and has almost ceased to attempt to suppress the National League, has almost ceased in the suppressed districts to continue to annoy the League which two months ago he told this House was a thing of the past, but of whose influence the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night declared to be ubiquitous. If worse things have not happened in Ireland it is because the right hon. Gentleman has not dared to let loose the landlords upon those 8,000 or 10,000 tenants who are at their mercy at this moment under the existing clauses of the Land Act of last year. His Crimes Act has not frightened one small boy in Ireland—not even one small girl. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh bragged last night that he would have the majority when the debate was over. Of course he will; he is bound to have it. The Liberal Unionists are in the position of men in a condemned cell; they will naturally vote for abolishing capital punishment; they are, at all events, in favour of postponing the day. As far as the Irish people are concerned, they stand exactly where they stood in the beginning—where they and those who went with them will stand to the end. Chief Secretaries may come and Chief Secretaries may go; but the Irish cause goes on for ever. We have confidence in God and in the future, in our leaders, and in the Irish people and their undying aspiration; we have confidence in the great human heart of the British masses and the British millions, who have only to know the working of coercion to loathe and discard it for ever. Every day that confidence is growing, every day the common struggle in which we are joined as comrades is knitting the two nations together by bonds which nothing can sever, and in that firm confidence the Irish people will go on, cheerfully suffering, holding their ground and biding their time until the hour—the inevitable hour—when the ill-assorted majority who condone the horrors of coercion here to-night will have to face the judgment and the condemnation of every man who believes that Ireland can be united to England for ever by sympathy and trust, but never by a bungling and hateful tyranny.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Whatever anxiety we may have entertained as to the strength of the hon. Member's heart and nerves when he commenced his passionate declamation, there can be no doubt as to the strength of his lungs. The hon. Member commenced his observations by informing the House that the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) last night was not deserving of any reply except in the opinion of those who desired amusement. I am not surprised at the hon. Member expressing that opinion, because, for my own part, I venture to say that a more powerful and able speech than that of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh has never been delivered upon this subject, and this is no doubt a very convenient excuse on the part of the hon. Member for abstaining from replying to it. It affords another illustration—if further illustration is wanted—of the manner in which the Nationalist Party whenever they are challenged in this House invariably shirk the issues placed before them. The hon. Member has directed an unworthy taunt at the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). He would have us to believe that it is because Mr. Dillon is unable to be in his place that the hon. Member attacked him in a manner in which he would not have attacked him if he had been here. What right has he to make such a charge against the hon. Member for South Tyrone? No one who has watched the career of the hon. Member will be prepared to say that he would get up in his place and make charges against Mr. Dillon which he would not make if the hon. Member were here. It is a calumny on the hon. Member for South Tyrone, which I think even his opponents among whom he sits would repudiate with just indignation. The hon. Member for North-East Cork turned next to the pathetic description of the Boycotting of Norah Fitzmaurice, and there were no bounds to the hon. Member's scorn and the sneers in which he indulged at the "crocodile tears" in connection with this subject. Let me remind him of what happened. I think I may touch even the hon. Member before I have done. The hon. Member is one of the ardent supporters of the National League, and I do not wonder, therefore, that the hon. Member detests this "disgusting cant" with reference to the case of Norah Fitzmaurice. What has happened in this case? The father of Norah Fitzmaurice was one of the unhappy men condemned by the National League. We know, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), that crime always dogs the footsteps of the League; and, undoubtedly, the knowledge which the right hon. Gentleman possessed about the state of the League has been justified on this occasion. On the 12th of June, 1887, the Lixnaw branch of the National League passed the following resolution:—

which his brother was evicted and refuses to give any explanation to the League"—

what right had they to ask for any such explanation from any free man in a free country, or what would be a free country were it not for the tyranny of National League. As he refuses to give any explanation to the League in extenuation of his conduct—

"We hereby call upon the public to mark him as a landgrabber of the most inhuman type."

Then follows the usual thing that "dogs the footsteps of the League," and this man was brutally and inhumanly murdered. I hope the hon. Member will no longer sneer at the crocodile tears that have been shed over the case of Norah Fitzmaurice. But the hon. Member asked, what have you to say about hundreds and thousands of others who have been cast out to die by cruel landlords? No one has ever denied that there has been great hardships in past days imposed by the landlords of Ireland; but all that has been changed. ["Oh!"] Not changed? ["No, no!"] Then I suppose there has been no legislation, no judicial rents, no lowering of even judicial rents? What is meant by saying there has been no change? There has been change, and such change that Irish tenants are now in possession of advantages greater than are enjoyed by any other tenantry in the civilized world. Hon. Members opposite know well that what I am saying is perfectly true. If hard cases occur now they are owing to the tyranny of the National League, and the hon. Members who are its leaders. In illustration, let me call attention to a speech made by a certain Mr. Dennis Kilbride at a meeting of the National League in Dublin on the 29th of March, 1887, in the presence of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, who did not contradict the statement that was made. The incident shows what the real objects of the National League are. The hon. Member would have us believe that it steps in to prevent cruel hardships towards tenants; but what was it that Mr. Kilbride blurted out with the hon. Member by his side? He was speaking of the Luggacurran tenants, and he said they differed from most other tenants in this respect—that they were perfectly able to pay their rents. If the hon.

Member is unable to deny this, he stands convicted out of the mouth of his own associate. The hon. Member professes to wish for peace; but the conditions of the peace he desires are evidently an Irish Parliament doing by legislation what is sought to be done by the Plan of Campaign, and satisfying one class by plundering another. No doubt then there would be peace; but that is a peace which I hope the House of Commons and the English people will never consent to for a single moment. Let me now turn to the observations of the hon. Member in reference to the Plan of Campaign. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle told us last night that there had been a great deal of loose talk about the Plan of Campaign. We have to-night heard the opinion of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, and I would like to contrast it with other opinions. The Plan of Campaign has been judicially declared to be distinctly illegal by the Judges. It was condemned by Mr. Justice O'Brien, and Mr. Justice Johnston, who was Solicitor General in the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, entirely concurred in that condemnation. Hon. Gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that it has also been denounced by the head of their own religion. I will say nothing of the Pope to-night but this—that when the hon. Mr. O'Brien, talks of my right hon. Friend having gone skulking to the Pope for his assistance, that, as a matter of fact, what happened was this—So far from the Government sending anyone to the Pope, it was the Pope who sent his own agent to Ireland to make his own inquiries for himself. Dr. O'Dwyer has declared that the Plan of Campaign is a violation of a moral law of justice and charity, and its practice a breaking of the Commandment—"Thou shalt not steal." That being so, why is it that Mr. Dillon wears a felon's garb? Mr. Dillon, or any man who receives or orders the reception of rents taken under the Plan of Campaign, is in the position of a receiver of stolen goods, and deserves all he gets. The only note of dissent came from the hon. Member for North-East Cork, and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, on the 17th of February, said something in the House which greatly surprised me, and

I took down his words as the time. My hearing of it was confirmed by the reports in The Times and Daily News. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Far be it from me to assert that, necessarily, such a Plan in the abstract is an evil."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): There is a slight error in the reports caused by the omission of the word "not."

MR. CHAPLIN: I am afraid the memory of the right hon. Gentleman is not strictly accurate. I am well aware of what occurred. I was so struck by the remark—so horrified at it—that the very next day I spoke about it at a meeting connected with the Doncaster election; and I know it was afterwards corrected in Hansard, and this morning I have referred to Hansard, and I find the passage corrected in this way—

"Far be it from me to deny that, necessarily, such a Plan in the abstract is an evil."
—(3 Hansard, [322] 770.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman is referring to a past debate.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. CHAPLIN: But there is a wide difference between an assertion and a denial. If this corrected version is the true version, why did not the right hon. Gentleman correct the newspaper reports on the following day?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am not in the habit of reading the reports of speeches on the day after their delivery; but I availed myself of the first opportunity of correcting this speech for authentic publication, and then I was astonished to find this error, which is absolutely absurd to anyone who will read the context.

MR. CHAPLIN: Then I am to infer that the right hon. Gentleman is now prepared to admit that the Plan of Campaign is an evil which he condemns. I am very glad to think so, because it was always a marvel to me how the right hon. Gentleman could abstain from condemning in the most emphatic terms a system of sheer plunder. I am glad to have obtained a remarkable and gratifying admission, because we now know now the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman towards the plan of Campaign. The difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman in this matter must have been very great; his struggles to escape from this terrible position have been sometimes almost pitiable. How did he try to get out of it when addressing the Nonconformist ministers. He said that the real authors of the Plan of Campaign were the present Government, because they refused Mr. Parnell's Bill and his own modest proposal, and he added— "Then came distress, then evictions, then Bodyke, and then the Plan of Campaign." But unfortunately in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, as a matter of fact the plan was issued on the 17th of October, 1886, and the Bodyke evictions were not till May, 1887, or eight months after the Plan of Campaign first saw the light. Instead of Bodyke causing the Plan of Campaign, it was the Plan which caused the Bodyke evictions, because from the first there was every disposition to deal fairly with the tenants to the extent of not requiring any rent from those who were too poor to pay any, and satisfactory settlements would have been arrived at if it had not been for the mischievous interference of outsiders. I am anxious to say a word now upon the Motion before the House. I am not one of those who in the slightest degree regret the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, I am glad that right Gentlemen opposite have at last taken courage to themselves, and have ventured to arraign the Government in this House, where they can be met and answered on the spot, instead of adopting a plan which is much more usual with them. That plan is a very simple one; it is to try and blacken the character and reputation of the Government and of their supporters, who sit behind them, by every kind of false assertion and by every species of unscrupulous misrepresentation, repeated upon platforms over and over again all over the country, not only with regard to the Government and the administration of Ireland, but also with regard to the pledges by which their majority was obtained, and the way in which those pledges are being carried out, or rather, as they say, have not been carried out, from that time until now. We have tonight a Resolution which is as sufficiently clear and sufficiently distinct, but it neither charges the majority of that House with having broken their pledges, nor is there any such charge supported by the terms of the Motion. We have been told that the passing of the Crimes Act, and its administration in Ireland by my right hon. Friend, was undermining respect for law in Ireland. But what is the test, what is the measure of respect for law in any given country? The test is surely the way in which law is being observed or broken in that country. When was the highest average of crime in Ireland of late years? From the month of September, 1881, to May, 1882, the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian enjoyed the high distinction of having the highest number of crimes that had been recorded in Ireland for many years. In those nine months there were 4,389 crimes, which culminated in the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish, in May, 1882, for which I have always thought that the Leader of the Government of that day must be held more responsible than any other man in England. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] Over and over again appeals had been made from that side of the House—[Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"—] to the right hon. Gentleman to ask Parliament for powers to strengthen the hands of the Government of that day, and in so far as the right hon. Gentleman refrained, until that terrible calamity occurred, from asking for powers which Parliament would have immediately accorded. I place more responsibility upon the Head of the Government than upon any other man in the Ministry. [Cries of "Oh!"] An Act giving further powers was introduced and carried immediately after the event; and now, when hon. Gentlemen talk of the Crimes Act undermining respect for the law, I would ask them to consider what happened. From the moment of the passing of the Crimes Act in 1882, the number of crimes decreased from 4,389 in the previous nine months to 1,130 in the following eight months, and the monthly record also steadily diminished from 401 in May to 85 in the month of December, 1882. That is our experience of the effect of the Crimes Act in the past. What is the position now? The last Crimes Act was passed in July, 1887. In the six months prior to the passing of that Act, there were 484 crimes; in the six months since there have been 399 crimes; and a similar declension will be seen to have taken place in the following months for which we have the accounts. If those figures show anything at all, they show that under the administration of my right hon. Friend respect for law is gaining rather than losing ground in Ireland at the present time. I acknowledge that the improvement is not as great or as rapid as we could wish, but it is quite as rapid as can be expected, when we remember the exceptional difficulties in which my right hon. Friend was placed. Hitherto, thank God, all parties in the State have united in giving their best support to the Government of the day in the first elementary duty of maintaining law in every part of Her Majesty's Dominions. The right hon. Gentleman would not deny that when he sat on the Treasury Bench he received the warm, loyal, and cordial support of every Member of the Conservative Opposition in fulfilling the difficult task which he had then before him in the government of Ireland. What is the position to-day? The Leaders of the Opposition, and their supporters on the other side of the House, so far from giving support to my right hon. Friend, seem to be filled with one idea, and that is, how to thwart and hinder and embarrass him. And not only that, but they never cease to give encouragement by every means in their power to the opponents of the law in Ireland. It seems as if they felt sometimes positively afraid the right hon. Gentleman would be successful in making Ireland tranquil; it seems as if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian could not afford to see Ireland quiet, and that, if by any means whatever, my right hon. Friend should be successful in conducting the government of that country, there would be an utter destruction of the political schemes and Party of the right hon. Gentleman. When we come to contrast the administration of my right hon. Friend with that of any one of his Predecessors in any Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and when we consider that the highest number of crimes was, as I have shown, 4,389 during the administration of the right hon. Gentleman, and that the highest under the administration of my right hon. Friend is not more than 1,000, hon. Members will, I think, come to the conclusion that there has been no undermining of respect for the law by the present Government, and that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was successful in undermining that respect at least eight times as much as my right hon. Friend. It is not the administration of my right hon. Friend that undermines respect for law in Ireland; it is something very different. It is the conduct of the Leaders and the Members of Her Majesty's Opposition. I will give an instance to the House of the way in which the game is carried on by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I acknowledge it is peculiar and most ingenious. Everybody knows the enormous political influence which is wielded by the Nonconformist Ministers of this country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian not very long ago met a large assemblage of these gentlemen and made a speech to them in London. What happened? Those poor, simple-minded, truth-loving gentlemen sat at the feet of their Gamaliel with the firm conviction that every word he was telling them was gospel truth. They swallowed everything he told them, and they in turn retailed the stories of the right hon. Gentleman to their flocks as soon as they returned to meet them. And so in all parts of the country the right hon. Gentleman is engaged in trying to undermine respect for the Government as well as for the law in Ireland. What was this doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman preached to the Nonconformist Ministers—what was the burden of his song? He had taken the right hon. Gentleman's own words, and it was this—

"That they, as the majority of the present House of Commons, have abandoned and forfeited all the pledges by which that majority was returned."

He made that assertion, as he told them, "as a deliberate statement."

"Their pledges," he said, "have been cast to the winds, and I say now they have no moral title to represent England and no legal title to represent Ireland, Wales, and Scotland."

I want to know what are the pledges that have been broken. I will give them in the right hon. Gentleman's own words—

"To renounce coercion and to promise, at any rate, a liberal concession of Home Rule was the platform on which the majority stood at the last election."

And again the right hon. Gentleman

stated in a letter addressed to Mr. W. Robertson, of The Ayrshire Post, dated the 4th of June,—“They had promised no coercion and plenty of local government.” [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He noticed that the right hon. Gentleman cheered that; but he did not know what was to follow, or he did not think he would have cheered so readily. These are the pledges which the right hon. Gentleman charged us with breaking. I deny them altogether. I say, and affirm it here in the House of Commons, that the charge is absolutely false; and out of the right hon. Gentleman's own mouth I will prove the absolute truth of what I am stating. I am not going to quote from some reckless speech made by the right hon. Gentleman; I am not even going to quote from a post-card or telegram written in a hurry, or from a letter written deliberately by the right hon. Gentleman. I am going to quote from the most solemn document which it is possible for any man in the right hon. Gentleman's position deliberately to have penned; I am going to quote from his manifesto to his constituents while still Prime Minister of England, and which is dated the 10th of June, 1886. That manifesto the House will remember was addressed not only to the right hon. Gentleman's constituents, but to the whole country, and to them and before them he put clearly the issue of the General Election. What did the right hon. Gentleman say now? I beg the House to recollect that the charge against us is that since the last election we have broken our pledges. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Quote.] I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I wish to explain that since the General Election his charges were to this effect, that we had before the election promised, “no coercion and lots of local government.” What did the right hon. Gentleman say before the election? These are his words—

“Two clear, positive, and intelligible plans are before the world; there is the plan of the Government, and there is the plan of Lord Salisbury. Our plan is that Ireland, under well considered conditions, should transact her own affairs: his plan”—

Let the House bear in mind the plan of Lord Salisbury, the leader and mouth-piece of the majority who were pledged to “no coercion”—

"Is to ask Parliament for more repressive powers, and to enforce them resolutely for 20 years."

What is the House of Commons to think of that to-night? What will England, and what will the people who love truth and fair dealing, think of that to-morrow? The right hon. Gentleman has heard the statements. I invite him to-night to reconcile them if he can. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to think it a very easy thing. It is very easy for them to laugh, and they invariably do so whenever they find charges that are not easy to answer brought either against themselves or their Leader. If one of those charges were true, the other must be false. Our pledges could not be pledges of coercion and non-coercion at one and the same time. I wish to know which the right hon. Gentleman adopts at the present moment? [Cries of "Both!"] For my part, I do not hesitate for a single moment to affirm that the false charge is the one which the right hon. Gentleman makes against us now and has made against us throughout the country during the last six weeks—namely, that we have forfeited and broken all our pledges. Of course, I do not charge the right hon. Gentleman for one instant with deliberately making false assertions. I would be the last person in the House to do so. I am quite willing and quite ready to place a much more charitable construction on his words, and that is, that the right hon. Gentleman has forgotten that his memory has been failing him of late—[Cries of "Oh!" "Shame!" and interruption]]—and that the right hon. Gentleman does not really remember—[Renewed interruption and cries of "Order!"]]—that really he does not remember the statements he has made before and cannot be held responsible for what he says upon this subject. That is my charge against the right hon. Gentleman. I am well aware that the right hon. Gentleman fortified himself with regard to the charge of breaking their pledges on the matter of Local Government, by quoting the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) which he delivered in that House, and in which the noble Lord declared that the Party on that side of the House were pledged to give to Ireland, simultaneously with England and Scotland, any measure of Local Government that might be brought in for those countries. Now, I have myself already pointed out on a former occasion, although I have not been able to do so in this House for want of time, that there was absolute inconsistency between the pledges of the noble Lord and the attitude of the Government. Those pledges were given subject to two conditions—namely, that there should be the same fulfilment of legal obligations in Ireland as there was in England, and that there should be the same state of peace and tranquillity in Ireland. If that were so, I contend that I have successfully shown that the charges which the right hon. Gentleman has levelled against us before the Nonconformist Ministers of the country, of breaking our pledges in regard to coercion on the one hand, and in regard to Local Government on the other, are absolutely false. I have shown that out of the right hon. Gentleman's own mouth and out of his manifesto of 1886, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will do me the favour of attempting to show how both of his statements can possibly be true.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I do not feel my temper to be severely tried by the rather violent attacks of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, who says that I, more than any other man, am responsible for the dreadful crime which darkened the month of May, 1882, and who alleges that I habitually make in the country or here "false" charges—an epithet which I think I have carefully avoided on every occasion in speaking of my opponents. The avoidance of such an epithet is, if I may so say, a characteristic of civilized political controversy. I have, however, not the least desire to interfere with the liberty of the right hon. Gentleman; and if I felt inclined to be angry with him at all it would be with that large infusion of charity which induced him, after attempting to show that I had made inconsistent accusations, to explain them by a reference to the accruing infirmities of age. I shall not pretend to determine to what exact degree I am suffering from those infirmities; but I may venture to say that while sensible that the lapse of time is undoubtedly extremely formidable and affects me in more than one particular, yet

I hope that, for a little while at any rate, I may remain not wholly unable to cope with antagonists of the calibre of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has kindly and generously given me my choice between two accusations which he says are incompatible and contradictory. I decline to avail myself of the option so handsomely accorded to me. I adhere in the fullest sense of every word to both of those accusations. There is one qualification which the right hon. Gentleman did not mention. I made it clear in the speech which he has quoted that while I made against the majority as a body the distinct charge to which he has referred, I did not make it against every individual of that majority, because I recollected that there were exceptions. I think, if I remember right, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was an exception. If my memory serves me, I recollect that at the period of the Election my right hon. Friend referred to coercion as a policy which he would be inclined under certain circumstances and under certain conditions to support. But as regards the body in general, I have made that charge, and, please God, I will make it again. I do not intend, Sir, to be drawn aside from the business of to-night. I meet the right hon. Gentleman fairly when I say that I hold myself responsible for both of these accusations, presuming to differ from him on what he thinks their contradictory character. In my firm conviction, of course, with all due deference to his superior judgment, they are both of them true, both of them historical, both of them rational, both of them within the facts. It is impossible within the narrow limits assigned to this debate for each speaker—perhaps for any speaker—to traverse the whole field of an indictment so wide as that which has been brought by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) against the Crimes Act and its administration in Ireland. There is a general understanding, I believe, that the debate shall close to-night. In my opinion, for such a subject to have been fully and satisfactorily discussed, it would have required three times the period which is assigned to it. Notwithstanding that, I am making no complaint at the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in this matter, although I did regret that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) found himself in duty obliged to threaten us with what would happen in case the debate should be unduly prolonged. He has pointed to the consequences that would ensue in regard to the mutilation and the possible loss of a measure to which we attach great value. But that is a passing matter. I am aware it is desired in the present state of Public Business—and I think it does great honour to the Irish Members that they should concur in the arrangement—that we should be content with placing fairly, although inadequately, the charges which we have to make, and that we should then revert to the consideration of the great public matters that we have to dispose of. I state this, however, simply as an introduction to a separate statement. With the exception of one particular subject—namely, what I deem to be the extremely important case of Killeagh—I do not intend to enter into details upon the several portions of this matter. They were treated by my right hon. Friend (Mr. John Morley) in a manner which, if not complete—and complete it could not be—was wonderfully comprehensive, lucid, able, and concise, and I am ready in what I pass over to be bound by the statement which he made. Now, Sir, I am compelled first to reiterate the complaint, though I will not dwell upon it, that information has been withheld which ought to have been given to us. I found, in fact, upon that withholding of information, upon the manner in which information has been given, upon the illusory and inaccurate character of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), a charge which I think we can sustain, and for which I make myself responsible—whether intended or not, it has amounted on the part of the Government to an endeavour to oust the House of Commons from its proper jurisdiction in watching the operation of exceptional laws, and in making provision, wherever circumstances seem to require it, for the maintenance of the sanctity of private rights. Now, Sir, I remind the House that we were refused information on the depositions connected with the imprisonment of Mr. Dillon. We have been absolutely refused wholesale information in the case of conspiracy. We have been refused information on the subject which of all others was best calculated to test the success of the policy of Her Majesty's Government—namely, information relating to derelict land. We obtained, it is true, a Return on the Motion of my right hon. Friend (Mr. John Morley) of the cases of persons tried under the Crimes Act. And what a statement it was which was presented to us. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think it is the duty of each Member for himself to compile statistics, and the duty of the Government to give every opposition they can to supplying us with knowledge in a state in which we can use it. So chaotic and so slovenly a Return on a subject of such importance, without dates of time, without notification of place, without classification of the 2,000 offences, so as to enable us to know how many there were of one class, and how many there were of another, I do not think I ever knew presented to Parliament; and, when it is presented, it is at the beginning of a debate which is to terminate on the second night. A graver matter still remains. Information was refused in regard to the deplorable and disgraceful transactions at Mitchelstown. A less grave matter, but one which illustrates the position in which we are placed, was the refusal to give us any information with respect to the transaction at Ennis. And how are we placed? We hear statements made in this House. We recite them elsewhere. I heard a statement made in this House which I thought challenged and deserved inquiry—namely, that officers in command of Her Majesty's Forces, and especially of Cavalry, sent into a certain yard, which the Government described as densely packed with people, a portion of that Cavalry. A more unwise, a more blameworthy proceeding, although there was no intention of charging, I could not have supposed. It was also stated that there was a charge of the cavalry in the yard. That was at the time not admitted by the Government; but that the Cavalry were sent into the yard they never questioned for a moment. I made the charge in a speech at a public meeting, that the Cavalry were sent into that yard, and I admit there were words of mine which might have been understood in the sense that I gave credit to the statement that the Cavalry did make the charge. That, however, was quite an incidental part; the substance of the charge I meant to make was, that the Cavalry were sent into the yard. For that charge there was no foundation. The Cavalry were not sent into the yard. A particular Hussar went into the yard and seems there to have misconducted himself to the injury of one or two perfectly innocent persons. What happened? Our prayer in this House was for inquiry. We made none of these charges as proved facts. They were reported in the newspapers. We, seeing them there, prayed for inquiry. We were refused all inquiry; and this officer, for whom I have a great respect, for I believe him to be an honorable and a liberal-minded man—that is, I believe him to have been an honourable and liberal-minded man—Colonel Turner—writes a letter to the newspaper denouncing me as a person totally void of the sense of truth and justice, because I had made a charge, which charge was made in this House and not denied by Her Majesty's Government. That is the position in which we are placed because of this almost systematic refusal of accurate information on the part of Her Majesty's Government in a case of this vital importance. I must point out in all fairness, that when he said that I had stated this matter in defiance of what had been stated by the Government in the House of Commons on the 12th of April, he completely admitted that the Cavalry had been sent into the yard densely packed with people. Well, sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) made a statement which I may take notice of in order that I may come nearer to the vital parts of this case. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of two cases of murder in Ireland in which the Crimes Act had been useful—one by the change of venue, and the other by the use of the private inquiry. Every man in this House rejoices in those two solitary cases in which the Crimes Act has been of use; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, and seemed to wish the House to think, that these were the main matters for which the Crimes Act had been passed. Why, Sir, was there any difficulty in this House last year made by my hon. Friends near me or by myself on the question of properly criminal jurisdiction? Nothing of the sort. My right hon. Friend, I think in the very first speech he made upon the subject, said that he was perfectly ready to entertain the consideration of provisions for the bond fide corroboration of the Criminal Law. I expressed my concurrence with him, and I believe he actually pointed in principle to these very two questions, the change of venue and the clause of private inquiry. I know that that clause of private inquiry took a long time; but why did it take a long time? It was because of the bungling and inefficient manner in which it had been drawn, so that when it came into this House it consisted of 80 lines, and by the time it received the sanction of the House in Committee it consisted of, I believe, 120 lines. Sir, there should have been no difference of opinion between us on these matters; but what was our contention from the first? It was that this was not a Crimes Act at all. It was not framed for the purpose of putting down crime. It was a Combination Act. It professed to go against conspiracy. It was really aimed against combination, and we shall see how it has been applied in these matters. But when the right hon. Gentleman wishes the issue to be taken on the subject of the two murder cases, as to which there are not two opinions in this House, and wishes it to be supposed that this is the question now raised on which the House ought to decide—against these two cases of murder I point to the 2,000 cases in which Her Majesty's Irish subjects have been prosecuted by the Government and in which hundreds of them, unless I am very much mistaken—I believe I might say by far the larger majority of those 2,000—have had to suffer the anxiety of trial and the penalty of imprisonment, and you cannot, by pointing to two cases of murder in which particular provisions that nobody would have objected to on principle have been put in operation, escape the issue on the general administration of the Crimes Act. Now, Sir, I shall not attempt after the powerful speech of the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) to speak of the Plan of Campaign or Mr. Dillon, but I shall remark on the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Chaplin) treats me with respect to the Plan of Campaign. Having quoted a line and a-half from a speech of mine he thereupon expands it by his great power of paraphrase, and thus, making me responsible for the padding he puts in, he is good enough to express his lively satisfaction at my admission of fair and sound doctrines which are in reality the offspring of his own fertile brain. I was certainly not less than half-an-hour in the month of February in giving fully and carefully my views of the Plan of Campaign. I am not going to enter into it at large at present, what I am going to do is this, to state in one single sentence what I believe the right hon. Gentleman has not the smallest idea of, and, what I do not know, whether the Government thoroughly comprehend—namely, what is the real contention that hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House have to meet with respect to the Plan of Campaign? I shall state it without a word of comment, and the contention, as I understand it, is this—that the Plan of Campaign was framed when Parliament had refused to make any legislative provision for the necessities of the tenantry of Ireland in the year 1886, and that it met the case by making demands upon the landlords equal or inferior to those which, in the Act of 1887, the Land Commission had acknowledged to be just. That is the true state of the question. It is idle to travel round and round it as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has done; it is idle to advance against it the naked doctrine that it is the law and that the law shall be obeyed. ["Oh, oh!"] I know there are those in this House to whom it seems to be a cardinal principle and a sacred duty to make no investigations of Irish history, no more than they think right, or of the general opinion of the world as to the relations between Ireland and England. But that is not so in Ireland. The recollections and the traditions of Irish history are burnt into the very soul of the people. We know how the traditions of Marlborough survived from generation to generation on the Continent, and you ought to know how the saying, "The Curse of Cromwell," has lived from generation to generation in Ireland. These things are known and felt there. The Irish people are aware what are the horrors, what are the atrocities almost incredible, that have been done in Ireland in the name of law—the tortures, the murders, the crimes of every description which when they have not been done under the name of law have been covered by subsequent acts of indemnity, and who can suppose that a people whose whole souls are full of these painful and grievous recollections can come to the consideration of the law in the same mind and the same spirit as the Judge sitting upon the Bench? In expecting it you show your ignorance of human nature, your incapacity for statesmanship. The principles on which you act have never guided wise legislative assemblies, which have always made allowances for those things and for the circumstances which determine the character of national emotions and recollections, and which have been aware that the cases in the mixed condition of human affairs are not unfrequent. Unhappily, Ireland is perhaps the most conspicuous country in the world where law has been on one side and justice on the other. You do not consider—you do not seem to think it worth while to consider—the facts of Mr. Dillon's case. I will not discuss the matter at large after the vindication he has received from the powerful statement made by the hon. Member of North-East Cork; but I will refer briefly to some of the incidents of Mr. Dillon's case, and first among them I must say that it is a strange irony of fortune that Mr. Dillon should be lectured on the subject of illegality by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson)—the man who has announced that if Parliament think proper to pass a certain law he will lift his hand in violence to resist it and encourage his countrymen to do the same. If Mr. Dillon wishes to serve an apprenticeship in illegality I recommend him to the master opposite; but the apprenticeship will be long and arduous, and Mr. Dillon will have to mount the ladder step by step before he reaches the elevation on which the hon. and gallant Member has been comfortably planted long ago. I want the House to consider how it was that Mr. Dillon became amenable to the law, for, after all, our prime duty here is not to measure in scales of gold the wisdom or even propriety of every individual or his conduct, but to bring to account the Government of the Queen—those who are responsible, those who sway the majority in this House, those who have at their back the Army, and the Constabulary, and that other instrument of justice apparently in some cases not less pliable and effective—namely, the Resident Magistrates. I wish to examine, then, when Mr. Dillon became amenable to the law. Mr. Dillon, I feel bound to assume—I do not wish to go into the judicial decision—I do not know whether it is a direct judicial decision or not; but I shall assume that he was amenable to the operation of the law. He was amenable in County Louth, but he was amenable to its operation subject to going before a jury. Now, that is of all things what Her Majesty's Government most dread. Lord Spencer administered his Crimes Act from 1882 to 1885, and he administered it with all the success that can possibly attend such a measure, and in that Crimes Act we had taken powers for going past the jury in a straightforward, upright, and honourable manner, in the light of day, in case the necessity should arise. It never did arise, and the Act was administered without departure from the principle of trial by jury. What has been done here? An act is done in a county of Ireland, a county which has a pure and splendid reputation so far as outrage is concerned. I am told that as to Louth it may be said—as I am happy to say it may be said of many parts of Wales—that long years have passed since an outrage has been committed in that county. Yet Louth was subjected to the indignity of being proclaimed under the Crimes Act in order that Mr. Dillon might not have the benefit of a jury. These are the acts—this is one of the acts—which provoke men to say that they are not only harsh, not only are they cruel, but they are mean. Of them any Government ought to be ashamed, and if it were possible for the right hon. Gentleman by those researches of which he is so fond to find that something of the kind was done by a Liberal Government—[Cheers.]—Oh, yes, that is a delightful prospect, is it not? I say, if he could find such a thing, I would not stoop to apologize for such an act. If I had a share in it I would take a full share of the responsibility, and perform whatever penance you might choose to impose. The County Louth has been proclaimed in order that Mr. Dillon might be deprived of his rights as a British subject which he possessed at the time he made his speech. Is that the way in which you propose to propagate respect for the law in Ireland? Is that the way in which you think you will draw the heart of Ireland nearer? Nearer to what? Not to the heart of England, for these two great hearts, I rejoice to say, are already morally joined in one, but nearer to Dublin Castle, nearer to the Viceroy, nearer to the Chief Secretary, nearer to the Tory and Dissident majority. It is necessary, under the high sense of duty that governs the administration of the right hon. Gentleman, that Mr. Dillon should be subjected to the indignity of being put into prison costume. What, says the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin)? "Serve him right." Serve him right! Is it right, then, to insult a Gentleman of his character? Suppose an accident happened to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh in the contingencies which might arise, and which he has foreshadowed. I do not believe that, among his strongest opponents below the Gangway, there is one that would, for a moment, tolerate this indignity should be put upon him. But this has been done to Mr. Dillon. Why? On the ground of the high and inflexible morality which is so characteristic, as we all know, of the Irish Secretary that he cannot help observing upon the want of it in other people. His high morality will not endure the unequal treatment in two cases. Is it equal treatment? Is the prison dress for Mr. Dillon the same thing as the prison dress, for the man with the frieze coat? Is it? Is it the same thing? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) says it is. I say it is not the same, and I appeal to an authority better than myself, and better than the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, for if it is the same infliction, I put these two questions—Why did Parliament provide in England that every person for the offence of sedition should cease to be subject to this indignity, and should become a first-class misdemeanant? And why did the right hon. Gentleman, who is troubled with a stiff, unbending conscience, bend that conscience in the case of the priest? If the prison dress be the same thing for Mr. Dillon and the frieze coat, is it the same thing for Mr. Dillon and the priest? The right hon. Gentleman has not dared to put the prison dress upon the priest. He receded from it not because he was merciful, but because he was afraid. [Cheers and Laughter.] I hope the right hon. Gentleman enjoys that. I believe he has said he had no option—that the law prescribed it, and that the law must be obeyed. Then, I ask, why was the law violated by the right hon. Gentleman in the case of the priest? How can he reconcile his conduct to Mr. Dillon and other Members of this House with his conduct to the priests, or with the policy which has long ago dictated the adoption of a wise and gentle and humane, but perfectly protective, law for the treatment of prisoners committed for sedition in England? What did the Judge say in the case of Mr. Dillon? He inflicted the maximum sentence. But why? Because of Mr. Dillon's great influence. Therefore, he said—"I will inflict the maximum sentence." But how has Mr. Dillon used his influence? Go back with me to the memorable and melancholy day at Mitchelstown. [Laughter.] I heard that laugh. It must have been involuntary, for it is shocking to suppose that it was anything else. Go back to the melancholy day at Mitchelstown, and to the great outrages of the officers of the Constabulary and the men under their command, and the deaths of three innocent men. It was Mr. Dillon, in my belief, who prevented, by the use of his great influence, a terrible accumulation of that disaster, and that use of his influence ought to have been recollected when he was taken to task by the Judge and the maximum punishment inflicted upon him, because in some other case, the Judge differed from the use he had made of the influence. I make no special complaint of the Judge in this case. I cannot say as much in respect of another case to which I shall come by-and-bye. But the Judge in this case said—"Mr. Dillon is a man of great influence over his fellow-countrymen." By that he meant over the Irish people. The Judge was perhaps hardly aware that Mr. Dillon's influence is not limited to Ireland. There are millions upon millions of people in this country—I believe the large majority of the people of England, as well as of Scotland and Wales—to whom there could be on the occasion of a public assembly no more welcome tidings than that they were about to be addressed by Mr. Dillon, and there is hardly one whose entrance among them would call forth more enthusiastic acclamation. Now, Sir, I will venture to say that it is a terrible state of things that a man of Mr. Dillon's character, his qualities, and his position is thus treated. It is a state of things which ought to bring about much reflection and which cannot be disposed of by a majority to-night in this House. Well, Sir, I am now going into the case of Killeagh. After the daring statement of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) last night, and the yet more daring statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on a former occasion, I wish to set out the whole case to the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer must not suppose that the slight reference to it with which he was provided has in any degree disposed of it. The hon. and learned Solicitor General came a little nearer to the point when he stated that the men who were imprisoned at Killeagh had been found guilty of conspiracy at Common Law for the purpose of starving the police. Found guilty of conspiracy at Common Law? By whom were they found guilty of conspiracy at Common Law?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I did not state that the men had been found guilty of conspiracy at Common Law. What I did state—and as my authority I refer to the judgment of the Court—was that the Judges of the Court of Exchequer said there was before them evidence upon which a jury might have found them guilty of a conspiracy at Common Law.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I read a report which has all the appearance of care and precision; but I am extremely glad to hear the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I at once withdraw what I intended to say on this subject. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman will have the goodness to refer to the newspaper to which I referred this morning—namely, The Times—he will find that he has been most seriously misreported, for the words I have used are precisely those which are to be found there. I will now pass altogether from that topic. Well, Sir, I come to what was said by the Lord Chief Baron, and I dwell the more readily upon this case because although, of course, it does not present the entire indictment to the House which it has made against the administration of the Crimes Act, yet it presents what I think is the most important part of the case and goes to the very centre and core of it, because our main contention in the debates of last year was that this Act was not a Crimes Act at all—that is to say, that crime was a secondary and partial subject within its purview; that it was really a Conspiracy Act, and under the name of a Conspiracy Act it was a Combination Act, and was intended to put down lawful and legitimate combination. Now, Sir, let us follow the legality of the proceedings, the competency of the tribunal, and the language of the Government in the case of Killeagh. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland has, I think, stated very nearly what was said by the Lord Chief Baron in the first part of his remarks. But he left out certain words of the Lord Chief Baron which I think may be accurately represented thus. The Lord Chief Baron was fully of opinion that common action had been proved, and upon this common action he rather thought—that was his expression—there would have been evidence from which a jury would have concluded that the real object was to injure the police, and that upon evidence of that kind an indictment might be brought and the jury might give a verdict. Very well, let us suppose that is so. Then I want to know what is the state of the law in Ireland? I accept it without question. It is not for me to attempt to affirm or deny it; my business is to accept it. The statement of the Lord Chief Baron is that if four men combine at Killeagh, where there is believed to be a conspiracy existing, and are proved by common action to have refused to deal with the constabulary, a jury might convict them of a criminal offence upon evidence which tended to prove as much as that. Now, suppose, not a case of four men who deal in goods and withhold their goods from the constabulary, but a case in England of 400 men dealing in labour and withholding their labour. I believe I might go a great deal further and say “who break their contract.” Even that would not be an overstatement. But in the one case or the other—and I believe I may safely go to the more extreme supposition of a breach of contract—the 400 men would, every one of them, stand scatheless in a Court of Justice. The four men were sent to prison. Where is the equality of Irish rights? This is what we asked—what we pressed for last year, what we were called factious for pressing for. This is what the Government sternly refused. In England the artizan is protected by the law in respect of the disposal of the commodity which he has to dispose of. In Ireland you have refused to protect him by the law in respect of the very same thing, and at the same time you tell us you will not hear of an Irish Legislature to deal with Irish affairs; that the true principle is that which at Westminster and within the walls of Parliament consecrates the principle of equality of rights. Then the Lord Chief Baron goes on—because the part of his speech to which I have referred is entirely incidental—

“Another offence may possibly have been committed. But the question we have to consider is whether a certain particular offence, which we will go on to consider and define, has been committed or not.”

What they had to consider—these are the words of the Lord Chief Baron—was whether the common purpose was that this refusal to deal should be accomplished either by compulsion or by influence which he had called undue influence. I call the particular attention of the House to these words, because everything, in fact, turns upon them. I may dismiss altogether the word “compulsion” in this case, because there had been no charge of compulsion. I have been favoured, not by Her Majesty’s Government, but by the labour and care of a Member of this House, with the bulky copies of the depositions, and I have read the whole of them; and they all of them charge in one and the same phrase that the offence was joining in a conspiracy to induce certain persons not to deal. Then, said the Lord Chief Baron—“that is the question we have to consider.” What does he say upon it? He was bound to say that he did not find one shadow of evidence whatever in this case, and he did not find any evidence on which it could be argued except in the case of David Barry. What was the case of David Barry? Now,

David Barry was sentenced, like the rest, for one month. By some process which I do not understand, but I am glad of it, the sentence seems afterwards to have been reduced to one fortnight, on the ground that David Barry had apparently, to the Judges, acted under intimidation; and, for having acted under intimidation, he was charged and sent to prison for a fortnight for a conspiracy to induce others not to deal. What says the Lord Chief Baron? It is simply this. To be a victim of a conspiracy was, in the view of these Judges, the same thing as to be the author of the conspiracy. The man who refuses to deal through intimidation and under a fright, which he describes in Court, that man is a sufferer already, and to send him to prison for an offence indicates either a weakness, or a perversity, or an ignorance, or all three combined, such as I could not have believed possible from anything calling itself a Bench of Justice. Of course, any language of the Lord Chief Baron cannot possibly be exaggerated in this case. There is no evidence whatever. Now, Sir, it has been represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland that there may have been a mistake in this case. Accidents will happen in the best-regulated families, and, consequently, there was a slight error of judgment, but not an error of judgment to form the basis of a charge on the part of the two Resident Magistrates, Mr. Gardiner and Mr. Redmond. What I have to show is this—that this was not an oversight on the part of the Judges. Their attention was expressly and repeatedly called to the distinction taken by the Lord Chief Baron. They did not suppose that the different kinds of conspiracy were confounded together, and that they in sentencing for one might just as well sentence for another. Here is the report, which I quote from The Cork Examiner of the 1st of June, of what was said on the occasion. Mr. Hodnett, who was acting on the part of the defendants, pointed out to the Judges that there was a total want of evidence, and that the Judges ought to dismiss the summons for want of evidence to show that the defendants entered into a criminal conspiracy to induce others not to supply goods. Observe that he put it before them in the clearest terms. What said Mr. Gardiner? "We are both against you, Mr. Hodnett." These are the men to whom, to the disparagement of Judges and to the disparagement of the Superior Courts, you have committed practically in the most delicate and difficult matters the government of Ireland. However, Mr. Hodnett was not discouraged, and he went on to say—"I have made an argument, and I hope something will be said." So Mr. Gardiner proceeded to give his view of the case. He said his view of the case was this—

"The evidence went to show that these parties entered into a criminal conspiracy with one another, inasmuch as their acts in the refusing in nearly all the same language and terms showed the conspiracy they had entered into."

That is to say, he deliberately passed over what had been stated by Mr. Hodnett, who endeavoured to guide this blind man, and to describe to him the kind of conspiracy that was charged in the indictment. The patience of Mr. Hodnett was not yet exhausted, and he said—"That is not the charge. The charge is inducing other persons not to supply goods." Twice in the most distinct language that man could use these Judges were reminded that it was not a general charge before them of conspiracy, but a charge that they had induced other persons not to supply goods. Here is the final decision of Mr. Gardiner, and these are the Judges of whose legal competence the Government are satisfied. He said—"Each defendant should be taken with reference to the others." The Judge, having the case placed before him in the most distinct manner, did not pretend that he had the least scintilla of evidence to show that the defendants had committed a crime. He said that they might have committed a crime; and without any evidence and merely in consequence of an opinion in the sanctuary of his breast he condemned them. I have given you now what the Lord Chief Baron said and what the Resident Magistrate said. But what did the Government say? Observe, my point is this, and it is recognized on both sides. We are not dealing now with the Common Law of Conspiracy, which derives its criminal character from its being intended to injure a person or a class. That is not the offence charged.

The offence charged by the Act is to compel or induce persons not to do certain things. I put a Question carefully framed in the sense of the Act. I asked first for the production of all these depositions in cases of conspiracy; and I then asked whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could assure the House that in every case where an individual had been convicted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act the conspiracy to compel or induce some person not to deal with or to work for some other person in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation, evidence had been taken to prove, not only the refusal of the individual to work or to deal as above, but to prove that he was implicated in a conspiracy for some one of the said purposes—that is to say, for the purpose of inducing or compelling not to deal with or to work for; and the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to that Question gave me the most positive and distinct pledge. He said—"In all the cases described by the right hon. Gentleman evidence has been taken to prove the conspiracy referred to." I presume that he had in his hands at that moment the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron and the judgment of Mr. Justice Andrews—Baron Dowse saying nothing on the subject. He had in his hands the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, which said there was no evidence whatever, and with that judgment in his hands he told me that evidence had been taken in every case to prove—what? Not to prove conspiracy, but to prove the conspiracy referred to.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has confused dates. The answer I gave him was before the judgment was delivered.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman had not the judgment in his hands but he had the depositions. I have read the whole of these depositions, and they do not contain one single sentence upon any subject except that of the refusal to deal, unless in one single instance. And what is that? It is the sentence in which the constable, O'Donaghue, states that there was a meeting on the 4th of March, which meeting is supposed to have had some reference to some combination or other for the purpose of exclusive dealing, and he deposes that he did not see any one of the defendants at that meeting. Was there ever such a case as this? The right hon. Gentleman had read the evidence. If he says there is evidence of the conspiracy referred to, let him produce it. It does not exist. He cannot produce it unless all the documents are falsified; and that which he made bold to state to this House, that the conspiracy to induce had evidence taken upon it, is totally contrary to the fact, and the right hon. Gentleman has to explain his conduct to the House. But the right hon. Gentleman, when we ask him why he has not fulfilled his pledges—this pledge and that pledge—his answer is—“Oh, that has been sufficiently threshed out already, and I cannot go over it again.” Such was the language of the Government. Now, this is no question of a miscarriage or of a mistake of an inferior tribunal. It is not a question of mistaking the balance of evidence in regard to which human judgment may go wrong. Here there was no balance of evidence at all. There was, as we know now on the highest authority, no evidence whatever. There could not be any evidence, and there being no evidence, and the attention of the Judge having been called to the fact that there was no evidence, he deliberately refused to take notice of that call and went on to aggravate his conduct by refusing to state a case. Is this a specimen of the manner in which this Law of Conspiracy is administered in Ireland? I have to put Questions to the right hon. Gentleman besides that which I have put to him about himself. Are these two Resident Magistrates to continue to administer the Coercion Act? I presume that the Government have considered that subject. I do not undertake to say what is the cause of their misconduct—whether it is bias, whether it is bigotry—ignorance it cannot be, because the thing was placed twice before them—or whether it was feebleness of character. I do not enter into these things. I look at the facts, and say it is totally impossible to place confidence in such a Bench. I say the people of Ireland would be unworthy of the name of men if the spirit of the country did not revolt against such treatment. I am told that this is only one conspiracy case. Only one conspiracy case! Well, it is the only one in which we have been able to get the particulars. How many more are there of such cases? I challenge the right hon. Gentleman, and I make an appeal to him to lay upon the Table the depositions in all conspiracy cases. He has heard the statement made by an able lawyer in this House that he and his Friends have examined 700 out of 2,000 cases, and the conclusion they have come to is that the proceedings were a travesty and caricature of justice. We have got that, and having extracted from the right hon. Gentleman some particulars with regard to this special case, we find it to be as flagrant and scandalous as any in the days of Judge Jeffreys. [Laughter.] The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) has a great faculty for laughter. I know very well that these men have not the power of Judge Jeffreys, and that we do not live in the time of Judge Jeffreys. How far is that the fault of the right hon. Gentleman? What the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate ought to appreciate is, that the denial of justice, which is the same thing in the case of a farthing as of a £1,000,000, is as gross, as palpable, and as shameful as ever disgraced the time of Judge Jeffreys. I therefore beg the right hon. Gentleman to produce the depositions in these cases. I do not know precisely the number of cases. We have no aid from the right hon. Gentleman. We have to find our way through a lengthened paper with about 2,000 names, out of which there are, I believe, about 150 charged with conspiracy. I think that the particulars of the painful case upon which I have detained the House so long show grounds for the necessity of my demand. If the right hon. Gentleman does not give us the particulars of the other cases we shall be compelled to conclude that the other cases are like this case; and if he disputes it, let him give us the means of judging. If the right hon. Gentleman does not give us the means of judging, if he is determined that Parliament shall be excluded from forming an opinion in cases of this kind, that will sustain my charge that it is the policy of the Government to oust the House of Commons from the performance of one of its most sacred duties—that of defending the weak and maintaining the sanctity of private rights and private liberty. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his speech last night, contended that the policy of the Government was making progress, slow but sure. That I understand to be the upshot of the principal portions of his speech. What did he point to in support of that contention? He pointed to certain statistics about Boycotting about which I have to observe that those statistics are an invention of the Government. No such statistics ever were produced until the existence of the present Government. I entirely decline to accept them because I have no means of testing their accuracy. You might as well bring statistics from the moon as give us your statistics of Boycotting. There is no legal, moral, or social test by which we can judge them. You plead usage when usage is in your favour; but you depart from usage because your Returns have been prepared—I was almost about to have said manufactured for you—in order to show a considerable diminution of Boycotting. What the right hon. Gentleman really means is a diminution in the number of agrarian offences—not a very large diminution, but, I admit, a sensible and gratifying diminution. I will not enter into the question of the cause of that diminution. We do not believe that the cause is to be found either in the Crimes Act or in the mode in which it is applied. We think it is due to other and very different causes. I am not going to enter upon that distinct ground. If you like, I will take the fact upon your own showing, and upon your own argument, and assume that it is due to the Crimes Act. If that were so, would it be a proof of progress, would it be a proof that you were making your way to a settlement of the Irish question? I think not. Lord Spencer's triumph over agrarian outrage was tenfold what it has been under the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I take it to have been, so far as external manifestations were concerned, one of the most complete ever brought about in the history of Executive Government. It was a marvellous reduction. I will not quote figures. The number of agrarian offences with which Lord Spencer had to deal was quoted as between 4,000 and 5,000, and it was reduced, I believe, to a figure below 1,000. But Lord Spencer did not think by that reduction he had made any way towards solving the Irish problem. And not only he did not think so, but the Tories did not think so. So far were they from recognizing in Lord Spencer's action a satisfactory condition of things as an argument for maintaining coercion that they declared that the policy of coercion had failed and ought to be abandoned. I know the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) said that he never approved the abandonment of the policy of Lord Spencer, for he thought that the policy of coercion ought to be maintained. The right hon. Gentleman nods his head; but his disapproval was an extremely cheap disapproval, because the right hon. Gentleman shared the spoils of the victors and took Office from the Government which disapproved of that policy. But what we contend is that the diminution of agrarian offences does not solve the Irish Question. What is the situation? What is the general condition of Ireland now? Ireland is in the hands of three powers—the Army, the Constabulary, and inferior tribunals of justice, tribunals which I do not hesitate in describing as inferior after the specimen we have had to-night, and no country in that condition by the side of a great and powerful State can be said to have made the least progress towards a satisfactory settlement. We whose Empire rests upon the goodwill and affection of every other people of which it is composed ought to blush up to our eyes when we find that Ireland is only to be kept by such means as those which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has described as a slow progress towards the solution of the Irish Question. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has considered the position of the Constabulary. In many respects I look with very great respect on the history of the Constabulary. On most occasions they have performed their duty admirably well, making allowance for all difficulties; but I am by no means sure that that position is not getting undermined. I put this question to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues—Have not collisions between the Constabulary and the people, have not the occasions upon which the Constabulary have resorted to force in their dealings with the people, been more numerous within the last 12 months than they have been for a long, long period before? Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a Return stating the number of cases in which, during the last 12 months, the police have used their batons, and other Returns with respect to the use of their batons during other periods? I own I am not without apprehension that something like exasperation has grown up in the minds of the people with respect to the action of this force. At any rate, I think there is evidence which must lead one to wish that the Government could emphatically deny any such a suggestion, and can assure us that the relations between the Constabulary and the people at large are as good as they have been at other periods. I never heard until within the last 12 months or thereabouts that shopkeepers were refusing to serve them. That may be a small thing in amount, but it is menacing and ominous in its character. I confess, so far as I can judge of it, and owing to the action of the Government we can judge of it only very imperfectly, the position of the Constabulary shows that the progress of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer speaks is a progress not forwards, but backwards, as to the solution of the Irish Question. What are the evidences of failure on the other hand? The right hon. Gentleman has, I think, a difficult task before him when he has to meet the charges of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, who in February last defied the Government to contradict his statement that the Plan of Campaign was still holding its ground. Does the Plan of Campaign still hold its ground? You have been distinctly challenged to-night to say whether you can point out an instance in which the two great powers, the Government and the landlords, have triumphed over the Plan of Campaign. The National League we were told some time ago was a thing of the past, but it is now described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as full of great vigour in every quarter of Ireland. I am told that the right hon. Gentleman used the word "ubiquitous" also. [Mr. Goschen signified his assent.] Well, what has been their success with regard to the great purpose of this Bill? The charge of my right hon. Friend near me was that this Bill was introduced for the purpose of promoting and bringing about the collection of rent in Ireland and for the occupation of derelict farms. These are the two tests of the success of the Bill, and it will not be denied that they were the great objects of the measures. Nothing has been said, nothing has been told us, about the occupation of derelict farms, though something has been told us about the collection of rents. I will not quote the words used by the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion in this House, but I think I do not misrepresent their general effect when I say that in general the landlords of Ireland would be happy to get rents even such as were offered by the Plan of Campaign, but that in most cases rent could not be collected. These are evidences of failure which it seems to me infinitely outweigh the assertions of slow and partial success made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—Now, Sir, I should like to know this: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has challenged the words of this Motion. Does he think that the respect for law has increased among the people of Ireland generally since the enactment of the Crimes Act? Does he think that the estrangement of the people of Ireland, which is so much to be lamented, not from the people of England, but from the system of government enforced upon them—does he think that the estrangement has diminished? He does not seem ready to accept either of these challenges.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St George's, Hanover Square): I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, and would not interrupt him but for his invitation. The statement in the Resolution is that we are undermining a respect for the law which did not exist, and are estranging the affections of the people of Ireland which we did not possess, during the time when the right hon. Gentleman was in Office.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What the right hon. Gentleman has said does not in the slightest degree touch either of my challenges. My question was not whether respect for law existed or did not exist or in what degree, or what estrangement there had been or was not. My challenge was this. I believe now very strongly that the right hon. Gentleman does not believe that respect for law has increased since the passing of the Crimes Act in the minds of the people at large, and that he does not believe that the people at large are less estranged now than before the passing of the Crimes Act.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not wish again to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but he is attributing to me sentiments which I do not entertain. The right hon. Gentleman interprets my silence as assent. I dissent entirely from his statement. I believe there has been increased respect for law, and I believe that we should have begun to diminish the estrangement but for the persistent efforts of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Of all the practices of a Government in difficulties there is none so shabby as throwing upon the Opposition responsibility for the state of public affairs in Ireland. They are in Office; they have the whole powers of the State, and they can do what they please; they have got an arbitrary Act in their power. They have sent to prison all these people; and with all the power in their hands, what is the meaning of saying that the Opposition—not the Liberal Party, but a wing of the Liberal Party—is responsible for the state of things which exists? What I say to the contradiction of the right hon. Gentleman is this. Against his assertion of success I have given him proofs of failure, and so far as the estrangement is concerned—against the increasing estrangement from the injustice of the present system of government we have brought into action another powerful influence in diminishing the estrangement of the affections of the Irish people—within the last two years we have revived in their minds a confidence with which they believe the people of this country will put an end to whatever wrongs they still suffer. What we think is this, that there never was a period when the opposition was so sharply manifested between what is known as Dublin Castle and the people of Ireland. On the one hand, if you look at Ireland you will see the Government and its agents—powerful agencies, powerful political agencies, judicial agencies, and social agencies. On the other side you see the mass of the population, and every organ for the expression of opinion over which the mass of the population have influence, the Representatives of the people in this House, and the representatives of the people—a rather high class of people—in Municipal Corporations, and in almost every elective body, there are returned men from whom rise a unanimous chorus of protestation against the system on which the government is now carried on in Ireland. Nothing has been more striking in this respect than the fact, as we are told, that 19 Members out of the 86 Members who represent the national feeling have been sent to prison since the passing of the Crimes Act. Do you consider how grave that is? There was a time, Sir, in the history of this country when a Bill was introduced limiting the Prerogative of the Crown in making additions to the Peerage. They were to be reduced to a fixed number. On the occasion of that Bill Sir Robert Walpole said that in the history of this country the road to the Temple of Honour had theretofore lain through the Temple of Virtue, but it was now to lie—I believe that was the substance of his statement—through the dark paths of political intrigue. I do not think Sir Robert Walpole foresaw what would be the case of Ireland in 1888 with respect to the Temple of Honour? What in Ireland is now, in the hands of the present Government, the mode of access to the Temple of Honour? We have either reached, or we are coming very near to, a state of things in which, in the estimation of the Irish nation, the road to the Temple of Honour lies through the prison door. Nineteen Members of Parliament have been put into prison within 12 months, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about progress towards the solution of the Irish problem. What does he think has been the effect of those imprisonments on the constituents of those 19 Members? Were you to give us the power of access to our constituencies, every one of those 19 Members, I venture to say, would be returned to this House with greater enthusiasm and larger majorities, because they have been the object of the wrath of the Government that now exists. Now, Sir, in making this Motion, we pay a debt of honour to the Government. I admit that we in this House should make known at least, if we cannot set forth in all particulars, the substance of the accusation we have to make against them, and which we intend to make against them in the country. We deal, Sir, as my right hon. Friend said, as in former years, with the nation, and not merely with the House—we have an appeal which the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues cannot take away from us. To that tribunal we will go, and the verdict of that tribunal we can foresee, and we are satisfied with it, and we rejoice in the sentence which we know it will and cannot but pronounce.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport) said, he wished to point out that although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian did not appear to disapprove of resistance to the law when those who resisted it were the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, he was very wrath with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), because of his declaration that if the right hon. Gentleman's Home Rule Bill had been passed, they in the North of Ireland would certainly resist the law. But there was great difference between the case of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway and the case of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had broken the law; they had committed offences for which they had been, in accordance with the law, brought before the magistrates and tried, and having been tried and convicted, had been sent to prison in accordance with the law, in many cases with an appeal of which they had availed themselves to the County Court Judges, which appeal had ended in every case in the appeal being confirmed. Well, which was the graver fact, that 19 Members of Parliament had been put in prison, because the Government had so willed it in order perhaps to prevent them from breaking the law or because they had broken the law, and that not a law made hundreds of years ago, but made in accordance with the will of the nation only last year? What was the use of the franchise being given to nearly every grown up man in the Kingdom; what was the use of a Dissolution of Parliament, and an appeal to the constituencies; what was the use of the people returning Representatives under the democratic form of Government of the country, if when the will of the country had been thus displayed, and Representatives were returned to represent them for a period of years, if the law made by those Representatives was to be set at defiance by Members of Parliament? Surely, those who made the laws, however much they might disapprove of them, should be the very first to set an example of obedience to them. Was it for a minority who did not like a particular law to say, "We don't like, and, therefore, we will disobey it?" If they took up that attitude, let them, at all events, accept the consequences like men. It was true that the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh had declared that if the Home Rule Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had been passed, he and the North of Ireland would have resisted the law, but how would he have done it? He would have resisted it taking his life in his hands. He would have said that a law had been passed which it was beyond the power of the British Parliament to pass, that British subjects under their own British Parliament should be turned over to the jurisdiction of a Parliament of another kind, and he would have resisted with his sword and his life in his hands, and would have tried as a last resource the right to rebel, and would have taken the consequences. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would not have come down to complain of being compelled to wear frieze clothes—to wear the prison costume—he would have taken the consequences if he was beaten, like a man. If successful, he would be in the position that other successful rebels had been in, he would be no longer a rebel but a patriot, for successful rebellion was not called treason. He (Mr. Gedge) maintained that if the loyal minority in Ireland had been taken from the protection of the Parliament under which they had been born, and handed over to the tender mercies of an Irish Parliament, they would have had every right, being prepared, as he had said, to take the consequences, to try conclusions in the only way left to them by meeting force with force. They would have died in a bold, magnanimous way, and would not have whimpered because they had to bear the penalty of their acts; and if they were to have comparisons of that kind made, at all events let the right hon. Gentleman's clients bear their fate like men and not cry out that because they were Members of Parliament they should not be asked to wear the prison dress and submit to the ordinary prison discipline. What the right hon. Gentleman had said with regard to the frieze coat, he (Mr. Gedge) supposed would apply also to the absence of literature, to the plank bed, and to the prison diet. He did not suppose that a Gentleman who had been delicately brought up and accustomed to choice food was one who would be able to reconcile himself to the rough dietary of the prison—though prison food had been considered better than workhouse food—all these discomforts would be the same in the case of any man, peasant or gentleman, who was confined in gaol. In ordinary cases did a person who happened to be delicately brought up obtain better diet on that account? Not so. The Judge, in all probability, would tell the criminal who had been brought up as a gentleman, that the fact of his occupying such a position ought to have prevented him from falling into crime; and if the food and treatment were more severe upon a man on account of his being a gentleman, obviously it was all the more necessary for such as he to keep outside the prison walls. Sedition pure and simple was a political offence, and men in Ireland as well as in England who were guilty of that offence were treated as political prisoners, and not with the treatment meted out to ordinary criminals; but in the present case, though possibly under the guise of sedition, the ordinary law had been broken, and as a result the act was punished as all such breaches of the ordinary law would be punished so long as the country retained a United Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was very tender and sympathetic indeed on this question of prison clothing, and no doubt if it had suited him he would have been equally sympathising with Mr. Dillon on the question of prison skilly. He had a great deal of sympathy to spare for all those who had been convicted of offences against the Crimes Act, and he had a great deal of sympathy to spare for all tenants who had been evicted. It was to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not more sympathy to spare for those who had been Boycotted in Ireland, and that he had not more sympathy to spare for that large class who could not get the rents that were justly due to them, many of whose tenants had money and were willing to pay, but were not allowed to do so by reason of the tyranny of the Plan of Campaign. In a passage in the Sacred Volume he had found an exact description of the condition of things brought about by such uncharitable methods as those of the Plan of Campaign, and would read the words—

“The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst. The young children ask for bread, and no man bringeth it to them.”

That had taken place over and over again, under the auspices of the National League, through the process which was called Boycotting, but which the right hon. Gentleman was pleased to term exclusive dealing. In the next verse he read—

“They that did feed delicately, were desolate in the streets; they that were brought up in scarlet, embrace dunghills.”

Just in this very way, through the action of the Plan of Campaign, delicate women were rendered destitute and unable to procure those things which were absolutely necessary, not only for comfort, but for mere existence. It had been said that the hon. Member who had been last put in prison was not responsible for the Plan of Campaign, and that the National League had had very little to do with it; but allow him (Mr. Gedge) to read to the House—and he was not going back very far into ancient history—a few words which fell from the hon. Member on the 17th October, 1886, and reported in United Ireland on the 23rd of that month. The hon. Member said—

“Now, what is the policy that the National League lays before you? When we find an estate upon which the people are courageous and determined, we advise them to meet together, each estate by itself, and decide what is a reasonable and fair reduction to make; in some cases, 50 or 60 per cent would be reasonable, in some cases less, in some cases more.”

He (Mr. Gedge) hoped the House would mark that—“More even than 60 per cent!”

“Let the tenants meet together, and decide what it is fair to ask, and if they are refused, there is but one course open to them if they are fighting according to the policy of brave men, that is, to pay a portion of the rent which they have offered to the landlord into the hands of two or three men whom they can trust. That must be done privately, and you must not inform the public where the money is placed. Then every man who is evicted can get an allowance from them so long as he is out, and I believe that if the landlord sees that, he will not go very far. If you mean to fight really, you must put the money aside for two reasons—first, because you want the money to support the men who are first hit; and, secondly, because you want to prohibit traitors going behind your back. There is no way to deal with the traitor except to get his money under lock and key."

A traitor, be it observed, was one who paid his rent against the behest of the Plan of Campaign, which cared nothing whether a man had money in his pocket to pay or not. The hon. Member said—

"There is no way to deal with a traitor except to get his money under lock and key, and if you find he pays his rent, and betrays the organization, what will you do with him? Close upon his money, and use it for the organization."

Yes, close upon his money; but the hon. Gentleman who was now in gaol found that that was not quite sufficient to induce all those farmers who could pay their rent to refuse to do so for the sake of others who were unwilling to pay; and, therefore, on a later occasion, on the 23rd September last year, speaking in the Rotunda in Dublin, Mr. Dillon

"Denounced as a traitor and as a coward any man who stood aside, and declared that he and his children after him would be remembered in the days near at hand when Ireland would be a free nation."

What did the hon. Member mean by those words? How was this man who stood aside to be remembered? Why, said the hon. Member—

"If any man causes a prosecution to fall upon any of the Nationalist leaders, they will follow him to the ends of the earth, so that he will not find a refuge in Australia, America, or South America. If there is a man base enough to do this, I will denounce him from public platforms by name, and I pledge myself to the Government that that man's life will not be a happy one, either in Ireland or across the sea, and I say this with the intention of carrying out what I say."

Yes, any man who honestly paid his rent, because in doing so he had disobeyed the dictates of the National League, was to be held up to execration and treated in such a way that he would be followed to the ends of the earth, in fact, that such a wretch should not be suffered to live, or that, if he lived, he should linger out a wretched miserable life in exile under police protection. The hon. Gentleman who uttered these sentiments was the man on behalf of whom they were asked for sympathy, because he was put in prison for breaking the law, and because his sentence had been confirmed, and because he was subjected to the indignity of wearing frieze clothes. To what sort of indignity would this hon. Member have subjected this "traitor," as he called him, who honestly paid his rent? What was the wearing of frieze clothes in comparison with a man being made unhappy in this—not in the other, because the hon. Member could not reach the next world—but, at any rate, in the new world across the Pacific? He (Mr. Gedge) admitted that on the two former occasions on which the hon. Member was in prison he had not to wear prison clothes; but he should think that a true-hearted free Englishman or Irishman would look upon such a thing as that as mere fringe—what he would care most about would be the deprivation of his liberty—liberty to live outside stone walls, and to take his place in this House, and speak on behalf of his country. These were serious points and consequences and discomforts of which they could conceive a man of mark and magnanimity complaining; but Mr. Dillon had twice suffered those misfortunes at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and yet they knew that the right hon. Gentleman was once intensely fond of Mr. Dillon. He (Mr. Gedge) had desired to fortify his judgment with regard to the present question by reference to precedents, and he had therefore referred to the time, not so very long ago, when Mr. Dillon and the hon. Member for Cork had been put in prison by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. He had looked back last night at a series of speeches the right hon. Gentleman had delivered in Leeds at that time (October, 1881), and he had found therein statements by the right hon. Gentleman that he really thought were worth disinterring, not only for their intrinsic merit, as, of course, everything that the right hon. Gentleman said was valuable, not only for their copiousness and eloquence of language, but on account of their absolute applicability to the present time. On the 7th of October the right hon. Gentleman overwhelmed Mr. Dillon with his praises, not only as an honourable man, but on account of his conduct with regard to the Land Act which had just been passed. The House would be good enough to bear that in mind, because, later on, he (Mr. Gedge) would have to refer to it again. They knew that the Land Act which had just been passed was to work a cure for all Irish grievances, the Act of 1870, which was to have done the same thing, having failed. The Act had not had the fair start which the right hon. Gentleman wished for, because the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had rather set his face against it—the hon. Member did not like it, and, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, was unwilling to give it a fair trial. The hon. Member had at that time stated that he hoped his friends would not make indiscriminate use of the Act, but that they were first to try a few test cases; and he was accused by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian of intending to select test cases in which the rents were so moderate that the Judicial Court would not lower those rents, in order that the result might be that the hon. Member would direct the attention of farmers to this, and say—"We have taken a number of test cases, and we find the reductions so frivolous that it is not worth your while to go under the Act at all." That was the right hon. Gentleman's opinion as to the hon. Member for the City of Cork; but, for some reason or other, he thought Mr. Dillon took an opposite view. While the Act was being passed, Mr. Dillon had been locked up by the right hon. Gentleman. On the 7th of October, speaking at Leeds, the right hon. Gentleman gave Mr. Dillon the highest eulogies; he referred to him as an hon. Member "Who was lately, in the discretion of the Government, confined in prison."

Was not that phrase, "discretion of the Government," touchingly euphemistic? One wondered what Mr. Dillon thought of this discretion. He said—

"He thought Mr. Dillon, alone among his Friends, had not intercepted the beneficent action of the Land Act."

That Act which, according to the right hon. Gentleman, gave the Irish people a splendid opportunity of becoming prosperous and happy. The right hon. Gentleman's statesmanship or his foresight was somewhat at fault, however, because, although he had been in power five years, he had not got Ireland into a state of prosperity, and he had found it necessary to resort to a strong Coercion Act in 1882, and again in 1886, to endeavour to upset everything in Ireland by giving that country a Parliament of its own. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman could only point to his different Acts as monuments of his failures. When his policy had so utterly failed, and his prophecies had proved so false, what right had he to expect to be accepted as a guide in the future? But to return to the right hon. Gentleman's speech at Leeds. After eulogizing Mr. Dillon, he had proceeded to slate the hon. Member for Cork, describing him in very bitter language as one who was not ashamed to preach the doctrine of public plunder. But what had the hon. Member done? The right hon. Gentleman had, under his Land Act, enabled the Land Courts to strike down the rents which had been fixed, a great many of them since the Act of 1870, which had given compensation for disturbance, and the passing of which was to make every tenant answerable for his contracts. What was the line which divided the right hon. Gentleman's plan embodied in his Land Act, from that of the hon. Member for Cork? The only difference between the two policies was that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce rents by some 25 or 30 per cent, while the hon. Member for Cork proposed to reduce them by from 50 to 70 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman believed that it was quite justifiable to reduce them by 25 to 30 per cent, but thought that it was public plunder to reduce them by from 50 to 70 per cent. So strongly did the right hon. Gentleman feel this, that he used these words—

"Mr. Parnell's case I take frankly as exhibiting what I mean when I say the state of things in Ireland is coming to a question between the law on the one hand, and sheer lawlessness on the other."

Having shown Mr. Parnell's disloyalty to the Crown and hatred of England, as contrasted with O'Connell, and having reviled him for—

"Months ago telling the people that they ought to pay no rents they had contracted to pay—that they ought to pay rents only according to Griffith's valuation—in fact, to substitute an arbitrary standard for the standard to which they had themselves individually agreed,"

he said—

"Now Mr. Parnell has a new and enlarged gospel of public plunder to proclaim."

The hon. Member for the City of Cork, the right hon. Gentleman said, held that the landlord was entitled to nothing but the original value of the land before the spade was put into it. The right hon. Gentleman indignantly asked—

"Is it possible to describe proceedings of that kind in any words more just than the propagation of the gospel of sheer plunder?"

But worse was behind; the right hon. Gentleman had said that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was associated with people in America who recommended the use of dynamite, pointing out that the hon. Member himself had called the death at Salford by a dynamite explosion a practical joke. But, worst of all, the hon. Member for the City of Cork had used every effort he possibly could—and this seemed to be the chief offence of the hon. Member in the eyes of the right hon. Gentleman—to disparage, to discredit, and, if he possibly could, to destroy the Land Act, recommending test cases, instead of using the measure. This was the bitterest pill of all for the right hon. Gentleman to swallow, and in revenge he imprisoned Mr. Parnell. But meanwhile, on the 11th October, Mr. Dillon replied to the right hon. Gentleman, repudiating his eulogy, and saying that the right hon. Gentleman knew nothing about him. Mr. Dillon accused the right hon. Gentleman of having locked him up in Kilmainham "for opposing the Land Bill," because the Government did not wish to hear the truth, and so locked him up until the Land Act was safely through. He then denounced the right hon. Gentleman in regard to his action in the Transvaal, and for his dishonest public utterances to the Boers—his "black treachery towards them." Now, what did the right hon. Gentleman do? On the 13th of that month, after a Cabinet meeting, at which, no doubt, the matter was decided, the hon. Member for the City of Cork was arrested, and on the same evening the right hon. Gentleman announced the fact in this form at the Guildhall—

"The Government recognizes that it is charged in Ireland with the most arduous and solemn duties"— and he (Mr. Gedge) trusted the House would take notice of these words, as they exactly represented the position the Government was now in—

"and those duties, to the best of its ability, it is determined to perform. Those are not words alone; our determination has been that they should be carried into acts, and even within the last few moments I have been informed that towards the vindication of law, of order, and the rights of property, of the freedom of the land, of the first elements of political life and civilization, the first step has been taken in the arrest of the man who, unhappily—from motives which I do not challenge, and with which I have nothing to do—has made himself beyond all others prominent in the attempt to destroy the authority of the law, and to substitute what would end in being nothing more nor less than an anarchical oppression exercised upon the people of Ireland."

Yes; the right hon. Gentleman would make the traitors less unhappy. There was this marked difference between the positions of the two Governments. Then, the Opposition supported the Government of the day manfully and loyally in maintaining the law; whereas the Opposition now supported those who were engaged in lawlessness, and Her Majesty's Government were hampered and embarrassed at every point by the action of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends. In the speech at the Guildhall the right hon. Gentleman went on to tell the people of the country what was the crime of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and he said that he had been trying to persuade the people of Ireland not to make a full trial of the Land Act. His words were—

"That with which we are struggling is a power which presumes to go between the people and the law, and which tells them how far, where, how, and on what terms they are to have the benefit of the law."

And for that, he said, he had locked up the hon. Member for the City of Cork—

"We fear," he said, "lest the people should one by one be terrified out of the exercise of their just constitutional rights, and be unhappily induced, through intimidation and no other motive, to make over their private liberty and the exercise of their civil rights into the hands of self-constituted dictators, and to place those rights under the unknown provisions of an unwritten law dictated by nothing but arbitrary will."

Would it be possible to describe the recent action of the hon. Member for East Mayo in more accurate language? But on the 15th of October Mr. Dillon and other Members were arrested for—

"Being reasonably suspected of having been guilty of a crime punishable by law—namely, inciting other persons to intimidate divers persons with a view to compel them to abstain from doing what they had a legal right to do—that was, to pay rents lawfully due by them."

Not only was the hon. Member for the City of Cork put into prison because he tried to persuade the people not to take advantage of the Land Act, but the hon. Member for East Mayo, whom the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to praise when he believed he would give his aid in working the Act, was sent to prison because he rejected the eulogy of the right hon. Gentleman. At that time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and hon. Members below the Gangway had not formed themselves into that Mutual Admiration Society with which people were now so amused. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was accused by hon. Gentlemen opposite with having locked up Mr. Dillon for political motives; but in the Spring of 1881 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian locked him up without any trial at all, for, as he said, opposing the Land Act; and in October he locked him up again because he would not submit to the praises of the right hon. Gentleman, and he imprisoned the hon. Member for Cork because he had tried to induce the people of Ireland to test the Land Act. He would ask the House which was better, and which was worse—to lock up a man without trial on so-called suspicion, to lock him up avowedly because he took his own course in advising the people of Ireland not to exercise a legal right, or to lock up a man under a formal process of law, because, as in the case of Mr. Dillon, he had incited the people to disobey the law? Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had now formed themselves into a Mutual Admiration Society, and eulogy had replaced the vituperation with which the right hon. Gentleman used to refer to hon. Gentlemen from Ireland below the Gangway. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman attempted to justify his present attitude towards these men by asserting that their objects and methods were changed; but he (Mr. Gedge) found that on the 23rd of August last, Mr. Dillon, speaking at the Rotunda in Dublin, said they would go on their path showing no change in their attitude or policy; and he added—

"I say it deliberately, that we shall be less scrupulous in this—that whereas in the past we urged the tenantry to demand less than what was their just rights, I now tell them to double their demands."

This was the extent of the change—the land was to be brought down to prairie value. The men who taught these doctrines were no longer held up to blame; they were praised up to the skies, and spoken of as men who ought not to be put in prison, and who, if they were to be put in prison, should, at least, be permitted to wear their own trousers. The change was in right hon. Gentlemen opposite, not in the Irish Members, not in the Government and their supporters. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite said that those were unregenerate days, and somewhat irreverently explained the change that had taken place by saying that they had "found salvation." He would be slow to charge those who had accepted the Gospel of Christ with any of their words or acts in their unregenerate days. But what was the gospel which those right hon. Gentlemen had embraced? Was it the gospel of peace? No. It was the gospel of plunder, and upon a conversion of that kind he did not think it was incumbent upon them to offer the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends congratulation. One would expect from a recent convert a little humility—a sincere convert would, at any rate, have that virtue; but right hon. Gentlemen opposite would not put on sackcloth and ashes as they ought to do for their past sins. On the contrary, they said that when they did these things in the past they were in the right; but that when the present Government did the same things, they were deserving of the censure of every honest man. Last year the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian twice addressed meetings in London on this subject, and on the 19th of April, 1887, he said that—

"Neither then, nor at any time, had he given utterance to the sentiment, nor had he entertained the suspicion, that the followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork were associated with crime."

And at Dr. Parker's house, on the 11th of May in the same year, addressing an admiring crowd of Nonconformist ministers, he said—

"He believed that their intention was dangerous and their plea questionable; that they had a tendency to the production of crime; but that that was a totally different thing from complicity with crime."

The natural question was, how came it about that the right hon. Gentleman had imprisoned several of these Gentlemen whom, it now appeared, he did not believe to be associated with crime? In 1881, on introducing the Protection of Person and Property Act, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"No one can be arrested except on reasonable suspicion that he has been a principal or an accessory to some crime punishable by law."

It appeared, by the official Return made to the House on the 7th March, 1882, that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was imprisoned on reasonable suspicion of having been guilty as principal of a crime punishable by law—namely, of treasonable practices. Did not the right hon. Gentleman consider treason a crime? But he said more than this; he declared in this House in February, 1882, that, when the Government imprisoned Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and their Colleagues, they had acted not upon suspicion, but upon proof of their criminality. How could the right hon. Gentleman reconcile that with the statement that he never believed the Leaders of the League to have been associated with crime? He (Mr. Gedge) would not, like his right hon. Friend below the Gangway (Mr. Chaplin), call down on himself the wrath of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian by pleading as an excuse for these mutually contradictory statements that his memory was failing; he preferred to leave the right hon. Gentleman in the dilemma, and he might extricate himself from it as best he could. But when hon. Members on the Government side asked, in view of these precedents, why Her Majesty's Government should be open to censure because they had prosecuted Members of Parliament for crime, and because imprisonment had followed their conviction, they were met with the charge that they had been false to their pledges. A charge of that kind might assuredly be repelled in the strongest language they could command; and, therefore, he said it was absolutely false; neither he (Mr. Gedge) himself, nor any of the many Unionist candidates whose election addresses had come under his notice, had pledged himself against what was called wrongly coercion for Ireland. He had endeavoured to show that, whatever might be the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, it did not lie in the mouths of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to abuse them for having done their best to maintain the law in Ireland; he had endeavoured to show that the condition of things in Ireland with which the Government had to deal was accurately described by the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1891 and 1892, and that the Government had recourse to arrest not on simple suspicion, but on process of law, and that the law alone had been carried out. When he listened to the carefully prepared statement read by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne attacking the Government, and saw how poor a case he made out, when he found that they were to be relegated to an appeal to the country for a ratification or otherwise of their acts, and when he remembered the just and Constitutional nature of those acts, he felt that, whatever might be said, the Government were secure. Did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne know so little of the Constitution of the country, and the essential elements of freedom in all countries, as not to know that when once a Government had directed a prosecution its functions with regard to the case were determined? That was the case, however, and God forbid that the time should ever come when the Government of this country should interfere with the process of the law! It only remained to him now to thank the House for their attention to the reasons he had given for voting with the fullest confidence against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, that he noticed that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) put his Motion on the Paper, the supporters of the Government, in the Press and elsewhere, congratulated themselves that now an opportunity had been given of showing the majority supporting the Government. He was not one of those who attached very great importance to the state of the figures in the Division which was about to take place; that Division was only one of a series of incidents in the great struggle in which they were involved, and, whatever the decision might be that night, they would have to appeal elsewhere hereafter. Now, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) had placed the Motion on the Paper, because, although he was not fortunate enough to see any hon. or right hon. Members on the Treasury Bench, it was in that House that they were bound to bring their accusations against the Government with respect to the policy they were pursuing in Ireland. Although they might, and must, and should state on public platforms outside the feelings they entertained in the matter, still it was there, face to face with their antagonists, face to face with the Government and its supporters, that they were bound to make their accusations, and bring forward their proofs in support of their accusations. Now, anyone who took part in this debate, occupying, as he did, the humble position of an independent Member of the Opposition, was bound to be pretty definite, and to compress within reasonable limits any remarks he might have to make. He should endeavour to be brief; but, before he proceeded to cite cases of remarkable inaccuracy on the part of the Chief Secretary, and to give one or two illustrations of the manner in which these so-called Courts of Justice were conducted, he wished to refer to something which fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night. He regretted that he had to do that in the right hon. Gentleman's absence, and in the absence of any Member of the Government. In his opinion, it was a matter of some reproach to the Government, at the time of a grave and great debate like that, that they should have absolutely no Representative present in the House. [THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. Plunket) at that moment entered the House.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), in his speech last night, in the sepulchral tones which had been commented on by the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), read an extract from the speech of Mr. Dillon delivered at Tullyallen. It was suggested to the right hon. Gentleman by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North-East Cork that he should read on—that he should read the context; but the right hon. Gentleman did not comply with that request. Now, he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) was going to supply the omission, and he ventured to say that after those hon. Members who did him the honour to listen to him had heard the words, they would think that they put a somewhat different complexion on the speech of Mr. Dillon from that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had endeavoured to convey to the House. In that speech, for uttering which Mr. Dillon now lies in Dundalk Gaol, he used this language—

“What has been the curse of Ireland in the past, when time after time again the Leaders of the people have endeavoured to lead the poor tenantry of Ireland out of the land of bondage and the land of Egypt, even as Moses tried to lead the Israelites out of bondage in the past? What has been the curse of every previous movement? It has been the traitor, the man who, in the thickest of the fight, would turn his back upon his comrades, and basely betray the cause which he was pledged by every principle of honour to sustain. Looking back upon the history of our country, I come to the conclusion that if we could not place before our people some policy by which the traitor would be prevented breaking up our combinations, we could never hope to win our cause, and to do that which was also a dear policy to my heart.”

The following were the words he particularly desired to draw the attention of the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket), who was the only Member of the Government present—namely:—

“Warn the Irish people from the methods they used to adopt towards traitors. What used they to do to traitors in the old times? They used to shoot them. I want to turn our people aside from that course; it is a course natural to desperate men. It is an idea which naturally occurs to men when they see they are betrayed; but it is a course which will not lead to victory, and I want to place before the people of Ireland a Christian and moderate plan by which they could put down this system of rack-renting and treachery to which the people of Ireland have been so long subjected, and emancipate this beautiful country from the rule of the cruellest, and most detestable, and most ruinous tyranny which ever brooded over any nation in the history of the world.”

He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) thought it was hardly fair of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pick out from what he had just quoted what Mr. Dillon said in regard to a “traitor.” He maintained—and he should be unworthy of the honour of being called a friend of Mr. Dillon if he did not in that House raise his humble tribute to Mr. Dillon in this matter—he maintained that he had never come across a man in the House or out of the House who endeavoured more fully and more urgently to win the people away from the bad courses to which their history had addicted them than did Mr. Dillon. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) wished to refer for one moment to the speech which was made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). The hon. Member observed—though his statement was immediately challenged by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy)—that the Government had only appointed three of the present Resident Magistrates in Ireland. The Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) or the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)—he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) forgot which—in his place that afternoon, in reply to a Question, admitted that 10 Resident Magistrates had been appointed by the present Government. If many of the statements which the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) laid before the House last night in respect to the Massereene estate were as incorrect as his statement in respect to Resident Magistrates, the value of his speech must be judged by that circumstance. He wished to very warmly and earnestly support the protest which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), founded, as it was, upon the right hon. Gentleman's vast experience of Business in that House during the last 50 years, against the way in which they had been treated by Her Majesty's Government in the matter of information not only in regard to this debate, but in regard to other discussions which had taken place respecting their conduct of the government of Ireland. There had been an absolute and entire lack of official information laid before them in time to be of any use in this debate, and in such a manner that one could easily analyze it and understand it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) quoted last night some figures respecting Boycotting. Surely it was one of the very first principles of fair play that when they had any controversy upon any subject the evidence should be in the hands of both Parties. It was surely disrespectful to the House that the figures with respect to Boycotting had not been laid before the House in such a form and at a time when hon. Members could analyze them, and make themselves masters of them. From the time the Government placed the Boycotting Return on the Table till now, they had persistently and consistently refused to give hon. Members the slightest means of testing their accuracy, and he maintained that the figures given in that Return were absolutely and entirely worthless for any purposes of discussion. The other night it was shown that a certain policeman, knowing that a barn had been burned down by accident, entered it in the Return as an outrage; because, as he said in his evidence in Court, there was no place in which he could enter it, except under the heading "outrage." No explanation of that was given by the Chief Secretary, except that, of course, now that the matter had come to be examined and sifted, and attention had been drawn to it in Parliament, care would be taken that the entry should be expunged and the Return made accurate. Then, as to the Return of increased sentences, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary went down to Battersea on the 17th of May, which was the day the Return was laid before the House, and used the Return in a most highly argumentative speech. From that day up to the 8th of June that Return was inaccessible to any Member of the House of Commons; no Member could ascertain for three weeks whether the Chief Secretary had used the Return when he made his speech. They only got the key of the Return on the 20th of June, and it turned out after all that there was not a single case of the 14 cases of increased sentences which came under the Crimes Act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The Chief Secretary, however, in his speech led everyone to suppose that he had found 14 cases during the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in which the same thing had been done of which they had been complaining during this year—namely, increase of sentences under the Crimes Act. He would not dwell at length upon the most curious and most singular course which had been pursued by this Administration in reference to the judgment in the Killeagh case, when words had fallen from the highest authority in the House—from Mr. Speaker in the Chair—intimating that when a Cabinet Minister had quoted from a document, he was bound, under certain circumstances, to lay that document on the Table. The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) got up in his place, and in response to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) said the Government must wait and see the Motion of the right hon. Member, and then they would decide what should be done. Only one inference could possibly be drawn from the extraordinary reluctance of the Government to give information to the House. The Government were afraid to let the House and the country know the facts with respect to their government of Ireland. Not only were the Government reluctant to let hon. Members know things, but the want of knowledge on the part of the Chief Secretary in respect to what was passing in Ireland was most extraordinary. The Member for North Manchester (Mr. Schwann) put a Question the other night which merely arose out of what he saw and heard at Dundalk last Wednesday. The hon. Member asked whether any instructions had recently been given to the Constabulary in Ireland with respect to interfering with assemblies after trials had taken place in a town. The Chief Secretary actually pleaded, as he often pleaded in answer to hon. Members, although the Question had been on the Paper the whole of the day, that he was unable to answer it, and he asked the hon. Member to defer his Question till another day. Surely the right of assembly was an important, an ancient, and Constitutional right; and if any instructions had been given to the Constabulary with respect to this matter during the last six months, as by the confession of the Chief Secretary they had, they ought to have been known to the right Gentleman—he ought to have been able to tell the House either that such instructions had been given or that they had not. The testimony was universal, and absolutely uncontradicted, that during the last six months the Constabulary had acted in regard to assemblages of persons in towns and in rural districts after trials in a manner which was perfectly unprecedented. Now he turned to a few illustrations of the inaccuracy which characterized the answers of the Chief Secretary in that House, to the remarkable subterfuges and evasions which had become with the right hon. Gentleman almost a fine art. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) asked a Question on the 19th of April with respect to a certain District Inspector Shannon, at Ennis. He asked, in a case tried at Ennis on the 13th of April, arising out of the proceedings at Ennis on the 8th of April, when Mr. Shannon was instructing District Inspector Hill, who was conducting the prosecution for the Government, whether that gentleman was the private secretary of Colonel Turner, who was in command of the police and military on the 8th of April; whether during the proceedings a large body of soldiers were marched into Court with their rifles on their shoulder, and placed in one of the galleries; and what was the object of this military demonstration in a Court of Justice? The reply of the Chief Secretary was—

“District Inspector Shannon was not instructing District Inspector Hill, though he was undoubtedly giving him assistance. District Inspector Shannon is not Colonel Turner’s private secretary. There was no military demonstration in Court; but some soldiers were placed in one of the galleries, in order to prevent a repetition of such disgraceful scenes of disorder as had on previous occasions occurred in the courthouse.”—(3 Hansard, [324] 1712.)

The hon. Member for West Kerry (Mr. Edward Harrington) asked—

“What is Mr. Shannon’s exact position?”

The right hon. Gentleman replied—

“I will not be sure, but I believe his title is Special Crimes Officer.”

The hon. Member for West Kerry then said—

“Then he is under Colonel Turner?”

And the Chief Secretary answered, “naturally.” He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) cared not whether this man was the private secretary to Colonel Turner, or crimes officer under Colonel Turner. He cared not whether there was a military demonstration in Court, or whether the soldiers were placed in the gallery. He imagined, however, that when Oliver Cromwell came to that House and that historical scene took place there was a military demonstration. He imagined that if they saw a company of Her Majesty's soldiers in the galleries of that House they would call it a military demonstration. He would not quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman as to the use of the term; but he maintained that when soldiers filled the galleries of a Court of Justice, as they did at Ennis, it was a military demonstration—[Mr. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): With rifles in their hands.]—A most remarkable thing took place in Court. A report said—

"At this point a large body of the Derbyshire Infantry were marched into the Court with their rifles on shoulder, and occupied the gallery. Mr. Harrington said he did not know what the meaning of this military demonstration was for. There was a tradition of such a thing having been done in the days of John Philpott Curran. It was a monstrous thing that such a demonstration should take place, and he protested against it. Captain Keogh: The Court is in the hands of the Sheriff. Mr. Harrington: Oh, no, your worship; you have the full charge of your Court, and I must saddle you with the responsibility of their being here.—Captain Keogh: We are merely here in a judicial capacity, and we know nothing about the arrangements which are made by the Executive Authorities, and we will not interfere."

That was precisely what Colonel Carew said; he used language which he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) quoted in the House on the 15th of February, and which had never been contradicted. Colonel Carew said—

"I have received orders from the Government which I am not at liberty to disregard."

He now went to another case, a case which occurred at Wexford in October. It was a case which at the present day could only be found in Ireland. Mr. Healy said—

"Before this case commences I wish to ask is this an open Court? Mr. M'Leod: I think so.—Mr. Healy: I asked a policeman outside, and he said the Court was full. I observed that the galleries are perfectly empty, and I wish to ask why the people are kept out?—Mr. M'Leod: The Court is fairly constituted, and is an open Court. Mr. Healy: Then why are the people kept out?—Mr. M'Leod: I don't know anything about that. Mr. Healy: Is it by the order of the Court?—Mr. M'Leod: We have no specific order. Mr. Healy: I wish to ask is it by the order of the Court the public are kept out?—Mr. M'Leod: I gave no order at all."

There they had a presiding magistrate who did not regard himself as in full charge of his Court; he was under orders; he sat there in alliance with and under the orders of the Executive Government. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) asked a Question a little later with respect to a certain Colonel Tynte, Resident Magistrate. He asked whether it was not a fact that he had actually tried and sentenced three men in their absence, the men being kept out of Court by the police? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made a long explanation which would be found duly reported in Hansard. The Chief Secretary admitted that Colonel Tynte did try the men and give his decision in their absence. The men were kept out of the Court by the police. It was true the right hon. Gentleman explained that when the magistrate came to understand the matter he tried them over again. If, however, it had not been for the interposition of the counsel at the moment, they might not, and probably would not, have been tried over again. Then he came to a most extraordinary statement which the right hon. Gentleman made at Stalybridge, and it bore on the question of the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman, which was the point on which he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) was addressing the House at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman said at Stalybridge on the 24th of March that there had been no interference whatever with the freedom of the Press. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) would not say that that was not literally true; but he maintained that with men of ordinary minds, and with people of ordinary common sense, the fact of the imprisonment of Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Alderman Hooper, Mr. Edward Harrington, Mr. Edward Walsh, and Mr. T. Harrington would be taken as evidence that the freedom of the Press had been interfered with during the right hon. Gentleman's administration. Then, at Battersea, the right hon. Gentleman said that no lads and poor men had been imprisoned for selling copies of Irish newspapers. The hon. Member for North Cork (Mr. Flynn) brought forward cases which the right hon. Gentleman was unable to contradict. The hon. Gentleman brought forward half-a-dozen cases in the City of Cork alone during a period of something like three months, in which poor men and lads were put in prison for selling newspapers.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I contradicted them all categorically.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS said, he listened to the right hon. Gentleman's answer with great respect, as he did to all his answers. The right hon. Gentleman said the men and boys were put in prison for a different offence altogether—namely, creating an obstruction in the streets. If a man selling The Globe outside Palace Yard was imprisoned, no one would say he was punished for creating an obstruction, but for selling a newspaper in the streets. Again, he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) asked the Chief Secretary on the 31st of May—

"Whether, immediately preceding the visit of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) to Newtownards at the end of April, the District Inspector and Head Constable of police visited the proprietress of the Ulster Hotel, and urged her not to let the hall on her premises (in which the farmers of the district usually hold their meetings) for any meeting at which the hon. Member was to be present, and whether, on the meeting of the farmers of the district addressed by the hon. Member being held elsewhere, constables were posted at the entrance to the room, and what was the object of this proceeding?"—(3 Hansard [336] 746-7.)

There were three statements in the question, that the District Inspector visited the proprietress of the hotel, that he urged her not to let the hall, and that constables were posted outside another hall where the meeting was eventually held. The right hon. Gentleman, on the authority of the District Inspector, replied that the District Inspector at Newtownards answered all the paragraphs of the Question in the negative. Another Question was asked on the 7th of June by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) on behalf of the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McCartan) in regard to the very same circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman then admitted that the District Inspector did call upon the proprietress of the hotel, but denied that the District Inspector urged her not to let the hall, a point about which he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) had very considerable doubt. The right hon. Gentleman admitted also that constables were placed outside the other hall—that was to say, that on the 7th of June the right hon. Gentleman was forced to admit two out of three of the statements he had categorically denied on the 31st of May. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissenting.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but shaking of the head would not dispose of the matter. Then the right hon. Gentleman was asked on April 19 a Question with respect to certain depositions, and he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) alluded to this, because it threw a most important light on the manner in which evidence was got up in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman was asked if his attention had been called to a report in The Freeman's Journal of the 18th of April—

"In which it was stated that constable Watson was handed a deposition, dated 9th April, which he stated that he had signed, and owing to which three men were charged with stone throwing, and, whether he has noticed the following question and answer of the witness:—Mr. Harrington: I have only one question to ask you. In the deposition did you say one word about stones being thrown from buildings?—No, I did not."—(3 Hansard, [334] 1784-5.)

The Chief Secretary replied—

"The Question was only put down last night, and I have been, therefore, unable to receive a reply from Ireland to my communication; but I may say that the report in The Freeman's Journal, as to what has been passing in the Court House at Ennis, is in no way to be depended upon."—(Ibid.)

Why did the right hon. Gentleman go out of his way to try to discredit one of the ablest-conducted papers in Ireland? The Irish Times—the ardent supporters of the Government—of the same day contained this paragraph—

"Constable Watson was recalled, and stated, in reply to Mr. Harrington, that he had made a deposition in prosecuting a man for stone throwing on the Sunday in question, but in it he had said nothing about stones coming from the houses."

That threw a lurid light on the way in which depositions were got up in Ireland. He would not say anything about Mitchelstown—that had been pretty well dealt with. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary might be sure that they would for long, and the English people would for long also, remember Mitchelstown. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Summers), made use of an expression with regard to certain proceedings which was most unwarrantable for a man in his high position. He withdrew the word "corrupt." He said—

"I am not sure that I used that word. I never intended to convey what that word usually means when I applied it to a tribunal—namely, that it had been bribed, or had sold the course of justice for a consideration. What I ought to have said was that the tribunal was incompetent and worthless."

The proceedings were only quashed by the Superior Court on technical grounds. The right hon. Gentleman had given his account of the proceedings; let hon. Members have copies of the depositions, which, as the Coroner remarked, were in the Crown Office. He now went on to give one or two illustrations of the proceedings in Courts in Ireland. There was a certain Resident Magistrate of the name of Meldon, a man whom he had dealt with before. Mr. Meldon adjudicated in a case at a place called Mullinahone on the 18th of May. The solicitor for the defendant asked—

“What were the instructions you got?—I refuse to answer. Mr. Bolton said that he did not object to the question being answered. Witness said that he would give the information, but he would not give the name of the person who gave the instructions. They were given by a superior officer in Waterford. Mr. Meldon said that this was wholly irrelevant, and he would not allow the question. The man should not give the instructions of his superior officer. Mr. Redmond argued that it was for the witness to claim the privilege, and not the Bench. The only form the Bench had was to tell the man that he could claim privilege.—Mr. Meldon (to the Petty Sessions clerk): We have heard enough of this. Read over the depositions. Mr. Redmond: I must say that this is a very summary way of disposing of the question.—Mr. Meldon: Well, we won't have any more of it.—Mr. Redmond: The highest Court in the Realm would not dispose of a question like that.”

He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) contended that that was not the manner in which a Court of Justice should be conducted. He would only say, in conclusion, a very few words with respect to the case which was tried at Dundalk on Wednesday last—he felt bound, as a friend of Mr. Dillon's, to advert to it. He wished it were possible—he wished he had it in his power to bring before the mind of every hon. Member of the House a picture of what took place on that occasion. The Bench was filled on that occasion with men who were all landlords, or friends more or less of the governing landlord class in Ireland. The police were in charge of a man whose name was a bye-word down in County Kerry, a man named Supples, a man whose record as a landlord was one of the most infamous in Ireland. The Judge, Judge Kisbey, was a man who had been appointed recently by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and was a more or less violent political partizan. The observations the Judge made at the end of the proceedings struck him very forcibly indeed. Mr. Dillon asked that the first case should be decided. The Judge remarked—

“If you had counsel to represent you, you would probably have acceded to the suggestion that we should try both, and give sentence after; but as you have not counsel I will do as you suggest. Give me a copy of the speech, and I will be back in a few minutes.”

He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) had no hesitation in saying, in view of the demeanour of the Judge, that Judge Kisbey had made up his mind about the case before entering the Court. At Question time that day the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Rowntree) made the statement, and it was unchallenged, that the policemen came down the street on that occasion, and with their rifles hit their hardest people who were doing no harm at all. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) saw such a scene on that occasion which he should never forget. One of the most honourable of men was driven away to Dundalk Gaol, accompanied by a troop of Cavalry, and never were the Queen's uniforms seen to less advantage than on that occasion. The effect on his mind was to make him determine to work still harder, if possible, to overthrow the system which now obtained in Ireland. They cared comparatively little respecting the figures of the Division that night. They would go on undeterred by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They believed that their cause was founded, as the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), in his most eloquent language said, upon the reconciliation of the two people. There was nothing the Government brought forward, there was no speech made on that side, or on this side by supporters of the Government, but what was tainted by bitter and by-gone hatred. He and his hon. Friends were sure that, by persevering steadily and unwaveringly in laying the facts before the people of the country, they were doing all they could to bring about a certain and not distant victory.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR): Sir, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. J. E. ELLIS) will, I am sure, attribute it to no discourtesy on my part if I do not occupy any of the comparatively small share of the debate which belongs to me—[A laugh.—small, I mean, as compared with the task I have to perform—in dealing with the observations that he has just laid before the House. He must be aware that I am the Minister chiefly arraigned by the Motion before the House, and as this is the second day of a debate which has been fruitful in remarkable speeches, it is impossible for me to deal with every point which has been raised in the course of this discussion; and I must consider myself fortunate if I can adequately meet the main points of the attack made against me and against the Government of which I am a Member. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—who, I am sorry to observe, has not yet returned to his place, but whose absence does not justify me in indefinitely deferring my observations—told us towards the end of his speech that this Motion was a debt of honour to the Government. He told us that the Opposition owed it to the Government to raise in this House the controversies which they had been raising out-of-doors, and to repeat it in the place where they could be answered face to face, accusations which they had not hesitated to make before their countrymen in different parts of the Kingdom. But I observed that the right hon. Gentleman abstained from repeating the numerous inaccurate statements on which he has chiefly relied when he has been talking to popular audiences. I noticed a very different tone and a much diminished recklessness of expression in the speech that he made to-night, as compared, for example, with the speech that he made to the Nonconformist ministers, with the speech which he made at Nottingham, with his speech at Dover, and with various other speeches that he has from time to time made to his supporters throughout the country. But if the right hon. Gentleman has been more accurate, I do not think that he has been more convincing. He has been driven from the broad errors of statement which he has made in the country to a minute legal examination of one particular decision of one particular pair of Resident Magistrates, on which he appears to rely for the whole of his indictment against the Government. Well, Sir, I shall return in a few minutes to that examination of the judgment of those two Resident Magistrates; I shall examine how far his allegations with regard to it are correct. I merely wish now to point out the remarkable change in the method of attack adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman, before he came to the main part of his speech, dealt with two or three subsidiary matters, on which I feel it my duty to offer a few words of comment. The first relates to the allegations made by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the action of one of the most distinguished officers in the service of the Government—Colonel Turner—in connection with the suppressed meeting at Ennis. I understood the right hon. Gentleman's speech to be an apology to Colonel Turner. I do not know whether I misunderstood him; but I certainly understood that what he said was to be taken as an admission that he had originally made an erroneous statement in this House and in the country, and that he was glad, even at a late hour, to make some apology for what he had said. I think, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has very imperfectly conveyed to the House the full extent of the error of which he was guilty. The right hon. Gentleman accused Colonel Turner of having ordered a charge of Cavalry into a yard crowded with persons. That statement was originally made on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House; and that Motion for the Adjournment of the House was itself made without Notice to the Government. We then gave the House all the information that we had; and I believe that, from the statement we then made, it might have been clear to the right hon. Gentleman that no charge of Cavalry had been ordered. If hon. Members read the report in Hansard, they will see that my statement is borne out. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman thought he might make some capital out of his statement, and therefore when he addressed the Nonconformist ministers he repeated it with emphasis. His statement was contradicted upon oath by Colonel Turner at the trial. The trial, as a matter of public notoriety, was reported in all the newspapers. I took, or rather I may say I made, an early opportunity of contradicting it in a speech which I delivered at Battersea, in which I traversed on official authority the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I gave to it the most emphatic and categorical denial. The right hon. Gentleman, I presume, did me the honour of reading my speech, as he referred subsequently to it. Nevertheless, although he had seen or might have seen Colonel Turner's contradiction at the trial, although he had seen my official contradiction at Battersea, the right hon. Gentleman declared subsequently at Hawarden that every statement he had made in his speech to the Nonconformist ministers was a statement to which he adhered. I ask what is the use of coming down to the House and making the kind of apology which he has made, buried and lost in the huge speech that he delivered this night, after having deliberately shut his eyes to my official contradiction—of what use is it to come down here and say that he admires Colonel Turner, that Colonel Turner is an estimable officer, that Colonel Turner is a man whose word is to be trusted, when this man, whose word he now says is to be trusted on oath, when given in a Court of law, the right hon. Gentleman not only did not trust but absolutely contradicted at Hawarden? That is a small matter, but it is a striking illustration of the method of right hon. Gentlemen on the Benches opposite when they have to deal with the character and action of officers of their Sovereign, who are only endeavouring, under unexampled difficulties, to enforce the law of this Kingdom in Ireland, and, as such, I think it is not undeserving of the notice which I have taken of it. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to complain bitterly of the withholding of information by the Government from the House. He told us we had prevented the House from exercising its proper function of supervising the action of the Executive in Ireland by declining to lay before it information asked for. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby says "Hear, hear!" Well, the right hon. Gentleman was a leading Member of an Administration which was equally called in question by the Representatives of the Irish people. Did the right hon. Gentleman, and the right hon. Gentleman's Government, lay on the Table of the House more information or less than the present Government? They had a similar Act to administer. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No.]

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Well, I admit it was a more violent one. They had similar difficulties to contend with, and they had not similar but identical criticisms passed upon them by hon. Members on the Benches below the Gangway for precisely similar conduct. In these circumstances, then, I presume they would have laid on the Table the information they now think ought to be laid; and yet we are laying, and have laid, incomparably more information before the House than was ever laid before it by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends. There has never been a Government in this country which has more taken Parliament into its confidence with regard to the administration of the law in Ireland than has the present Government of Her Majesty. And here let me notice how very difficult it is to please hon. Gentlemen opposite. Sometimes they say we do not give them information enough, and they apply for more. For example, they applied through the mouth of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) for statistics with regard to Boycotting. Well, at his request, and in obedience to it, we laid those statistics of Boycotting before the House.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I asked for information as to the statistics of five counties, and you would not give it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member will see that that would have had made absolutely no difference. The hon. Member asked us to give the House information with regard to Boycotting. We did our best to give that information, and what is the gratitude with which it was received? The right hon. Gentleman gets up and tells us that he has looked at our statistics and that he thinks that they are totally untrustworthy, and does not give us the slightest thanks for what we have done. If that is the way in which the Government are met when they do attempt to give information with regard to the condition of Ireland to the House of a kind never given before by our Predecessors, what is the use of attempting to give it? I say that the information with regard to Boycotting is more accurate and more trustworthy than any conceivable statistics that could be prepared with regard to derelict farms, and yet the right hon. Gentleman rejects those statistics, and implores us to give him information with regard to derelict farms. But that is not all. When we do give these statistics, how does he treat us? When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) called for a very elaborate and difficult Return with regard to the action of the Crimes Act—a Return which Lord Spencer never thought of giving, or the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) himself when he was Prime Minister administering the Crimes Act—we had not the slightest objection to lay it on the Table of the House. We made every effort to prepare that Return in time; the printers were kept at work the whole of Saturday and Sunday, and we gave copies to Gentlemen on the Front Bench, and we provided copies for those whom we might suppose would distribute them among important speakers who might have to address the House, and the only gratitude we get from the right hon. Gentleman opposite is to be told that we have been either too stupid or too idle to prepare the Return; in a form that would be of any use to the House. This was not our Return, it was not of our devising; we did not contrive it; nor did we suppose that it would be of any special use to the House; it was the contrivance of right hon. Gentlemen on that Bench. They put a Motion down on the Table of the House, asking for certain particulars. Every single particular they asked for we have given them, and because a Return prepared after their own liking does not suit them, they say we have been too stupid or too idle to prepare it in an intelligible shape. But that is not the first time that this event has happened. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Cockermouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) asked for a Return about increased sentences. We gave the Return in the shape in which he asked for it, giving precisely the particulars he demanded, and immediately hon. Members on that side of the House, and the whole Liberal Press said that we had been suppressing certain details which, if given, would have put an entirely different complexion on the matter. I thought the complaint was unreasonable; but I gave way, and, having found that hon. Members opposite were not to be trusted to devise their own Return, I devised it for them; and the result is that, after these new particulars have been given, their case is a great deal worse than before. Now, I am prepared to do a great deal—almost anything—for hon. Members opposite; but if—to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—they are too stupid or too idle to prepare the form of their own Return in an intelligible shape, I do not think it is my function to provide them either with industry or with intelligence. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to discuss Section 1 of the Crimes Act, which, as the House is aware, deals with secret inquiries in Ireland, and he attacked the Government for having drafted their clause so stupidly last year—stupidity occupied a large portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech—that an enormous waste of time had been incurred in considering and amending that clause. Well, I daresay it was a bad clause, because we may have taken a bad model. The clause, as brought into the House, was a copy of the clause in the right hon. Gentleman's own Bill. I thought—perhaps I had too great an idea of the intelligence of the Radical Party—that that clause was not a bad clause, and as such we adopted it in our Bill. "But," says the right hon. Gentleman, "nobody objects to that clause." His phrase was—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say that; what I said was that the principle of the clause—that of secret inquiry—was not made the subject of serious debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me; but I imagine that what he said was that the principle of the clause was one which was generally accepted. That is my recollection. But, perhaps, he has not followed the recent course of Irish politics. If he has, he must know that the operation of this clause has had the effect of detecting and punishing those who have committed two horrible murders which otherwise would never have been detected. Nevertheless, the whole Irish Party—a very important section of the right hon. Gentleman's following—objected in the strongest manner to this principle of the clause, never describing it in Ireland otherwise than as the Star Chamber Clause. ["Hear, hear!"] I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the notes of assent which come from below the Gangway. The clause as it stands in our Bill is incomparably milder than the clause in the Act of 1842, which was one which the right hon. Gentleman said ought to be made a permanent part of the law of the land; and yet this clause, watered down as it is, and generally accepted, according to the right hon. Gentleman himself, is opposed by the whole strength of hon. Members below the Gangway, who are doing their best to prevent any man, be he who he may, from aiding in the discovery of criminals in Ireland by giving evidence under the section. Now, Sir, I pass to a more important matter. The right hon. Gentleman tells us we have been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty in proclaiming the county of Louth after Mr. Dillon had made his speech, and under that Proclamation in prosecuting Mr. Dillon. I listened with the utmost attention to the argument he put before the House; but I confess I utterly failed to understand its force.

An hon. MEMBER: You are stupid.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It may possibly be.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman appears to take this view—that when Mr. Dillon made his speech Louth was not proclaimed under a certain section of the Act; any offence, therefore, which he committed would not in ordinary course be tried before a Crimes Court, and it was acting very unfairly to Mr. Dillon, after he had made his speech, to take any action by which he would be tried by a Court which he would not have expected to be tried by under ordinary circumstances. Well, Sir, all I can say is, that if I were, as I have been represented as being, the bitter political opponent of Mr. Dillon, I never would have used an argument like that. It implies that Mr. Dillon was perfectly prepared to violate the law so long as he knew that he would be tried before a jury, on which there were enormous odds that he would find one man, at all events, who would refuse to assent to a verdict of guilty; but that he would not have made that speech, and would not have committed that offence, had he known beforehand that he would have been tried by a Court which would convict him according to the evidence. Now, the right hon. Gentleman Mr. W. E. Gladstone described me in one part of his speech as being a coward.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

An hon. MEMBER: So you are.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At all events, I think the right hon. Gentleman might have spared Mr. Dillon the same accusation. I most assuredly will not stand up in this House and say that Mr. Dillon was such a coward that, while he was prepared to break the law like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), when he knew that the conditions of his trial would insure him immunity for his offence, he shrank from such a course when he knew he would be brought to justice. "Hear, hear!"

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) [Cries of "Order!"]: In the absence of my right hon. Friend, will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to say—[Renewed cries of "Order!" and "Name!"] My right hon. Friend did not say that he would break the law in Ireland; what he did say was that he would go and say certain things if he had the chance of being tried by a jury.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not blame the hon. Member for interfering on behalf of his Colleague, but I confess I fail to understand the purport of his interruption, because it appears to me to exactly confirm what I said. His right hon. Colleague distinctly said last night that there was a particular offence against the law which he would be delighted to commit if tried by a jury, which he knew would disagree, but which he would not commit if he were not to be tried by a jury.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: He never said anything of the kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I say he did say so.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Not at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I say he did say so.

An Irish MEMBER: He did not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, the right hon. Gentleman is not here to answer for himself; but it really is a passing allusion, and my point was—I am not going to trouble my head with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford—but I should not, though I am accused of being opposed to Mr. Dillon, venture to make the defence for him that is made by Gentlemen, some of whom call themselves his Friends.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am with you on that point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then the right hon. Gentleman, having attacked the Government for their procedure in the matter of the Proclamation, proceeded to discuss the iniquity of subjecting Mr. Dillon to the indignity and hardship of ordinary criminal treatment. Well, Sir, I want to know when the right hon. Gentleman came to hold that view? This is not the first time that a Gentleman describing himself as an Irish politician has been put in prison for some offence against the law. They were and have been put in prison before my time, and by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and when they were put in prison they were subjected to precisely the same treatment. [Cries of "No!"] They were subjected to precisely the same treatment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I say no.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not, of course, mean Gentlemen who were put in prison under Mr. Forster's Act; I am referring to the Act of 1882, and I am stating the exact truth.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not true either. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! In the interests of the fair conduct of the debate, I trust that these constant running commentaries on the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman will cease, otherwise it will be impossible that the debate can proceed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But, leaving out of account, as I am quite ready to do, the action of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to Irish politicians between the years 1882 and 1885, I want to know when this principle came into force which the right hon. Gentleman has advocated—that the cloth coat should receive one kind of treatment and the frieze coat another? I do not say that the doctrines of the right hon. Gentleman are wrong—I make no pronouncement upon that point; but I say that in subjecting Mr. Dillon to the ordinary treatment of an ordinary prisoner for an ordinary offence, I have followed out the invariable practice, not only of Ireland, but of England and Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman appears to believe that this is the first time that a man of education has been put in prison for an offence against the law of the country. Does he really believe that? Does he seriously hold that view? If he does, why has he, who has had certainly as great, if not greater, influence on the policy of the country for the last 50 years than any man now living, during which time prison discipline has been the subject of constant controversy—why has he never interfered in favour of educated men, in favour of the cloth coat as against the frieze coat? Why is this principle enunciated by him for the first time in the House of Commons when it suits the political game of the Radical Party? The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to a most elaborate legal discussion. [An hon. MEMBER: The priests.] Oh, yes; I forgot the priests. That was the part of his speech in which the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to describe me as a coward.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Afraid.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What a happy ingenuity of distinction! The right hon. Gentleman does not say that I am a coward, but that I am afraid. The priests are not made first-class misdemeanants; they are misdemeanants simply, and are treated in the ordinary manner, but they have not, so far, been compelled to put on prison clothes.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): Have they been compelled to pick oakum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I am concerned, they have been compelled to adopt every other prison regulation. It will be observed that it is impossible to treat a Catholic priest in the matter of dress on an equality with a layman. And for this reason—to strip a priest of a dress which he is compelled to wear by canonical rule is a very different operation from stripping a layman. The decision I came to may have been entirely wrong, but as in all cases in which I have had to decide between nicely-balanced alternatives in the administration of the Crimes Act in Ireland I decided on the side of mercy. Therefore, though, I admit, with considerable hesitation—and I am by no means certain at this moment that I am right—I decided that while priests convicted of offences against the law in Ireland should in every respect be subjected to the same treatment as other prisoners, in the matter of dress, and in the matter of dress alone, I would make a distinction between them. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is still disposed to describe that as cowardly. [An hon. MEMBER: You were afraid of the Pope.] Now, I pass to what was the main question, the main substance of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—the Killeagh conspiracy; but I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman through the minute examination of the statement of that case which he made to the House. I will only say, with all respect to him, and having listened carefully to his view of the law of criminal conspiracy in Ireland, that I could not recommend the right hon. Gentleman to the Lord Lieutenant as a person as to whose legal knowledge and competency he might be satisfied. For the right hon. Gentleman fell into the most extraordinary legal confusion on this point. He told us, and he told us truly, that there was a conspiracy—that the Judges had indicated that there was a conspiracy at Common Law by the persons who were condemned. [“No, no!”] Does the right hon. Gentleman contradict that?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He read passages from the Chief Baron's Charge, and he might have read still stronger passages from the Charge of Baron Dowse; but those two learned Judges clearly indicated that in their opinion there was ample evidence of a conspiracy at Common Law against the police. But, said the right hon. Gentleman, these persons merely conspired together not to supply the police with goods, and he compared it with the case of 100 workmen in England who agree together not to work except for certain wages.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; to strike against a particular employer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Against a particular employer.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Quote me correctly. That was all I said.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He compared the case with that of 100 workmen in England who agree to strike against a particular employer. These men in England would not be condemned by English law, he said; therefore, how monstrous to give these peasants in Ireland, for a similar proceeding, a month's imprisonment. The right hon. Gentleman has been very badly coached by his legal adviser. I am sure he got his law from the right hon. Gentleman next him, the Member for Derby. What was the character of the conspiracy at Common Law of which these men would have been found guilty, according to Chief Baron Palles and Baron Dowse?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Judges gave no such opinion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The conspiracy at Common Law of which, in the opinion of the two Judges, they would have been found guilty.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The Judges did not say that.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Quote the words.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes; quote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have attempted to disregard the interruptions as long as I could; but I do not think consecutive debate is encouraged by the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, who might restrain himself, particularly as he will have an opportunity by-and-bye. But I say that, emphatically, any lawyer—I do not mean the right hon. Gentleman—reading the charges of Chief Baron Palles and Mr. Baron Dowse would conclude that those two learned Judges held that there was adequate evidence of a criminal conspiracy to go to a jury. And are we to be told that this conspiracy at Common Law is analogous to that of 100 workmen who strike against a particular employer?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Why not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why not. The conspiracy he described had not for its object the injury of any individual; but the conspiracy in Ireland had for its object to starve the police; and I appeal to any competent lawyer in this House whether, if these five men were brought up in England before a Judge and jury, and charged with that offence and on that evidence, they would not have been found guilty, and, if found guilty, whether they would not be liable to a penalty up to two years' imprisonment? And this is the parallel which it was sought to be drawn between the imaginary cases in England and the real cases in Ireland, and it is on cases of that kind that he founds his great attack on the magistracy of Ireland. I confess I find it hard adequately to express to the House the feelings I have when I hear him use language of that kind. He takes one single case of a miscarriage of justice, a case of admitted difficulty, a case in which the prisoners, if not guilty of precisely the technical offence for which they were punishable under the Crimes Act, were undoubtedly guilty of an offence at Common Law of not less iniquity, and on that case, the solitary case he could find, after examining, with microscopic gaze, the whole record of the Government, he founds an attack on the Resident Magistrates of Ireland in which he ventures to compare them to Judge Jeffreys.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I compared the act of these two magistrates with that of Judge Jeffreys.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He took these men as specimens, and I say that if he did not take them as specimens, but on their own merits, a more scandalous attack never was made in this House. He said that Lord Spencer—who appointed these men and certified to their legal knowledge—would not have defended these men if they had done these things. Well, the right hon. Gentleman knows his own friends best, and I think it is very likely that Lord Spencer would not have defended them. I think it likely that he would have thrown them to the wolves. I think it extremely likely that, finding they were attacked by a powerful Parliamentary Party, he would have sacrificed them without mercy on the altar of Parliamentary expediency. ["Oh, oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman asked me if I was not going to dismiss them. I am not going to dismiss them; and I would seriously suggest to right hon. Gentlemen, who some day may have considerable legal patronage, that if they are going to dismiss every Judge or Justice whose decision is overruled by a Superior Court, they will have even more legal patronage than perhaps they desire. Well, but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine that because this particular decision was overruled all decisions in similar cases would be equally overruled if they were tried. Then why were they not tried? The decision of the two Judges has given everybody tried in Ireland since February last the power to appeal. [An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.] If they did not appeal I presume it is because they have not got a case. I would remind the House that there have been an infinitely greater number of appeals to the County Courts than under Lord Spencer's Act, and, in addition, there has been the power since February to appeal to the Court of Exchequer. Yet this was literally the only case on which the Opposition thought it expedient to rely for their attack. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] I repeat that this is the only case on which they think it expedient to rely. The right hon. Gentleman asked me to lay the depositions before the House. Of course, I shall do nothing of the kind. There is an appeal to an impartial tribunal. Does the right hon. Gentleman think an appeal to this House is an appeal to an impartial legal tribunal? Has he so far forgotten Constitutional traditions that he thinks this House is by its nature and character capable of considering depositions and discussing legal questions which ought to be discussed before a Law Court? Does he think that this House, biased as it is by Party feeling, moved by Party passion, is the proper tribunal before which to lay an appeal which could be properly laid before the Court of Exchequer in Ireland? I wish to ask the House to consider this point. We are having an indictment of the whole administration of the Crimes Act in Ireland. They have had the opportunity of surveying the whole of the circumstances of everything done in Ireland since the Act was passed. They have been examining all that has occurred with a microscopic eye. They have—I do not know by what means—invented an infinity of accusations without any foundation in fact against the Government, and when these are boiled down to the smallest residuum of truth in them, what does it amount to? It amounts to this—that in one single case certain persons have been convicted of one kind of conspiracy, when in reality and in truth they were only guilty of another. And on this slender foundation the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends come down to the House to ask them to pass a Vote of Censure on the Government for the monstrous manner in which justice is administered in Ireland. Is it pretended that a single innocent man has suffered? Is it pretended that a single man, not guilty of an offence against the law, has been punished? ["Yes!"] Then I should like to know the name. I know that in the cases brought forward by right hon. Gentlemen on this and previous occasions, not one man can by any stretch of imagination be declared innocent. The newsvendors who have been referred to so much were all warned, and let off if they promised not to offend again. The truth is, that these men would be the first to complain if they were called innocent. They are proud of their offence. I quite admit that this shows that the law is not respected in Ireland. These men were put in prison for selling United Ireland, for publishing illegal notices. Every one of them would have shrunk from denying that he was guilty of the offence with which he was charged. In those circumstances, how childish is it to say that the Act of last year is administered harshly—that the men we have put in prison do not deserve to be in prison. Further, I notice that when I go from the technical points of the right hon. Gentleman and come to the question of innocent or guilty, I meet with no denial. No man can venture to say that the people who are put in prison have not earned their imprisonment by their offences against the law, though doubtless hon. Gentlemen opposite object to the character of the law under which they were put in prison. If what the right hon. Gentleman has stated be true, if this miscarriage of justice is the only case which can be quoted with effect in this House, am I not justified in saying that no Government in this country, in Ireland, or in any other country in the world which has ever had to contend with an organized resistance to the law, with an organized desire to upset the Government of the country, with an organized determination to resist the payment of just debts—am I not justified in saying that no Government which has had to contend with circumstances of this kind has contended against it with less harshness, with less injustice, or less of anything that can be twisted into a miscarriage of justice? I do not object to the course of examination to which Her Majesty's Government is subjected by way of Questions. I could only wish that Gentlemen would examine their facts a little more accurately before they come down to ask Questions, that they would not boldly state, in the form of assertion in the country, the most astounding fictions with regard to the administration of law in Ireland. But of the examination itself, of the criticisms on the Government, I have not the slightest desire or reason to be afraid. What I object to is, that Gentlemen who are constantly straining at gnats never seem to find any difficulty in swallowing camels. What I object to is that Gentlemen come down to this House and make some small criticism against a constable or magistrate, but never ask a question which has for its object to check the real and appalling evil under which society in Ireland is at this moment suffering. I do not think a better example of this can be afforded than that of the Kingstons—the old man and his wife who were sentenced by the magistrates for taking illegal possession. That is the case brought forward by the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne. It was his stock instance, his classic example of the harshness of the administration of the law in Ireland. This old couple were put into prison by two magistrates because they took illegal possession. They were undoubtedly guilty of a breach of the law. I do not doubt if a similar breach of the law had been committed in London, Paris, or New York, these two old people would have been punished and we should have heard nothing about them. The case, however, was brought to my notice. I thought the magistrates were justified; but I also thought that, considering the circumstance of the case and that the landlord had himself appealed on behalf of the criminals, it would be well if they were released, and I am glad to say that my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant took the same view and exercised the Prerogative of Mercy, and they were released. That, you will observe, is taken as the stock example of harsh treatment by the law of certain victims of landlordism. But who interferes with those far more pitiable and unhappy victims of the National League? The Lord Lieutenant interfered on behalf of those persons who have been legally convicted; but has the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne even in one single case used his influence to interfere with the action of the League, when they have been inflicting far more brutal and infamous punishment on people not guilty, but absolutely innocent? I never heard of a case. I never heard that the right hon. Gentleman has used his influence with the Party below the Gangway, if he has any, to alleviate the destiny of these unhappy victims of Boycotting whom the National League has sentenced for some imaginary crime against their law. We know the cases of helpless women and girls, labourers who had large families to support, and begged to be allowed to work for employers who were Boycotted, but were refused. These incidents are not rare incidents of the reign of the National League. I should be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman can quote one occasion on which he has interfered to alleviate the unmerited and appalling sufferings of these unhappy victims of the tyranny of his allies. The only thing the right hon. Gentleman has ever done, so far as I know, in that direction was not to interfere to help these persons, but to use his whole political influence in this House and the country to denounce the policemen and magistrates and the Government who attempt to put an end to the vile system under which these cruelties are inflicted. I grant he has not done it for any love of the crimes which are committed. But I assert that he plays a poor and humiliating part in politics when he finds himself criticizing here and there the isolated action of this magistrate or that policeman, when the whole policy of his allies, on whom depends his position, is incomparably more barbarous and more cruel than anything ever done by all the magistrates and all the policemen in the world. But, Sir, I am told that whatever my views may be upon the action of the National League in Ireland, it is very wrong to attack men like Mr. Dillon or the hon. Member for North-East Cork—because, forsooth, these Gentlemen are politicians and their offences are political offences, that they are to be treated in a totally different manner from ordinary offenders against the ordinary law. Now, I could quote, but I will not quote, the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan) on the subject of political offences when they were in Office. I am rather bored with proving that the right hon. Member for Derby does not hold the same conviction now that he did five years ago. I think the House will take these quotations as read. Without, therefore, quoting these ancient and musty documents I come to the merits of the case. There are three methods, as far as I understand, of furthering political action in Ireland, and of carrying out the great object of making Ireland a nation. There is rebellion, which is the course recommended by the Fenians, and which would, no doubt, be gladly followed by the Gaelic Association and others. There is the method of assassination, and there is the method which I will describe roughly as the Plan of Campaign. These are the three methods by which the modern Irish patriot desires to free his enslaved country. With regard to open and armed resistance I have nothing to say, but I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what he thinks of political assassination. If a crime is not a crime because its object is political, I presume there is no offence more political than a political assassination. There is no personal end to be gained by the assassination, and his object is clearly of a political character. I have always heard that the right hon. Gentleman was of opinion that when he was in Office there were a certain number of persons in America and in Ireland who held the opinion, rightly or wrongly, that nothing would be much better for the world than if the right hon. Gentleman were no longer in it. Had they confined themselves to holding that opinion they would have been politicians; but when they proceed to devise schemes of assassination I want to know whether they did or did not cease to be politicians? In my opinion they deserved to be hanged like dogs when they were caught; but, if I understand the modern doctrine of the Radical Party, the end justifies the means. If I rightly understand the theory of the Gladstone-Irish Party, these persons would be political offenders because their object was not a personal but a political object. Let us take a particular case. I should like to ask those who hold this theory of political crime what they think of this instance of it. In last Autumn, it will be in the recollection of the House, a certain policeman named Whelehan was murdered in his attempt to save the life of a "landgrabber," as he was called, named Sexton. It was given in evidence at the trial by one of the witnesses for the Crown that he was moved to attempt the crime of murdering Sexton by a speech delivered by Mr. Dillon. ["Oh, oh!"] Perhaps the House will allow me to read the evidence, and I will quote it from The Freeman's Journal. He deposed that on the evening of the Ennis meeting, which was addressed by Mr. Dillon, he had a conversation with Thomas Leary, who said that in consequence of that speech he had determined to postpone the raid which he had been talking about because the landgrabbers must first be put down, and the first landgrabber to be put down was Thomas Sexton. You therefore have this chain of evidence. Mr. Dillon makes a speech, which I presume is a political speech, saying that he will not tolerate a grabber. A man who had determined on certain raids in the county was influenced by what Mr. Dillon said. He then determined to attack the first grabber he met. This happened to be Sexton, who was protected by the police, and the protection of whose life cost the life of Constable Whelehan.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the evidence which he has just read is the evidence of a witness who swore that for six years he had been in the pay of the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, thinking in my innocence that he was going to make a relevant interruption. The question which I want to ask the House is this. If Mr. Dillon made a political speech in which he said he would no longer tolerate landgrabbers, was it a political crime to attempt to murder Sexton, who was a landgrabber? The right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to think it was not. Then, perhaps, he will explain how it is that it is a political offence to urge the people of Ireland to destroy landgrabbers while it is not a political offence to proceed to carry out the recommendation. I heard an interruption just now to the effect that Mr. Dillon did not ask the Irish people to destroy landgrabbers. I admit that that was an inaccurate expression on my part. Mr. Dillon takes a different view. It is enough for him that a landgrabber should be Boycotted, that he should be ruined and starved; that his family should be involved in the ruin of the master of the house; that he should be refused the necessities of existence during life and burial after death. That was enough, I know, for Mr. Dillon and for the hon. Member for North-East Cork. That is all Mr. Dillon asks, and he does not call that crime. But can he complain if some of his disciples are more advanced than their master, and go on to put an end to life? If he cannot deny that, then the advice he gave was as much an incitement to crime as any advice ever given. I have here an interesting extract of a speech delivered at Youghal by the hon. Member for North-East Cork on the 7th of November last year, in which he said that they had given up the use of fire-arms for the more powerful weapon of Boycotting, and that landlords and landgrabbers feared boycotting more than shooting. Observe how slight is the difference—in my opinion at all events—between the doctrines preached by the hon. Member for North-East Cork and by Mr. Dillon and the doctrines which the men who tried to murder Sexton learnt from their speeches. In order that I may fully justify the action of the Government it is necessary that I should say a few words about the Plan of Campaign. The hon. Member for North-East Cork told us there are no cases in which the Plan of Campaign has been defeated. I can, however, recall to mind three cases in which it has been absolutely smashed—namely, on the Ormsby estate, County Mayo, on the Banon Estate at Broughall, King's County, and on the estate of Lord Massereene.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Two of these estates I never heard of in my life.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That shows that the hon. Member has not followed the recent course of Irish politics. I do not propose to go into those cases now, because the question whether the Plan of Campaign has failed or succeeded is scarcely relevant to the issue before us. When hon. Members defend the Plan of Campaign have they really considered the circumstances of the Irish tenant? He is at this moment the spoilt child of legislation. No tenantry on the face of the earth has half the protection which the Irish tenant enjoys at this moment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle told the House that when the landlord evicted a tenant he confiscated the tenant's property. There is no power on the part of the landlord to confiscate any tenant's property. The tenant may go into Court and have a fair rent fixed, and, if evicted, he can carry away every 6*d.* worth of his property. I admit that tenants may have to leave their farms without carrying anything out of them. But whose fault is that? It is the fault of the National League. Who is it that turns out a tenant a beggar on the roadside? The National League. It is the National League which declares a farm Boycotted; it is the National League which decides when a tenant is evicted for non-payment of two or three years' rent that he shall not be allowed to realize one 6*d.* of his tenant right, which is often worth 20 years' purchase. The wrong is not on the part of the landlord, but of the National League. It is said that the Plan of Campaign is moral. To determine this question you must consider it as a whole. The right hon. Gentleman has simply considered how far the terms under the Plan of Campaign are different from the terms fixed by the Land Court. Is that the way to test the morality of the transaction? I absolutely deny that such a comparison is in any sense relative to the question. As we are on the morality of the Plan of Campaign, and as I believe I shall be followed by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I should like to read an extract from a speech of his, delivered on the 7th of December, 1886. He said—

“For my part, when I hear the question of morality discussed in anything that concerns the landlord faction, I must say that the morality of any means of putting them down would concern me very little.”

I say that the Plan of Campaign prevents all settlements between landlord and tenant, or, at any rate, makes them extremely difficult. All settlements are in the nature of compromise. The Plan of Campaign absolutely excludes compromise, because the money has been paid into the hands of a banker, and the tenants have no further control over it. However much they may desire to come to terms with their landlord, they can only do so if they pay the rent twice over, first to the banker under the Plan of Campaign, and then to the landlord. Therefore there is no room for compromise.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. Upon every estate there is an estate committee appointed by the tenant, with entire control and jurisdiction over the funds, and, as a matter of fact, that estate committee has over and over again terminated disputes by a compromise.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At all events, the compromise is a thing to be decided by the Members of the National League, who determine it upon political grounds, and it is not decided between the tenant and the landlord, nor is it left to them to make their own terms. My next complaint against the Plan of Campaign is, that it involves infinite suffering to the tenants. Take the case of the Herbertstown estate, which consists of the finest grazing land in Ireland. In an unhappy moment the tenants on that estate were induced to adopt the Plan of Campaign and they were all evicted. The landlord is now farming the whole of the land, and farming it at a profit. There has not been for many years such a spring for the Irish tenants. For many years there has been a great strain upon the Irish tenants. But the price of stock has now risen greatly, and the farmers who hold stock are able to make profits. From these profits every man who has adopted the Plan of Campaign is excluded. Sometimes they see their holdings falling into neglect which years cannot repair. Sometimes they see the landlord, sometimes other persons, reap the profits which they might have reaped themselves. I have said that the Plan of Campaign has broken down on three estates; on other estates where it has succeeded, it has worked nothing but mischief. On the Kingston estate, instead of the settlements which the tenants would have got if they went into Court or arranged with their landlord, each according to his circumstances, there has been an all-round reduction of the same average amount, which has been far too great in some cases and far too little in others. My third complaint against the Plan of Campaign is that it compels solvent tenants not to pay their rent. A careful study of the Irish Press has convinced me of the fact that in Ireland the man who does not pay his rent to his landlord, though he may be able to do so—the man who does not fulfil his obligations, if he be a member of the National League, is described as a patriot. In England we describe such a man by a less august title—we call him a swindler, and my great complaint against the Plan of Campaign is that it is an immoral combination against paying rent. It involves outrage in its very method; it involves compulsion, it involves tyranny, it involves Boycotting, it involves preventing derelict farms from being let. I do not presume that this statement can be disputed. ["Yes."] If it can I should like to know how. Does the hon. Gentleman deny that the essence of the Plan of Campaign is that if a landlord turns out a tenant, no one else can be allowed to go on to the farm? That I call Boycotting a farm. Every one knows that Boycotting farms is the very essence of the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Does anybody realize the full evil to the industry of agriculture in Ireland which is now being effected by Boycotting landgrabbers? What does it amount to? It amounts to keeping the man who cannot work a farm in the farm and keeping out the man who can. The hon. Member talks as if the process of Boycotting farms was confined to men who had been turned out of their farms for unjust rent. There never could be a grosser delusion. I hope the House will allow me to read one very short case, which shows that Land League interference is not confined to cases of ordinary tenancies. It is a case in Clare. A property in Clare was sold in the Bankruptcy Court. While the sale was going on the land was let for grazing to four persons who had never been connected with the estate, on the distinct understanding that it was merely a temporary arrangement. The sale was effected, and three out of the former tenants stuck to their bargain. They were grazing tenants, and they at once gave up possession. But the fourth of those grazing tenants declined to do so, and the purchaser was denounced as a landgrabber—the purchaser, that is, of an estate in the Court of Bankruptcy, where four persons had been taken on temporarily as tenants.

Boycotting notices were posted up, and the man who acted for the purchaser was fired at, and this interesting notice was published—

"Men of gallant Tipperary, Limerick, and historic Clare,—You are called upon by the National League not to deal or hold any intercourse with Martin Corbet under pain of death for the disgrace he has caused under the patronage of that infamous and blood-stained scoundrel Balfour, by grabbing a farm in the County Clare, and creating an unprecedented act by paying twenty-three years' purchase to the aid of the Crimes Act," and so on. And the result of that was the outrage that I have described. Now, let the House observe that there was an outrage committed simply and solely because the National League chose to describe as a landgrabber a man who had legitimately purchased land let temporarily to a tenant who, without a shadow of justification, in spite of his bargain chose to put in a claim to perpetual possession.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I have only to ask the right hon. Gentleman a simple question. He has chosen to connect the National League with the case he has read to the House. I will ask him, as I am responsible for the organization, as I pledged myself to the House that in no case except where a tenant has been unjustly evicted for an unjust rent, or where he has surrendered his farm through an excessive rent, and he could not pay, has that organization ever taken up a case—I will ask him to give a single proof of the statement he has made.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The particular case in question was in the county of Clare, and the League is suppressed in Clare. The farm was Boycotted in the name of the National League.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) rose amid loud cries of "Order!" in the midst of which he resumed his seat.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Time is so limited that I cannot give any proof.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the right hon. Gentleman should state, as he says the League supported this action, that I myself, at the National League meeting in Dublin, made a speech in support of the alleged landgrabber.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What is the use of the hon. and learned Gentleman making a speech in Dublin in favour of the landgrabber when the thing occurred in Clare?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The local branch denounced it, too.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I want to point out to the House that this system of opposing landgrabbing is not only directed against the landlords, but is absolutely fatal to the settlement of the Land Question in Ireland. You talk about settling the Land Question in Ireland by purchase. How do you mean to settle the Land Question by purchase if you are going to permit this Boycotting of derelict farms, if you allow the Irish people to think they act rightly when they shoot at men who take farms from which insolvent tenants have been expelled. How on earth will you ever be able to carry out any system of land purchase with tolerable success if you allow practices to go on like that in the case I have referred to? You will never be able to settle the Land Question or any other question in Ireland unless you establish the reign of law. Surely, we can now judge of so-called political offences of this character? We can now judge how far Mr. Dillon is a political offender, and how far the hon. Member for North-East Cork is a political offender. At the door of these so-called political offenders lies all the suffering which has occurred in connection with Boycotted farms, and all the contests that have been carried on in this fatal spirit to landlord and tenant. They have directly preached Boycotting, and they have indirectly preached assassination. I confess I sometimes reflect on what would be thought of these modern Irish patriots by their predecessors. The cause of Ireland has been vindicated in former days by arms and by eloquence, and I ask where eloquence and arms have again and again failed is petty larceny likely to succeed? I have but little more to say. I have cut my observations as short as I could; but I should like to ask whether those who framed this Resolution were really serious. Did they seriously believe that Irish disrespect for the law began with the present Administration? I recollect a speech of Mr. Dillon's in 1882, in which he asked—"Who is there that understands, or pretends to understand, the peasantry of Ireland, and will say that crime and outrage have not the sympathy of the Irish peasantry?" That was the opinion of Mr. Dillon in 1882, and if that opinion was well founded in 1882, how can Mr. Dillon's Friends below and above the Gangway come down to the House and pretend to say that we are responsible for the fact that the Irish peasantry at this moment are in sympathy with crime and outrage? I admit, and I admit it with the deepest regret, that the law is not loved in Ireland for its own sake. I deny absolutely, however, that we are responsible for that. It is the result of a long and melancholy history—a history I would gladly see brought to an end. When you attempt to conclude from their dislike for and want of sympathy with the law that the Crimes Act is not necessary, have you considered the close connection between the exercise of the law and the repression of crime? I do not care how you study the question or how you handle the facts. If you look at Irish history for the last 30 years you will find that where the law has been vigorously enforced, where you have an Act under which justice is administered according to the evidence, there crime diminishes; and as soon as the pressure of the law is removed, and the criminal finds that the machinery of the law is defective, there you will find crime increase. In vain you will try to associate crime with eviction or any other circumstance. The repression of crime in Ireland depends upon the Criminal Law, and upon the Criminal Law alone. You diminished it when you passed your Criminal Act of 1871. It sprang up when you relaxed it in 1875. It rose to an enormous height in 1880. It sank in 1882. It rose again when the Act came to an end, and it has again sunk under the new Act. If you repealed this Act, of course it would rise again. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has disputed or doubted the improvement that has occurred in the country since the Crimes Act was passed. I see no ground to minimize or doubt the magnitude of that improvement. The right hon. Gentleman began by asking me whether there has been a crisis imminent in the police. Perhaps he will allow me to re-assure him on that point. He seemed to think that the police were resigning in large numbers and were showing a discontent they had never shown before. Such is not the case. There has never been a time in recent years in which there were fewer resignations from any cause in the police, or in which there were a larger number of candidates anxious to enter the police. Never was there a time when the police were a more loyal, a more contented, or a more efficient body. Twenty or 30 policemen have resigned in the last year, and most of them on so-called political grounds; but, by a curious coincidence, it has usually been the case that the policemen who were anxious to resign because called upon to administer the Crimes Act have been policemen whose services would have been dispensed with in any case. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to discuss crime. He talked of the small improvement in crime. I deny that the improvement has been small. If you compare the five months at the beginning of this year with the five months at the beginning of last year, you will find that the improvement in agrarian crimes, exclusive of threatening letters, is no less than 40 per cent; and I do not think any man will describe that improvement as otherwise than an important and a significant improvement. Then I come to Boycotting. The right hon. Gentleman does not like my Boycotting statistics. I do not wonder at that, because they absolutely demolish his case. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries Burghs (Mr. R. T. Reid) said we never rested our case originally upon crime. I grant that; but what we do rest our case upon is intimidation; and if you examine the statistics you will find that in this respect the improvement has been prodigious. If you take the statistics of Boycotting in July last, before the Act came into operation, and compare them with January of this year, the improvement is no less than 56 per cent—in other words, more than half; and if you take them up to the end of last month, if you include the first five months of this year, you will find the improvement no less than 70 per cent. When you come to the question of derelict farms, the improvement is, perhaps, less marked; but is it, therefore, non-existent? I say, speaking on my own responsibility, and forming the best judgment I can, not only from official reports, but from private letters received from every part of the country—I say, without hesitation, that there is no comparison whatever between the condition of Ireland in May, 1888, and May, 1887, in any particular whatever. Derelict farms are taken which were not taken before; rents are being largely paid, and the social condition of the country, except where the Plan of Campaign exists, is greatly improved, I do not pretend that the question is solved. It would be folly to suppose that after six or seven months' administration of the Crimes Act the Irish problem would be solved. It would be folly. But I say this—that if you are merely to consider the amount of suffering we have removed, if you are merely to consider the amount of liberty we have restored, if you are merely to consider the number of persons who now dare to do what they never would have dared to do before the Crimes Act was passed, I say with confidence to our hon. Friends who have supported us through the laborious Session of last year, your labour has not been thrown away. If from the moment when I now speak the cloud which has begun to break should again descend upon Ireland with all its original blackness, even then I should not say that our toil has been in vain. I firmly believe the contrary. I believe that we have already produced results which should make us proud of having worked as we have worked, for the objects for which we have worked. There are many hearts, from one end of Ireland to the other, which at this moment are thankful that there has been a Unionist Government in power—a Government that, at all events, has shown a desire and a resolution to break down the vile tyranny under which they were suffering. [Cries of "No!"] I am aware that these views are not shared by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They have a different idea on the subject. They are, I presume, looking forward to the General Election, about which we hear so much, when the Unionist Party is to be hurled into insignificance. Then, I suppose, the golden age will dawn upon us when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), no longer deterred by the fear of the law, will be able to employ his siren voice in inducing the tenants on the various estates in Ireland to combine against their just debts. Agriculture, no doubt, will not flourish then, but Boycotting will. Farms will be strictly entailed upon the insolvent and the incompetent tenants, and the only crime in this paradise upon earth will be paying your debts, and the only tribunal you will have to fear will be that of the National League. [Laughter.] Well, Sir, I suppose that men of all Parties desire the good of Ireland. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I do not doubt the bona fides of right hon. Gentlemen opposite—[An hon. MEMBER: We doubt yours.]—but we have different methods of obtaining the result which we have in view. This is no place to discuss rival schemes, and I shall not say a word about the fantastic compromise of Home Rule which has been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman, which the right hon. Gentleman thinks will gratify Irish national aspirations. We take another view of the matter. We hope to see Ireland amalgamated with the other constituent parts of the British Empire, sharing our institutions, fostered by our wealth, and with some of the injuries which we undoubtedly inflicted upon Irish industry in the last century redressed. We hope to see every Irishman rejoicing in a community of sentiment with every Englishman and Scotchman, sharing the fortunes of the British Empire and sharing the traditions upon which those fortunes are founded. But whether the compromise of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian or our own idea is the better, neither the one nor the other can be based upon any other foundation than that of law and order. Every superstructure that you may raise upon a foundation of lawlessness is doomed beforehand to failure. Do you suppose that the people whom you are debauching—you, the Irish Party, by your positive teaching, and you, the Opposition, by your silence—will, on the morrow of the establishment of an Irish Republic, become lovers of law and order, or that the Irish Republic, or whatever the thing is to be called, will have the slightest chance of permanence or success? Do you suppose that lawbreakers will be good law-makers? In the course of this debate, I have been told that Mr. Dillon is the flower of Irish patriotism; but is he really teaching the Irish people a lesson by which they will be able to direct their future course? Our methods, we admit, are different. The experiment which we are endeavouring to carry out in Ireland of restoring law and order we know is being tried under the greatest difficulties—difficulties which are largely due to those whom we ought to be able to claim as our greatest allies, as they have already been engaged in the same task, who know what its difficulties are, and who should appreciate the importance of our efforts. But, notwithstanding those difficulties, we know that success, even more than we had dared to hope for, has already crowned our efforts. Last year, when I proposed the Crimes Bill, I spoke in hope; now we know for certain that the efforts we have made to repress lawlessness are succeeding. We have already succeeded, and we mean to succeed further in the future. But, Sir, whether or not in the future we are destined to carry on successfully the work we have initiated, in either case we are assured that it is only on the foundation of honesty, of liberty, and of law that the future of the Irish people can be safely rested.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): I notice, Sir, that the cheers with which the right hon. Gentleman was greeted by his friends were far more hearty when he rose to begin his speech than when he sat down, having made it. The circumstance is one not complimentary to him, and it has, I think, something more than a personal significance. However that may be, we are able to discount the cheers which have just been heard from the opposite side of the House. Sir, they are the cheers of a Party which thankfully took power from our hands three years ago by denouncing and renouncing coercion. They are the cheers of hon. Gentlemen who two years ago obtained from the English people admission to this House by pledging themselves upon the platforms of the country to a policy of anything but coercion, and who now, at the end of a year of coercion and nothing else, look forward with some discomfort and a good deal of apprehension, thinking how many of those 20 years of resolute government they are likely to see. The debate on this Motion—a Motion which is definite and limited—has travelled far and wide.

I shall endeavour to keep as close as I can to the subject, but in that I shall not imitate the example of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I would first notice two of his observations which throw an instructive light upon that quality of candour in the character of the right hon. Gentleman, which is supposed to be the first boast of an English gentleman, and which is considered to be the essential characteristic of an English Minister of State. He claims our gratitude for the information he placed in our hands, and he connected that statement with a denial of the references of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to the case of Colonel Turner. Why, Sir, in the case of Colonel Turner the right hon. Gentleman was challenged to grant a public inquiry. He refused a public inquiry, and he based to-night his denial upon official information which he has not enabled us to test. I lay down to this House a statement on which I challenge contradiction. It is this—that the Irish Government never yielded us information but at such a time as takes from that information the only value which information could have by taking out of our hands the power to use that information to check the correctness of the statements of the Government in this House. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the treatment of priests under the Act. I wish the House to attend to this statement, because it gives us a most signal proof of the candour of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said he was an English Protestant, and that he allows priests to wear in prison their clerical garb in obedience to a canonical rule. If a priest in Ireland committed an offence against the ordinary law, would he be clothed in the ordinary garb? If a priest committed a theft or an assault, what then of the canonical rules. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, who claims to be a man of courage, but who displays in this House many signal qualities, always inseparably associated with cowardice, says he does not put Irish priests in the prison garb. I will tell him the reason he does not put priests in prison garb. Because Father Ryan refused to put it on, and courageous as he is, successful as he is, he does not care to prove his courage and stake his success by using physical force against the priests of Ireland. His references to the treatment of priests is a clear proof that he, in his own mind, makes distinctions which he never admits he makes—that he does make a distinction between political prisoners and ordinary prisoners. The magistrates also admit it, because in all cases in which priests were the defendants they committed them as first-class misdemeanants; and finally upon this point, although the right hon. Gentleman has continually professed that the discipline of the prisons of Ireland is not placed in his hands, he proved by his references that he personally and directly controls the treatment and the fate of every prisoner in every prison in Ireland. I make him, Sir, a present of the value of the arguments by which in this Assembly of English Gentlemen he has proved his manly candour. He has proved his title to be considered a man of honour by slandering an absent man whom he has put into prison. I am glad, Sir, he has referred to the Whelehan case, because it will enable me in a very few words to place before this House the principles and the methods of the present Administration in Ireland. He has stated that a witness in the course of the inquiry into that case swore that he was told by another person that that person was incited by a speech of Mr. Dillon to commit an outrage. Who was that witness? Let the House and let the country understand the instruments the Government employs, and the kind of witnesses the Government cites in dealing with the cause of Ireland. This witness was one of the most infamous wretches whose existence has ever constituted a disgrace to human nature. This witness was Cullinane, the informer, who was for six years in the pay of the police, and who was a frequent inmate of the Informers' Home in Dublin. Upon the night of the murder of Whelehan, Cullinane, the paid spy of the police, by an arrangement with Whelehan, led and accompanied the attacking party to the house where an ambush was laid for their reception. Cullinane it was who incited and produced that crime. Cullinane was a man who had been twice in the Army, and who had twice deserted—a man who had been seven times convicted of crime and seven times imprisoned. He was a creature—I will not say a man—who had been convicted and imprisoned for a criminal assault upon a child of three years, and while he was suffering his sentence for that criminal assault the Government released him. The Government released this monster, this libel upon human nature, before his sentence was completed, and they released him to take him into their pay and send him about the country propagating crime, to constitute him one of their agents in Ireland to propagate crime, because they know that crime is the political and essential stock-in-trade of the Party now in power. This is the witness called against Mr. Dillon. This is the witness who has been called against a man to whom the better part of his political opponents will certainly not deny respect, and yet upon this witness they are asked to stake the reputation of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and of the whole Government of Ireland, as against a man who in worth of achievement and nobility of character has never been surpassed either in Ireland or England. The Chief Secretary has called before this Assembly of English gentlemen as a witness this vile informer, this Government spy, this propagator of crime, this convulser of the community in Ireland. This episode of the infamous villain Cullinane, the informer, will enable the House to judge how far and in what degree it will be wise for the House and for the people of England to scrutinize what the right hon. Gentleman has described as information. I have said that this debate has travelled far and wide, and I have now to ask how it has happened that so much of the debate has been occupied by the murders of the County Kerry? The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) has referred to them, the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) both referred to them, and of the speeches of these Gentlemen I am delighted to say that I was very glad to hear them, for the cause of Ireland will win by referring it to impartial judges, and there is no impartial judge who would not be disgusted by the rancorous tone of their speeches and by the shallowness and by the false irrationality of their case. I was glad to hear these Gentlemen, because they are always useful to the cause of Ireland. Why, at the present there is only one spot in the world where they could be more useful, and that is in the Isle of Thanet, where the united forces of these two hon. Gentlemen can secure what they have often secured before—the triumphant defeat of their candidate. Why have the Kerry murders been introduced into this debate? The Motion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) impeaches the administration of the Crimes Act; but has the Mover of it, or any other speaker in the course of this debate, laid blame at the door of the Government, or called in question the use of the Crimes Act in reference to the Kerry murders or to any acts that men understand as crime? We have been told that but for the Crimes Act these murderers would not have been punished. Why not? We are told that Mrs. Quirke, the widow of the murdered man, was in fear of giving evidence. Why could she not have been examined in private in the ordinary way, or why could her information not have been taken secretly, as informations were taken in the library of Mr. Olphert's private residence in Donegal? But she could not have been in fear of giving evidence under the ordinary law, because that fear would have applied equally to her examination when she was publicly examined at the trial at Wicklow. That reason goes by the board. We are told that a verdict could not be obtained without a change of venue, and that a change of venue could not have been obtained without a Crimes Act; but that is not so, for a change of venue can be obtained by the ordinary law in cases in which the Government show cause; and even without a change of venue they can, by the time-honoured practice of "standing aside" the jurors whom they dislike, they can obtain, even in Kerry, a jury suitable to their taste and entirely adequate to their purpose. Why did the Government so constantly in this debate refer to these murders? Sir, the agrarian question in Ireland is not a new one, and, unhappily, agrarian murders in Ireland are not new. Ever since you planted in Ireland your fatal agrarian system, since you have maintained it by your power, murder and violence have been its fruit. Go back a few years, go back to any agrarian crisis before the Land League or the National League, and you will find that where there were evictions by tens of thousands, the murders might be counted not by the unit but by the hundred, and outrages not by the hundred but by thousands. What has been the cause of the salutary change by which the murder bill has been lessened and crime decreased? It has been due to two things—combination amongst the people, and organization springing from that cause. With the Land League we have had the Land Act of 1881; with the National League we have had the Land Act of last year. Without combination and organization we would have had neither one nor the other, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Friends had their way we would have had neither of those Acts, and Ireland at the present moment would be in this condition, that the landlord could increase the rent at his pleasure, that eviction would be executed at his caprice, and the tillers of the soil would have been tenants at will. Judging by past experience, a continuance of that system would provoke resentment, and cruelty on the part of the landlord would be met by murder and outrage, and the change has occurred through combination and organization, and through the legislation forced by that organization. For the change which has occurred, and the legislation which has been passed, I think the right hon. Gentleman has to thank the man whom he and his Friends have denounced to-night. If he and his Colleagues could have had their way, Ireland to-day would be given over to cruelty on the part of the landlord and to crime on the part of those who suffered that cruelty. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the Kerry murders in order to shift the true issue before the country, and to raise a false issue instead. Why did he defend himself where he was not attacked? Because where he was attacked he was conscious he had no defence. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the right of public men to change their opinions. I have read a poem that was once written by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Nobody, I suppose, who was not in the secret ever before suspected him of poetry, and nobody certainly would have expected from him an eulogium upon Ireland; but, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman once wrote a poem in praise of the Irish race. The poem closed with a striking eulogium of the matchless spirit of the Celt. Well, Sir, the spirit of the Celt may not be matchless, but I promise the Chancellor of the Exchequer it will be too much for him. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer challenged the Mover of this Motion when he asked whether a legacy of respect for the law in Ireland and the people's affection were bequeathed to us by the Government that went before us? I say it was so bequeathed. This is a Motion in which the conduct of the worst Chief Secretary that Ireland has ever seen is impeached by the best Chief Secretary ever sent to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, during his brief administration, did inspire respect for law, because his Government attracted the confidence of the people. He attracted to the Government the affection of the people because he proved that his Government desired the good of Ireland, and intended to promote it. He promoted the common interests of this Realm because he led the Irish people and the different peoples to unite themselves together in what is the only sure and lasting bond—the bond of a voluntary union, the bond of common interest. I say he handed down to the present Government a legacy of respect for the law and an affection for the Government; and if any Member of this House feels inclined to challenge this statement, I ask him if the public life of this country in recent years supplies any parallel to such a demonstration of popular affection as the farewell that was given to the Earl of Aberdeen, or the reception given by the people of the capital of Ireland to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle when he visited it at the opening of this year? Yes, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman did bequeath to his Successors a legacy of respect for law and an affection for Government, and the highest compliment that I can pay to the right hon. Gentleman, the strongest proof that can be given of his power, is this, that though his Successor has gravely impaired the legacy of respect and affection bequeathed to him, he has not yet been able to destroy it utterly, and, Sir, I entertain the hope that when the Liberal Unionist aberration of intellect shall have passed away, and when sanity shall resume its sway, the right hon. Member for Newcastle will return to Ireland as the last

Imperial Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. If it can be proved that the Government have undermined respect for the law the rest of the Motion must stand, because, where they do, the minds of the people must be estranged from the Government, and where the minds of the people are estranged not only are the interests of the Realm damaged but the stability of the Realm is endangered. There are just two ways and no more for producing respect for the law. You may do it by terror, and you may produce it by deserving the confidence of the people. I ask how the Coercion Act produced the respect that is due to fear? Turn to the 1st section of the Act by which the Government were authorized and empowered to set up a Star Chamber in Ireland. It has been set up in different parts of Ireland, and what has happened under it? Impudent agents of the Government have impertinently attempted to introduce themselves into the most private and confidential affairs of life. They have attempted to come between father and son, between parishioner and priest, between banker and client. In various parts of Ireland men in different grades of society have been sent to prison, some for taking no notice of the summons, some for declining to take the oath, and some for flinging back impertinent questions, and I lay down without fear of contradiction that in no one case where a man has been imprisoned for contumacy has his imprisonment succeeded in compelling him to answer. Your Star Chamber has proved to be a dead letter. One of the principal purposes of the Coercion Act was the suppression of the National League. Have they suppressed the National League? We are already confronted with the evidence of two Members of the Government, one of whom says it is a thing of the past, and another that it has a ubiquitous existence. The National League has nominally been suppressed in certain districts, but where it has been suppressed proof is given in the new interest and fresh vigour of its existence. Only the other day a priest who was summoned for attending a National League meeting was escorted to the Court by 500 men wearing cards of membership in their hats. This Act was aimed at the liberty of the Press. Editors and printers have been imprisoned for reporting the meetings of suppressed branches. The Government have chased and cuffed poor newsboys about the street. They have punished men selling newspapers with reports of suppressed meetings by long terms of imprisonment. Have they stopped the publication of these reports? No; they have increased them. They are widely published in the popular Press of Ireland and are read with more avidity. If proof were wanted I have here a copy of a newspaper of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland is a very careful student—it is United Ireland of last Saturday, and I find on its leading page the heading “Suppressed Branches,” followed by several columns of this prohibited matter. The League is altogether suppressed in the County Clare. It is there a thing of the past, yet I find that there were held and are here reported the meetings of 14 branches, and in almost every one of them a parish clergyman was in the chair. Law never falls into such utter disrepute as when it is seen to be impotent as well as repulsive. If the Leader of the House were here I would put the question to him; but he has contracted a habit of saying “Certainly, Sir,” which detracts from the value of his evidence. I would therefore ask any independent Member of the House whether the Government, in order to cover their defeat, have not abandoned themselves to a fiction. That is what has occurred, for they have stated that the National League has been suppressed, when, as a matter of fact, the action of the Government has tended to strengthen it. Well, I think the Act has not promoted but it has undermined and annihilated the respect of the people. Has it not undermined the respect that is due to the sense of the people that law is conceived in their interest and administered for their good? I turn again for one moment to the 1st section of the Act. Why did not the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in his long and tortuous speech, explain why, within the last few days, he applied the 1st section to the County and the City of Dublin? He would not allege crime. He could not allege disturbance. We have before us the Report of the Commission Judge, and he had before him the Report of the Inspector of Police, and the police in Ireland take notice not only of crimes but of symptoms, and the Judges from the Bench discuss symptoms as well as crimes. If there had been anything to call for notice in the state of the County or the City of Dublin the Inspector of Police would have noted it in his Report, and the Judge would have made it the subject of comment in his charge. There is no crime; but because he apprehends crime in the County and the City of Dublin he very arbitrarily, and without a shadow of cause, has applied to that county and city the 1st section — has applied to 500,000 people the humiliation and the insult of wantonly setting up a Star Chamber in their midst, and all that he can say in defence of his unaccountable action is that although crime does not exist in Dublin, that something may be done in Dublin at some time or another that may blossom into crime. Sir, reasoning like that would justify the massacre of the innocents. That also was taking time by the forelock. That was a measure of State policy conducted by a high official with very much the same object, for certain infants were got out of the way for fear that when grown up that they might blossom into agitators. I, Sir, have a right to speak for the citizens of Dublin, and I tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he dares without a shadow of a cause of justification to set up his Star Chamber in that City, after having inflicted the humiliation and insult of authorizing the establishment of that Chamber—if he sets that Chamber at work and lays every citizen of Dublin open to have his private affairs examined without any means of vindicating his character before the public—I tell him that if a Star Chamber is set up in Dublin, the inquisition will be severely dealt with. I ask, is not respect for law undermined when men can have no respect for its administration? The principal use of this Act is the administration of the summary powers conferred by it. And who are the men who are administering those powers? We have heard a great deal about the Resident Magistrates. They are the most nondescript and maudlin collection of curiosities in the Public Service of the world. They receive a certificate of competency which would no doubt be useful to them if they were but jockeys. Who are those men? A few of them are briefless, a score of them are incapacitated commanders, another score of them are ex-officers of the police, and some of them, to my own knowledge, are men who were mere ignorant idlers, pitchforked on to the coercion bench for no better reason than that any man can discover than that the Government were satisfied by their practical experience as to their being fit for nothing useful, and that, therefore, they might possibly be fit for that. These magistrates, in the main, have no practical knowledge of the law, and no experience of public affairs, and they are opposed by social prejudice and personal interest to the mass of the people. Let me give two or three examples of them. Mr. Hamilton is a man who fawned upon the hon. Member for North-East Cork when he thought the Home Rule Bill might possibly become law. He is the same Mr. Hamilton who wrote a letter to you, Sir, and who was unable to state the charge in legal language. Then there is Colonel Carew, who declared from the Bench that he represented the Crown, and who said that he had received his orders from the Government and dared not disobey them. I can easily believe him. Obedience to the will of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the satisfying of his desires is the condition on which these men receive their appointments. Mr. Dillon, another of these magistrates, declared from the Bench that a Proclamation from the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made a meeting illegal, and that the Proclamation had been issued by virtue of the Coercion Act, while we who are neither lawyers nor magistrates are well aware that no Proclamation of the Chief Secretary or of the Government of Ireland can make a meeting illegal, and that even if it could be, he has no power to issue proclamations. Captain Massey and Mr. Irwin, two more of these magistrates, have laid down from the Bench the doctrine that the Coercion Act overturns the fundamental rule of law because in it they ruled that the onus of proof of guilt does not lie upon the Crown, but that the onus of proof of innocence lies upon the defendant. Mr. Cecil Roche imagines that when he consented to state a case that the option of the Court to which the case was to be stated lay not with the defendant but with himself. Mr. Cecil Roche gives a man a month in gaol for laughing at a policeman, and Mr. Cecil Roche gets himself into a judicial temper and beats the people with his stick before he goes on the Bench, and after his judicial duties are over sallies out from the Bench and escorts the prisoners to a railway station. His custom—or, at any rate, he has upon more than four occasions ordered a rifle butt end charge at the people in the street, and takes a leading part in the attack himself. Those are the administrators of the law, and those being the administrators of the law, what respect for law can there be? One of the many pie-crust pledges made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the House during the passage of the Act was upset when the Solicitor General for Ireland assured us the other day that it was the duty of the stipendiaries to state a case when required except upon a frivolous application. Now, Sir, I have followed closely, except for one period of six weeks, the whole course of the Coercion Act, and I lay down broadly this assertion, that it has been the almost invariable rule of the stipendiaries under this Act to refuse to state their reasons and to refuse to record the ground of the application and to refuse to state a case, no matter how good the ground of application might be. But how was it with regard to appeals? The Chief Secretary for Ireland promised an appeal in every case. How has the pledge been kept? The law was left in such a condition that no man could get an appeal at all unless his sentence exceeded imprisonment for a month. Although the Chief Secretary for Ireland ingeniously pretends that he has no control over the Resident Magistrates, and that he does not direct their action, I would recall the memory of this House to his speech to his own constituents last year, where he pointed out to his constituents, but really to his servants in Ireland, the inconvenience of long sentences and the inconvenience of allowing public men to be at large in the interval between the infliction of the sentence and the hearing of the appeal, and the superior advantage of the infliction of short sentences from that point of view. The effect, Sir, was instant and signal. The speech was as effective as a circular from Dublin Castle. The stipendiaries forthwith began to pass short sentences of a month and under, which deprived the men upon whom they were inflicted of their right of appeal. In case that might not be satisfactory to the Government owing to the lightening of the punishment, the plot was completed by the lawyers of the Crown, for they initiated at the same time a system of cumulative sentences—a system repugnant to the idea of justice and the spirit of the law—a principle by which they carved out of the same Act a series of offences and of charges. As, for instance, Sir, if a man made a speech at a public meeting they charged him first with an unlawful assembly, they charged him then, for the same speech, with taking part in unlawful conspiracy to incite, and then they charged him with inciting other people to take part in the conspiracy. Upon each of these three charges the man was tried, and upon each of them a separate sentence was inflicted. These separate sentences amounted to a good long term. The Government were satisfied by the severity of the sentences, and the liberties of the subject in Ireland were absolutely left to the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his menials at the bar and on the Bench; but the progress went one step further, and was conducted in this way—when a sentence was passed upon a public man long enough to allow him to appeal, he was, upon being admitted to bail, immediately re-arrested, tried upon another charge, and put into gaol for a period not long enough to entitle him to appeal, but long enough to embarrass his defence and to keep him in prison until his appeal came on to be heard. I will refer to the case of the hon. Member for South Galway (Mr. Sheehy), who was imprisoned for a public speech. He was charged with delivering a public speech. He was sentenced to imprisonment for three months. He was admitted to bail, and the moment he had given bail and was set at liberty, upon leaving the Court he was re-arrested and was taken to Clonmel. He was there tried in respect of a speech which had already been used against him in his trial at Roscommon—which had been used, Sir, to ensure his conviction; and, to increase the measure of his guilt, he was sentenced a second time upon that speech to be imprisoned for a term short enough to prevent him from appealing, and then during that term he was kept in prison he was prevented from arranging and preparing his defence, and he was taken from the prison to the hearing of his appeal into the midst of his own constituents in the garb of a common criminal. I also refer to the case of my hon. Friend the Member for East Clare (Mr. Cox). He was tried for the delivery of a public speech, and was sentenced at Ennis to a period long enough to prevent him from appealing. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. He was liberated on bail. Upon being set at liberty, he was instantly re-arrested, and four days later he was brought before the same Court, before the same magistrates, and tried a second time upon a charge carved out of the same speech; and upon that second charge he was not admitted to bail, although he had been admitted to bail in respect of the heavier conviction. He was sent to prison, and kept in prison, until the time for the hearing of his appeal came on. Sir, this is the system by which the right of appeal which the Chief Secretary for Ireland promised has been extinguished, and the plot culminated in the action by which three or four County Court Judges suddenly amazed the country by increasing and doubling sentences on appeal—an act which, whether technically illegal or not, was as repugnant to the spirit of justice as any act by any Judge could well be. It aroused such a tempest of indignation in this country that by no County Court Judge in Ireland is such action likely to be repeated. Now, Sir, I have shown that the people of Ireland were practically left, in violation of pledges, at the mercy of the Stipendiaries; but, Sir, these Stipendiaries have been amusing themselves for the past year by sending people to prison on the charge of unlawful assembly. Now, what is an unlawful assembly in Ireland? I am not a lawyer, and I do not attempt to define it. A man is sent to prison in Ireland under the Coercion Act, and his farm is left to go waste and his wife and family left to starve, and if the neighbours come to plough or to sow his land, or to give food or fuel to his family, the police break in upon that gathering, and that becomes an unlawful assembly. A public man in Ireland is arrested, and the people cheer him on his way to prison. That is an unlawful assembly. If a coercion prisoner is released, and his neighbours meet him outside the gaol to welcome him back to liberty and to accompany him to his home, the police break in upon that occasion also, and it becomes an unlawful assembly. If upon any occasion of a gathering in Ireland anyone groans at the Chief Secretary for Ireland—which a great many people are certainly inclined to do—or if anyone cheers the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian—which chiefly means the popular inclination in Ireland—the police make the groan or the cheer the pretext for the attack, and the gathering of the people becomes an unlawful assembly; and every man upon whom the police chooses to lay hands on on such an occasion is sent to prison, sometimes for months and sometimes with hard labour, upon a charge of taking part in an unlawful assembly. A man is sent to gaol with hard labour for taking part in meetings of the suppressed branches of the National League. What has been the evidence? Has it been proved the meetings of the suppressed branches have been held? Not at all. The Stipendiaries never stop to ask for such evidence. A number of men are seen going into a house, and the police are not aware of what happens in the house. They charge the men with holding a meeting of the suppressed branch of the League, and the Coercion Stipendiaries Massey and Redmond have wisely laid it down that the onus of proof does not lie on the Crown but on the men. But the main function of the Coercion Act has been in reference to charges of conspiracy, I have closely followed the working of the Act, I have read the evidence published in every case since the Act passed into law, and I say that no such case has come to my knowledge of conviction for conspiracy under the 2nd section of the Act which the judgment of the Court of Exchequer does not render an illegal conviction. A charge of conspiracy under the Act is a new-fangled charge. The Chief Secretary stated that the Act created no new crime, but, in truth it is studded with brand-new crime. The Chief Baron himself declared the other day that an indictment for the kind of conspiracy charged in this section could not have been maintained in any Court before the Act passed into law. What does the right hon. Gentleman say to that? I confront him with the declaration of the Lord Chief Baron. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer has made it plain that a conspiracy amongst persons not to deal is not an offence against the Act. Then I say that the convictions for conspiracy since the Act passed into law have been illegal, because I cannot call to mind one single case in which the Crown have ventured to go one inch beyond that. The Lord Chief Baron and his brother Judges have laid it down that in order to establish a charge of conspiracy the word "induce" must be understood to mean compulsion, and, in effect, intimidation, and in these cases not a shadow of this intimidation is found. The Government have sheltered their magistrates under the plea of mistake. But there could be no mistake in the Castlemartyr case. In the case of David Barry, what mistake could there have been about the man who sold the bread and wanted to give the money back because he would not be a black sheep more than the others, and would rather give the bread than receive money for it? How can any Judge or magistrate pretend that he was compelled by others not to deal with the police? It was not a mistake on the part of these magistrates if, when they tried the Castlemartyr case, they had before them the judgment in the Court of Exchequer in the case of Sullivan the blacksmith. That judgment declared that it was necessary to prove in these cases that compulsion had been exercised upon others. It was a warning and direction to them, and to every other magistrate in Ireland, that no conviction for conspiracy could be found unless compulsion was proved. They ignored that judgment. They trampled upon it, and they disgraced even the tainted Bench of which they are members. And the right hon. Gentleman, nevertheless, has declared to-night that these men are to be continued in their places to deride the judgments of Superior Courts, and to oppress and imprison innocent, helpless, and inoffensive men. I, for my part, am scarcely sorry for it, and I should not be sorry if they were promoted and included in the next batch of C. B.'s, because it is owing to their scandals and illegal acts that the Government will be eventually overthrown. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the Castlemartyr case rules the case of Mr. Dillon. Now, this Act was applied to the county of Louth in order to entrap

Mr. Dillon. He is as ready as any man in this House, or in the world, to face the consequences of his acts under any law that the Government may devise. We do not complain of this. What we do complain of is that the Government thought nothing of abolishing the dearest interests of 100,000 people in an Irish county—a most crimeless county, against which not even the shadow of a case has been made out—for the sole and simple purpose of imprisoning one man, and placing a gag upon the lips of one man, whose voice they fear when it is addressed to the English people. If Mr. Dillon's speech at Tullyallen was sufficient, why did they give in evidence against him the speech of another hon. Gentleman which was not made the subject of a charge? They gave in evidence a speech made two years ago, before the Coercion Act was passed, and a speech for which he had already been tried by a carefully selected jury and not convicted, and that in contravention of a pledge that no such step should be taken under the Coercion Act. Mr. Dillon was charged with taking part in an unlawful conspiracy to compel and induce others to commit an offence. Why were not some of those with whom he joined identified and placed in the dock with him? If the Government were honest in their desire to keep down crime in Ireland they would welcome the speeches of Mr. Dillon and of others. Mr. Dillon's speech at Tullyallen was the most powerful protest against crime which ever proceeded from the lips of a public man. When Mr. Dillon said that the lives of traitors would be an unhappy one, he meant it in the same sense in which the lives of blacklegs and thieves would be unhappy. The unhappiness was the unhappiness of those who act against the interests of the people and against the public welfare. Why was he sentenced to six months' imprisonment? Because, as the magistrate said, he was a man of power. But what a sad commentary is that upon the spirit of your rule. The same thing which makes a man a leader if he is born in England makes him a prisoner if he is born in Ireland. Mr. Dillon took his case to the County Court; but the Judge, acting upon the instructions of the Government to refuse facilities as far as possible for the effectuation of justice, refused to make the order in such a form as to enable it to be reviewed. The County Court Judge who sent Mr. Dillon to prison was appointed by the Chief Secretary, and is as zealous a partizan as any man in Ireland. Such is the course of procedure, absurd and illegal as it is, and such are the functionaries by whose procurement Mr. Dillon has been sent to prison and others have been subjected by a Government who profess to desire the conciliation of the people of Ireland to the loss of liberty. They have been, as is the case with some of my hon. Friends, assaulted by warders, stripped of their clothes in gaol, allowed to stand naked for hours together, clothed in the garb of the criminal, tortured on the plank bed by deprivation of sleep, shut up in holes, and starved on bread and water for days and weeks for refusal to perform the meanest tasks associated with criminals. Such is the record of one year of the Coercion Act, and such being the record of one year of the Act, how long do you think the Act will endure? It will last as long as its authors last—perhaps so long—but certainly not one day longer. And how long will they last? Two years ago they went into the Lobby with a majority of 140. Will they pretend that they have that majority now? The answer is often given. It began at Burnley a good long time ago, and it has continued in many constituencies. It was given the other day with crushing emphasis at Southampton, and it was delivered last night in unmistakable terms by the Member for Ayrshire. The Ministry does not depend on the Tory Party. They do not constitute one-half the House, and they have not even the power to issue a Writ for filling up a seat. The real authors of the Coercion Act and its efficient guardians are to be found on this side of the House in the Liberal Unionist Party. The Coercion Act could never have been enacted, and without them and without their favour it could not last a single day. What is the position of the Liberal Unionists? They have been compared to a criminal in a condemned cell. The comparison was in several senses most apposite, because they may while they stay here drag out an unhappy kind of life. They will stay here as long as they can, but when the day comes which obliges them to go forth, that day will mark their doom.

Mr. Sexton

The Liberal Unionists in this House enjoy a kind of life, but what is to become of them in the country? The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) puts on the airs of a Party Leader; but can he return a Member for any seat in Great Britain? Nay, more, is there a seat in Great Britain at the present moment where, if a contest occurred, a published letter from the noble Lord would not ensure the defeat of the candidate whom he favoured? The Liberal Unionist Party, so far as concerns the public life of this country, is nothing more than a mouldy relic. It is offensive to every sense, and the only remedy is to bury it on the first available occasion. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale is the head of it, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) is one of the joints of its decomposing tail. Such is the moral condition of the authority of the Government and their Confederates. What is our position? At the General Election, a few years ago, you left us two-thirds of the seats without a contest and without even nominating a candidate, and for every contest that took place in the other third, we won against you a greater relative majority than that by which the power of the Government was sustained. Our moral and elective authority is increasing every day, while yours is decreasing and is on the wane. But you have a majority here to-night; the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle can be defeated, your votes will defeat him; but what respect will your votes command? The day of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has come. He need not ask the Removables opposite to state a case for him, for he has appealed to what is happily the final court of his country—the conscience of the people. We believe that the British public, or the greater part of it, are weary of the cruel use of this Act and of its corrupt administration, and their abhorrence of it will burst out into a moral insurrection when they find that under it a Chief Secretary for Ireland, at the instigation of a faction, can become the gaoler of a man more powerful in Ireland than the Chief Secretary is in England, more respected in England than the Chief Secretary is anywhere. The people of England will appreciate the use to which the Act is being put;

and, for my part, I make no doubt that if to-morrow the gaoler and the prisoner should appear together before a free and open assembly, not of the classes, but of the fair-minded British people, who hate all tyranny and abominate all meanness, the gaoler in his new red gown as Doctor of Coercion Law, and John Dillon, in convict's garb—I make no doubt that public approval and public welcome would be given not to the Minister who has made himself the willing instrument to the greed and revenge of a class, but to the Representative who forfeited his liberty and is risking his very life in what is to him—and what ought to be to him—the most worthy, the most sacred cause upon this earth—the cause of the homes and the liberties of his people.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) BILL.

[BILL 11.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be read a second time on Friday."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) rose to a point of Order, and asked Mr. Speaker if, under the Resolution the House had that day passed, the suspension of the Rule closing debate at midnight only applied to the debate just concluded, and then, seeing that 1 o'clock was passed, should not Mr. Speaker, under the One o'clock Rule, at once vacate the Chair without Motion put, the remaining Orders of the Day standing over until the next day's Sitting?

MR. SPEAKER said, the House passed a Resolution providing that the debate on a particular Motion should not be interrupted at 12 o'clock, and at the termination of the proceedings for which such provision was made the operation of the usual Rule, until then suspended, began.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he submitted, simply for ruling, and not as argument, that it was only in regard to a particular Motion leave was given, and that then the One o'clock Rule remained absolute.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would remind the hon. and learned Member that the Rule to which he alluded had reference to Morning Sittings.

Question put, and agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Chance, Mr. Maurice Healy.)

[BILL 166.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) if the Government proposed to offer opposition to the Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) said, he would not say that ultimately the Government would object to the Bill; but he would ask that the second reading should be postponed to next week.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Jackson.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said although the hour was late, he certainly thought the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, who invariably made a courteous response to any request addressed to him, should offer some explanation of the Bill and why the country had to pay this amount of money. The right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the arrangement of Government Business would do wisely if he brought on these Money Bills at a time when some discussion would be possible for the public benefit, and not after a tedious sitting and a succession of long speeches to which Members of the Government had largely contributed. It was not becoming that large sums of money should be voted away and not a word said as to why they were granted. Let right hon. Gentlemen, who were public servants, explain to the public why they asked for the money; and if any points required discussion let them be debated, seeing that the suspension of the Rule allowed the sitting to be prolonged ad infinitum, though, for his own part, he was averse to a sitting being prolonged for the purpose of forcing through such a measure. He added one more to the many protests he had made against these Bills being taken at an hour when many hon. Members interested were absent, having had no intimation that such Business would be brought on. When there was such an outcry against the waste of public money, it was more than ever the duty of hon. Members to discuss these financial items; but the Government took upon themselves time after time to endeavour to sneak through some measure of the kind, always ready with the excuse that, like the baby in the Midshipman Easy story, "it was such a little one." But by a little at a time they managed to get through a great deal of money, and speaking in all solemn earnestness, and certain that many Members shared his view, he declared it highly improper to pass important Money Bills at that late hour without some protest against such discreditable manoeuvres on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.), said, the hon. Member was a little hard upon him.

DR. TANNER: No; never hard on you.

MR. JACKSON said, it would be very much more to his satisfaction if he were able to bring on these Bills earlier. But the hon. Member was under some misapprehension, this was no question of proposing a Vote of money; the Bill merely gave effect to a Vote the House had already passed. The House had voted the money in Committee of Ways and Means, and in accordance with the Resolution this Bill was introduced. Therefore, he hoped the doubts of the hon. Member would be dispelled, and he might rest assured that whenever an opportunity offered of bringing on these Bills earlier it should be taken advantage of.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, the practice of setting down Government Orders on a private Members' day was quite an innovation. To the Bill in its present stage he had no objection, and he was quite sure his hon. Friend would withdraw his opposition, but a protest against this insidious practice of the Government was not out of place. Already the Government had acquired a large proportion of the time usually allotted to private Members, and were about to ask for more; but not content with their large powers, they set down these Bills on Tuesday. On such a practice the House should look with great jealousy, and hon. Members should preserve to themselves such shreds of the public time as they yet retained. He took the opportunity of acknowledging the correction of Mr. Speaker on the point of Order he raised earlier.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London), said, the rule by which these Bills were taken at any hour of the night originated in 1870, and under an authority that hon. Members opposite should respect—that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone).

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) said, a word of protest was due from an English Member, for it would not be quite seemly to leave a protest of this kind—first, against the impropriety of taking Money Bills at so late an hour, and, secondly, against the monopoly of private Members' time by the Government—entirely in the hands of hon. Friends from Ireland. He only now wished to emphasize the protest he and others had made on previous occasions, that it might not be said they had less regard for the interests of the country than hon. Gentlemen who came from the other side of the Channel. As to the usual tu quoque of the worthy alderman, it mattered not a straw whether it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, or any one else, who in 1870 laid down any Rule of the kind. Many things had happened since then, ideas had changed, and Members of the advanced Democratic Party said, no matter who passed the Rule, it was a monstrous injustice to the people and a scandal to the House that public money should be voted at such an hour.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, he hoped the hon. Member would not withdraw his opposition. It was a growing habit of Her Majesty's Government to ask for a Vote of many millions on account, promising Members that there should be opportunity for full discussion when the Votes came on. But what did this amount to? The other night afforded an example. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) interrupted a debate of great interest, after it had proceeded for an hour and a-half, by moving the closure. Then the House was asked to pass the stages of the Bill at any hour quite as a matter of form. He hoped the protest would be sufficient to induce the Government to postpone the Bill to a Government day.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, the Bill provided for the advance of some £5,500,000 sterling for Consolidated Fund purposes, and it also gave the Government power of borrowing that amount. But the limit of interest to which the Government was tied was 5 per cent. Now, inasmuch as the Government had been pluming itself on the ability to borrow at less than 3 per cent, and had converted 3 per Cents into 2½ per Cent Consols, it struck one at first sight, in the absence of any explanation, that it was rather a strange thing that for this comparatively small sum the Government should take power to pay at the rate of 5 per cent on advances in connection with this particular Bill. Could the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury explain that apparent anomaly?

MR. JACKSON said, it was only with the indulgence of the House he could speak again. No change, so far as the Bill was concerned, was made as compared with its predecessors, and, as formerly, it included the power of borrowing money if necessary; and upon the possibility of borrowing being necessary, it was always usual to insert the maximum rate of interest, 5 per cent. But, as the hon. Member knew, the Government could borrow money at much less than that rate; the last Treasury Bills, he believed, were granted at a trifle over 1 per cent.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Then, why insert 5?

MR. JACKSON said, it was a purely arbitrary figure inserted, beyond which the Treasury might not go; but there was not the least intention of giving 5 per cent, or anything like it.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he hoped opposition would not be persisted in to what was a purely formal measure. It was too late to raise the questions as to the expenditure involved in a Ways and Means Bill. He agreed with much that had been said about taking Votes at a late hour. The Civil Service Votes were in a state of arrear, for which he believed there was no precedent in recent years. But this being a purely formal stage, the Government might in fairness claim that the third reading should be taken now.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham. Rushcliffe) said, he was glad to hear these remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to the condition of Supply, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would convey to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury the strong view that was entertained that very soon the House should have the opportunity of fairly considering Votes in Committee of Supply.

MR. JACKSON said, the hon. Gentleman would very soon have that opportunity.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) said, he had listened to the conversation, and it seemed to him they were rather being taken advantage of in being detained until half-past 1 o'clock, when they ought to have gone home when the debate of the night closed; and to put his protest into form, he moved that the debate be adjourned.

—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) said, he seconded that Motion. In addition to the observations offered in the first instance against proceeding with the Bill, now his hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had drawn attention to the practice of putting down Government Bills on private Members' nights, and reprobated that objectionable practice. Then he learned, from the course of the discussion, that this was merely a formal measure, and since that was the case, and there was an objection on principle to its being taken on a private Members' night, the Government might generously yield the point, and defer the Bill to Thursday. The result would be no injury would be done, while there would be an admission that the practice was a novel one, and it might be accepted as a pledge that the Government would not persist in the evil practice.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) said, he desired to join in the appeal.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. SPEAKER not assenting,

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

MR. E. ROBERTSON, continuing, said, it was said this was a purely formal Motion, and on that ground they were appealed to to withdraw opposition. But he was not prepared to admit that any proceeding of the House was purely formal. It was the right of any Member to rise upon any proposal connected with the proceedings of the House. If the hon. Member persisted with his Motion he would go with him into the Lobby.

MR. JACKSON said, he did not think he should be consulting the convenience of the House if he entered at that hour into an unseemly wrangle. Hon. Members had rightly described this stage of the Bill as formal; but it was, unfortunately, one of those formal stages necessary to pass before the Government could use the money. He would point out to the House that the postponement of these matters placed the Government in a very awkward position for carrying on the Service of the country. The Bill had been down on the Orders for some time—he would be extremely sorry to use words that might give offence to any hon. Member—but everybody must clearly understand that this purely formal Motion, supported by his right hon. Predecessor in Office from the other side, was, notwithstanding this appeal, opposed—this formal third reading stage of a Money Bill, necessary for carrying on the Business of the country—was opposed simply for the sake of putting the Government in a difficulty. [An hon. MEMBER: The novelty of the practice!] There was no novelty in the practice of putting down a Bill founded on a Resolution in Ways and Means, and necessary to provide money for the Service of the country, day by day, for successive stages. He was speaking in the hearing of those who had knowledge of the usual practice. However, having regard to those who had long been sitting in the House, and the officers of the House, he would not resist the Motion which had been made. But he hoped the House would understand the reason why he assented to it was, because opposition had been most unreasonably raised to a purely formal Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, before the Motion was agreed to, he should like to say that if the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had thought proper to give an answer to a very reasonable Question put to him early in the day as to a Morning Sitting on Friday, the Government might have met with a very different reception from below the Gangway. He put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury as to Friday's Business, and instead of receiving the information he sought, he was not even told if there would be a Morning Sitting or not. Therefore, to say that a formal stage had been refused merely to spite the Government, when, on their part, the Government refused to answer a most respectful Question, was to make a complaint that reciprocity was not all on one side. The hon. Gentleman probably was wise in terminating an unpleasant controversy by postponing the Bill, though, so far as he (Mr. T. M. Healy) was personally concerned, he would have been glad to accede to the request to pass the Bill, and had said as much, but let it be understood that complaints of want of courtesy did not rest entirely with the Government.

MR. JACKSON said, he hoped the House would allow him a word in defence of his right hon. Friend, who was absent. The hon. and learned Member was doing his right hon. Friend an injustice. He could not answer the Question when it was put to him, simply because the Order of Business was not then settled, and could not be settled until to-morrow. It was quite impossible for his right hon. Friend to give the information.

MR. T. M. HEALY said his Question was whether there would be a Morning Sitting.

MR. JACKSON said, not even that was settled, but the hon. and learned Member should know between this and Thursday. There was not the least desire to be discourteous, and no one was more desirous to avoid that, and to meet the wishes of the House, than his right hon. Friend; but the fact was, it was impossible for him to give the information asked for.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE said, it was in no spirit of factious opposition that hon. Members on that side had acted in regard to the Bill. It appeared to him that the Government Business was conducted in a remarkably loose way, if they were unable to say on Tuesday what Business they proposed to take on the Thursday and Friday. Equally extraordinary was the statement that the conduct of the Business of the country would be seriously interfered with if the final stage of a Money Bill was postponed for 48 hours.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Two o'clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CHANNEL TUNNEL (EXPERIMENTAL WORKS) BILL.—(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe), in moving the second reading, said, that the Bill was promoted by 600 or 700 gentlemen and a few ladies. Among the number were Members of that House and Members of the other House of Parliament, together with representatives of the great staple industries and commerce of the country. He wished they could have had upon the present occasion a more effective advocate.

There had been a good deal of letter and pamphlet writing on the subject, and a considerable amount of misconception and misrepresentation in regard to it. Only that morning there was an article in The Times to which he wished to direct particular attention. It contained one of the most glaring misstatements he ever remembered to have read. The article said—

“ We are promised a great increase of trade if we construct a Tunnel and avoid the breaking of bulk ; but the fact is judiciously ignored that bulk will have to be broken all the same, because the Continental railway gauge is different from ours.”

In regard to that statement, he could only say that the carriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, built in England on the English gauge, had travelled all over Europe without break of gauge, except in regard to one part of it. Scientifically speaking, no doubt the English gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches was not the gauge of France, Germany, Italy, and Austria, where they used a decimal system of measurement, and there might be a hair's breadth of difference between the gauge of England and on the Continent. The only exception to that substantial continuity was to be found in Russia, where, undoubtedly, there was a different gauge, and goods sent to Russia had to be broken in bulk. He had now to return his thanks to the Leader of the House for having given that day for the discussion of what he ventured to think was one of the most important questions that could be discussed in the industrial and commercial interests of the country. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, would have given a better day, if it could in any way have been conceded; but he had been good enough to say that the question, so far as the action of the Government was concerned, would be treated as an open question, and not as one in regard to which every Supporter of the Government must of necessity vote the same way. He hoped, therefore, that those hon. Gentlemen who carried the rod for the benefit of hon. Members on the other side, would kindly bear that declaration in mind, and not attempt to put any pressure on the ordinary Supporters of the Government, but would in this matter respect the just wishes of the Leader of the House. He thought he might, in return for the kindness of the right hon. Gentleman, call on the Leader of the House to express his sentiments and views in regard to the construction of a Tunnel under the Channel. Undoubtedly, in past times, the right hon. Gentleman was very much in favour of such a means of communication; and, undoubtedly, also, when a Member of the Governments of Lord Derby and Lord Beaconsfield, he was the medium of communications with France, intended, as far as possible, to unite the two countries on the question. He did not think he would be contradicted by anybody when he said that the Government of the Liberal Party and of the Tory Party each coincided in conducting negotiations which led to a complete arrangement between the two countries in favour of the construction of the Tunnel, and led further to the drawing up of a Convention conducted on the part of England by the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Sir Henry Tyler) and others; and on the part of France by certain Commissioners, which Convention was laid on the Table of the House in 1876. The question before the House was hardly a question whether there ought to be a Tunnel under the Channel or not. The Bill before the House was to enable the experiments, which had so far been successful, to be continued, but it contained also, he admitted, provisions under which, if the experiments were successful throughout, the Government of the day, and the Government of the day only, should have power to decide whether the experimental works should be widened into permanent works, and the Tunnel be completed. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade thought it would be better to have those clauses struck out of the Bill, and to confine the measure simply to the continuance of the experiments, the promoters of the Bill would make no objection, although they would regret it. They would regret it because it had always been thought that a great work of this kind, even it were conducted in the first instance by private enterprise, ought to become a National work. It had never been believed by those for whom he spoke that a great structure of this kind should be possessed by private persons, and, therefore, there had been an endeavour in drawing the Bill to facilitate future arrangements which might be considered the most salutary to the country. With regard to experiments, he would remind hon. Members that on two or three previous occasions the House had deliberately, by enactment, sanctioned the prosecution of experiments in order to show whether a Channel Tunnel could be made or not. Therefore, he was asking the House to sanction no new legislation, but merely to enable a number of private individuals, who had done the public service by devoting their time and money to an attempt to solve the question, to provide, as a joint stock company, further money, with a view of solving the question whether the Tunnel could be made or not. The article he had quoted from The Times of that morning spoke very doubtfully as to whether the continuity of the stratum through which the Tunnel would have to pass was an ascertained fact. Now, the measures were in the same position and of the same thickness on both sides of the Channel, and if any doubt existed as to the reasonable proof of continuity, he thought that would be an argument for allowing the experiments to proceed. At the same time, he was bound to say that the French Tunnel Company, who held a Charter under the French Government, had made about 11,000 soundings of the Channel, and if there had been any fault or any breach of continuity between the two sides of the Channel, the geological presumption was that that fault would have been discovered. The position of the matter at present was this—a Convention had been made with the French, but that Convention had either been suspended or, as the French asserted, broken on our side, although the French had laid out their money on the solemn assurance that this country would allow similar works to be constructed on the English side of the Channel. On the French side £80,000 had been expended on works on the faith of the experiment being allowed; but, of course, the works were at a standstill, and no interest could be paid on the capital invested. No doubt they felt aggrieved, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in replying to him, would kindly say what Her Majesty's Government intended to do in regard to the great sacrifices which had been made by the house of Rothschild and others in reference to the experiments.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): On the French side?

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Yes. On this side about £60,000 had been expended; but the expenditure had been useless, for they were interdicted from making one single turn of the boring machine without the permission of the Board of Trade. The work on the two sides had been carried altogether for about 2½ miles; so that about one-tenth of the distance had been experimented upon. They did not propose to ask anyone to subscribe capital for a permanent Tunnel until it was proved to demonstration that the work could be done. Therefore, they desired to have a drift-way cut from one side of the Channel to the other. He did not think that even that "small hole," as it had been called, would be useless, because it might be utilized for the passage of telegraph wires, and the transmission of Her Majesty's mails, to the great advantage and profit of the country, even if the Government of the day did not think it desirable to construct a complete Tunnel through which passengers, baggage, and all kinds of material could pass. That being their object—namely, to complete the drift-way, and, therefore, render it certain, or absolutely uncertain, that the Tunnel could be made, the period of suspension inflicted upon them, unjustly and needlessly, as they believed, by the Board of Trade, had not been entirely lost. They had made experiments in regard to ventilation, as to the kind of carriages to be used, also in respect of the electric lighting of the Tunnel, and as to the mode in which the trains, whether containing goods or passengers, could be lifted up from the Tunnel to the level of the surface of the ground. They had invented a locomotive to work by compressed air, and it had been a great success. The present arrangements seemed to be more costly than steam; but, at the same time, it was found that it could be done at a moderate increase of cost compared with the cost of propulsion by steam. That locomotive would do exactly what the Tunnel machine did when it was worked. Compressed air was used at a pressure of about 20 lbs. to the square inch, and, as the machine turned or the engine moved, the compressed air came out again, thus disposing of all the nonsense which had been uttered about the ventilation of the Tunnel. In regard to lighting the Tunnel, they had taken the advice of the late Sir William Siemens, undoubtedly a very high authority, and improving on that advice, they prepared a scheme by which the Tunnel could be admirably lighted; in fact, made as light as day. The trains would be lifted to the surface by hydraulic power. He came now to the military objections to this Tunnel, and he had something to say about those objections. He proposed to answer one soldier by another soldier. The proposal, he repeated, was to lift the train bodily from the Tunnel level to the ground level, and there was no difficulty about that, as, with the hydraulic system, they might lift almost anything they pleased. That would shorten the length of the Tunnel and place the carriages on the upper level sooner than by any other means. Under those circumstances it seemed to him that the notion of pouring millions of men through the Tunnel from all parts of Europe rather fell to the ground. That was the general position and the general intention of the promoters. The real question that day was whether they were to have their most reasonable request granted, and be allowed to continue these experiments. He must say that he was astonished at any Member of a Department, or of an intelligent Government, interfering with scientific experiments of this kind, especially in connection with a country like this, where every ascertained fact was turned by merchants and traders into money. If the experimental works had not been stopped about five years ago by the Board of Trade, they would have been completed in time to have allowed the placing of a likeness of Her Majesty in the centre of the Tunnel and in time to take possession of that part which was under the sea for the British Empire in the year of Her Majesty's Jubilee. The responsibility of not doing so was not theirs, but that of the Board of Trade. Simple-minded people had an idea that the Board of Trade was intended to protect enterprise, and not to obstruct it. He had already spoken of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, but he could quote the names of a great many personages who had been, and many of whom still were, in favour of the construction of this Tunnel. At the head of the list was the late Prince Consort. He knew it had been denied, or doubted, that the Prince Consort ever expressed himself as in favour of the construction of the Tunnel, and therefore he had obtained a public document which had been published in English, French, German, Italian, and Spanish, and circulated in 1867, the year of the great French Exhibition, which gave a history by the French Tunnel Projectors of the initiation of the enterprise, in which approval of the scheme was expressed by the Prince Consort. The late Mr. Cobden was also in favour of it, and spoke of the construction of a submarine Tunnel as the best means of securing a true alliance between the two countries. He thought that England would become isolated, and more and more restricted in regard to that continuity of transit which existed almost throughout Europe. The book he quoted contained this passage—

“The first time that we had the opportunity of talking to Lord Palmerston on the subject of the Submarine Tunnel, we found him at first rather close. ‘What! you pretend to ask us to contribute to a work the object of which is to shorten a distance which we find already too short!’ We expressed to him our wish to talk of it to Prince Albert in his presence, and to that he very kindly consented. The Prince Consort had supported this project with truly enthusiastic sympathy. His reception, therefore, was most kind. He entered into conversation, in which the Prince unfolded all the advantages which his elevated mind foresaw for England in the creation of a road to the Continent. Lord Palmerston, without losing that perfectly courteous tone which was habitual with him, made, however, a remark to the Prince which was very rude at bottom—‘You would think quite differently if you had been born in this island.’ We were ourselves perfectly stupefied with this unexpected apostrophe. To make Prince Albert, whose love of the country of his adoption was well known, feel that he was a foreigner, was shocking to us, and we felt deeply hurt. Some days after we went to excuse ourselves with the Prince Consort for having been the cause of this disgraceful incident. The Prince appeared not to have been offended, and told us that he had received that innocent dart as one of the frequent sallies in which Pam dealt. Then he added, that he had said a few words about the Submarine Tunnel to the Queen. Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to answer him in these words—‘You may tell the French engineer that if he can accomplish it, I will give him my blessing in my own name, and in the name of all the ladies of England.’ Lord Palmerston knew this, and whether it worked a sudden change in his thoughts, considering it as public opinion, or whether he was really not so disposed to resistance as he had appeared to be, he said frankly one evening at a numerous party, at which the Tunnel was spoken about—'This project will be carried out, because it is respectable, and because it is favoured by all the ladies of England.' On his side Richard Cobden said at a public meeting—'I consider the Submarine Tunnel as the true arch of alliance between the two countries.' "

He imagined that the late Lord Derby was no mean authority with hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the interests of the country. Well, Lord Derby must have believed that this was an enterprise which ought not to be discouraged, and could have had no belief in the scare in regard to it which distracted the minds of other persons. Therefore he sanctioned the convention with France. The notion of connecting England and France together by a Tunnel originated in this way—57 Members of Parliament, an Archbishop, and a great many merchants, traders, lawyers, and scientific men sent a memorial to the Emperor of the French, asking him to consent to such an undertaking. The Tunnel was thus initiated on this side of the water, and if ever it were made, as he believed it would be made to the great advantage both of England, France, and every civilized nation, the credit would be due to Lord Richard Grosvenor, as he was known in that House, or Lord Stalbridge, as he was known in the other House; and also, whatever their present opinions might be, to the house of Rothschild. There had been plenty of supporters of the Tunnel, and many opinions in favour of its construction expressed on the part of leading persons in this country with regard to it. The newspapers also were, at no distant date, strongly in favour of the construction of the Tunnel. He would read an extract from a letter written by a very remarkable man, the late Sir Moses Montefiore, who died in 1885, at the age of 101. In 1882, Sir Moses Montefiore wrote this letter to him—

"The receipt and perusal of your esteemed note has afforded me great pleasure. In thanking you, which I do most heartily, for your kind offer to accompany me on a visit to the works of the Channel Tunnel, I regret to say that the state of my health is such as to preclude the possibility of my availing myself at present of the honour you have most kindly proposed to confer on me; but I do not give up the hope of attending its christening, and of hearing his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury name it. I am one of those who think that every great work—and such the Channel Tunnel undoubtedly is—should bear the name of its promoter, and that no undertaking can prosper without the blessing of God."

In an article on September 11th, 1873, The Times said—

"On our side of the Channel everything that contributes to the development of French commerce, or that adds to the stake held by the French nation in the friendly rivalry in which there are no vanquished, will be regarded with feelings of unmixed satisfaction. An improvement which brings Paris 90 minutes nearer to us will probably induce many Englishmen to go twice where they go once under the existing conditions, and a submarine railway or a harbour in connection with a line of steamers warranted to prevent sea sickness, would take travellers across on pretence as slight as those which now bring the residents in the provinces to spend 24 hours in London. To make France as accessible as Scotland, and far more accessible than Ireland, would be to have the sentiments cordials on such conditions of mutual satisfaction and advantage that it is difficult to conceive the circumstances under which they could be broken down."

On December 8th, 1874, The Times again referred in approving words to the Tunnel, and spoke in high terms of the excellence of the project. On the 30th of January, 1875, The Times said—

"The project of a Channel Tunnel has now been finally sanctioned by the Governments of Great Britain and France. In France some difficulty arose from the Law of 1841, which required that the project should be declared 'of public utility' before an official concession in its favour could be definitive, and not merely contingent; but, as our Paris correspondent stated yesterday, the difficulty has been overcome, and this formality will have been completed before the passing of the Bill which the Minister of Public Works has laid before the Assembly. A despatch, dated January 26, intimated the consent of the English Government to the proposed arrangements, subject to certain conditions—among others, that the right to suspend traffic on war being imminent shall be an express article of the agreement, and that the exercise of this right shall be made no ground for claiming indemnity. The French Government has assented; but thinks it just that a term of extension equal to such suspension of traffic should be given to the 99 years' concession and the 30 years' monopoly. Seventy-three Chambers of Commerce have been consulted, and all approve, twenty-seven of these demanding, however, that there should be no indefinite monopoly, but that the State should have power to purchase, and that a tariff of maximum rates should be fixed. Whatever may be the practical result of this great enterprise—and we wish it all success—it will always remain an honourable example of persevering scientific effort and of international co-operation for the common good."

He would not trouble the House with more than he could help, but he wanted to show the Government and the House that as far as the newspapers were concerned, they were at the time in favour of the enterprise. It may be said there had been a change of opinion, but he was afraid there had only been a change of editors. The Daily Telegraph on the 2nd December, 1868, said—

"No guarantee is asked, if, as these three Englishmen and also one very scientific French engineer firmly believe, the Tunnel is feasible. We have not forgotten that, alone among his colleagues, Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was disposed to give a Government guarantee to the entrepreneurs of the Atlantic Cable."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I am afraid that is a mistake.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, the right hon. Gentleman informed him that it was a mistake about the guarantee. The Daily News of the 2nd January, 1875, spoke favourably of the project, and said—

"The opening of such a communication between this country and the Continent will be a pure gain to the commercial and social interests on both sides. It obliterates the Channel, as far as it hinders direct communication; yet keeps it intact for all those advantages of severance from the political complications of the Continent, which no generation has more thoroughly appreciated than our own. The commercial advantages of the communication must necessarily be beyond all calculation. A link between the two chief capitals of Western Europe which would annex our railway system to the whole of the railways of the Continent would practically widen the world to pleasure and travel, and every kind of enterprise. The 300,000 travellers who cross the Channel every year would probably become 3,000,000 if the sea were practically taken out of the way by a safe and quick communication under it. The journey to Paris would be very little more than that from London to Liverpool. It is, however, quite needless to enlarge on these advantages. The Channel Tunnel is the crowning enterprise of an age of vast engineering works. Its accomplishment is to be desired from every point of view; and, should it be successful, it will be as beneficent in its results as the other great triumphs of the science of our time."

He now desired to say a word or two in regard to the military objections. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Edward Hamley), who was a Member of that House, wished to have spoken upon the question last year, and intended to follow the Secretary to the Board of Trade. It must be remembered that a Division was taken somewhat suddenly, at the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House. The request was a reasonable one, and was therefore complied with. The next day the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who had been unable to take part in the debate, wrote a letter to The Times, and he (Sir E. Watkin) took it for granted that the objections stated in that letter were the objections of that section of the military classes who opposed the construction of the Tunnel as being dangerous to the State. The objections of the hon. and gallant Gentleman were similar to those that were put forward on a previous occasion by the Under Secretary to the Colonies, then Secretary to the Board of Trade (Baron Henry de Worms), but his arguments were demolished in three words by the Chairman of Committees, who spoke of them as a "combination of bogeyism and fogginess." The gallant general said—

"I will now take the other case. I will suppose that an invasion should take place after the making of the Tunnel—that is to say, when there is a great highway between France and England, the possession of both ends of which would render the invader independent of the sea. Of course, we hear it insisted on that we could always prevent the enemy from using the Tunnel, either by partially or completely destroying it. Now, that a work of this extensive character, involving such an amount of labour and such expenditure, should be absolutely and permanently destroyed, possibly on a false alarm, is what I refuse to believe. I do not believe that shareholders would be found to join in an undertaking that might be liable to such a catastrophe. I, therefore, dismiss the question of complete destruction, and assume that either our end of the Tunnel would be blocked, or some partial destruction would be resorted to. Now, there are many parts of our Southern Coasts where large forces can be thrown on shore, under cover of the fire of their warships, superior to what we could at the moment assemble; and, therefore, secure of possessing themselves of a certain area beyond the immediate landing place. If they were thus landed at or near Dover, they would assuredly seize the mine of the Tunnel and open it, whether by repair or otherwise. Thus it would be rendered available for the enemy, and what would we then see? Night and day a storm of troops and supplies would be pouring through the Tunnel, possibly under the heels of our victorious, but helpless, Channel Fleet. Now in this case—and I would impress this point—it would no longer be a contest between two armies, but between the entire military resources of France on the one side, and what we could oppose on the other—and who could doubt the result, if France could bring all her trained armies, all her vast military establishments, to bear upon us? And who can doubt that in the Treaty which would ensue, a main article would empower her to hold our issue of the Tunnel and to protect it by works on the heights of Dover? And this thorn in our side—in our vitals—we might never be rid of."

An hon. MEMBER asked who the gallant Gentleman referred to was?

Sir Edward Watkin

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: General Sir Edward Hamley.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he meant the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley), whose name he had used in answering the question instead of the place he represented. The hon. and gallant General had had great experience, and had published a book which he hoped would assist in the manufacture of many excellent soldiers. They knew that in the Convention concluded and laid before the House in 1876, provision was made for closing the Tunnel in the event of war. That point had not been neglected. Sir Frederick Bramwell and Mr. Brady, their engineers, and no mean authorities, said that by a simple arrangement the Tunnel could be closed by drowning a portion of it in three minutes, while it would take three months to pump the water out again, even if there were machinery on the spot. Then, again, they had designed a machine by which a Minister of the State or any responsible military officer in any part of England, by touching a button, could explode a mine and blow up the entrance of the Tunnel. They had, in fact, 30 different modes for closing or destroying the Tunnel; therefore he wished it to be understood that they had anticipated all these objections, and he thought if the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead would devote his attention to what had been proposed before he wrote letters to newspapers, it might lead to a better result. He had said that he would answer one soldier by another soldier. He would answer the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead by quoting the opinion of a gallant officer who had been one of his own pupils—he meant Colonel Hozier. Everyone knew that Colonel Hozier was a gallant soldier, and that he had had an advantage which no other officer had of having been the correspondent for The Times in the war in Denmark, in the war between Prussia and Austria, and in the Franco-German War. On each occasion he had served on the Staff of the Crown Prince, the late Emperor, whom he described as the noblest man he ever met, and no one knew better than he did the opinions of German military men on this and many other questions. Colonel Hozier said—

“It has been argued that, if the Tunnel existed, we might be defeated somewhere else and be obliged to surrender it and allow our enemies to use it as they liked. If we were so heavily defeated as to have to make any terms our enemies chose, would not the first demand be, ‘Give up your Navy?’ We must never be defeated, but keep up the Army and Navy at such a strength that such a contingency could not be possible. Another objection is, that we shall get slack in the course of time, and allow our sentries to get negligent, and some one might arrive and take us; but if our sentries are so liable to be negligent, and our outposts to be so careless, we ought to be anxious at the present moment. Why should not Gibraltar be seized to-morrow by the Spaniards? The sentries there have not yet gone to sleep. If our soldiers are not to be trusted, what is the good of building fortifications? This argument against the Tunnel is the fantastic idea of some disordered imagination.”

He (Sir Edward Watkin) quite agreed with the opinion that we must never be defeated, and he would go very far with hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House in increasing our Army and Navy in any way that was deemed necessary. He advocated the construction of the Tunnel, because he believed that it would be one of the best means of defence, and, at times, of offence, which could possibly be provided. It was Colonel Hozier's opinion that the arguments against the Tunnel were only the fantastic idea of a disordered imagination. One ground on which the advocates of the Tunnel relied was that it formed a second line of supply in case the sea was closed to us, and assuming that we were not at war with France. He would read a few words that were uttered by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), who took such deep interest in the Navy. The noble and gallant Lord remembered, no doubt, that we imported into this country 40 per cent of our food, and all of our raw material except flax from Ireland and the wool we got from our own sheep; and the noble and gallant Lord pointed out that if England were crippled at sea, we should be starved by a blockade. Then what we wanted was a second line of communication that would enable us to pour supplies into the country, and relieve us from the difficulty caused by the obstruction of our supply from America and other parts of the world. He maintained that it was necessary for the safety of the country that we should have a second line of supply, and not be altogether dependent upon the sea. The construction of the Channel Tunnel would strengthen instead of weakening our military position. Foreign Nations would know that, unless we happened to be at war with France, of which he thought there was no probability, except through our own fault, it would be impossible to defeat us by stopping our supplies. Therefore, the construction of a Channel Tunnel was a project which would give us exactly that which we required. One contention of the promoters of the Tunnel was that the Governments of both countries, having once sanctioned the undertaking, neither could honourably retire. They maintained that it would promote and secure peace with France. What was France? France, it should be remembered, was not only our nearest neighbour, but our best foreign customer save one. The trade between France and this country amounted to £51,000,000 sterling per annum. People talked of France as if we had no interest in it at all. In the time of Queen Anne an Act was passed, declaring that trade with France was a common nuisance, and ought to be abated. That seemed to be the sentiment of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). Those, however, were not the propositions which he (Sir Edward Watkin) laid down, and he wanted to know from the Government if they were prepared to take the responsibility of saying that we should never have under any circumstances, or at any time, a second means of obtaining our supplies irrespective of the sea. We might increase our Navy to any conceivable extent; but with the cumbrous and untried ships we had, and their immense weight, could anyone tell us that, at any moment, a naval disaster might not cripple the capacity of our Navy? Then, would Her Majesty's Government take the responsibility, before the House and the country, of saying that, under no circumstances would they ever sanction the formation of a second line of supply in the interests of our commerce and our people? What was England? Industry and commerce. Take away her trade and commerce, and what support would there be for her Forces, either on land or sea? It might be said that there was no great outcry for the Tunnel, but that was because no great agitation had ever been got up in its favour, as they believed they would one day find a Government sensible enough to rise above all fear and panic and look to the future from a broad and prudent point of view. The best national insurance we could possibly have was to provide a second line of communication independent of the sea. As far as foreign opinion went, the great strategist, Count Von Moltke, and other German officers, had distinctly declared that the idea of invading England through the Tunnel was perfectly absurd. Count Von Moltke said, they might just as well try to invade England through his library door. The proposal was to construct two single lines of tunnel, as it was believed they would be in every way better than one, and each would be about the size of the door of that chamber. Yet they were told that all the Queen's horses and all the Queen's men would be insufficient to enable them to defend two small holes of that nature against the enemy. He thought the whole thing was absurd on the face of it. The late Secretary to the Board of Trade, Sir Thomas Farrer, was an enthusiastic supporter of the Channel Tunnel, and another official of the Board of Trade, Mr. Giffen, gave evidence before a Joint Committee. Being asked, with reference to the statement of the Commander-in-Chief and Lord Wolseley that the Tunnel would make it necessary to expend £3,000,000 in turning Dover into a first-class fortress, he said—

"I have looked at the question from that point of view, assuming the statements that have been made by Lord Wolseley and the Duke of Cambridge, and others, in their military Reports on the matter; and what I should like to put before the Committee upon that subject is with regard to the expense of making a first-class fortress, which is one of the main points upon which Lord Wolseley and the Duke insist. The expenditure of £3,000,000 sterling would be equal to an annual charge of £90,000, and I think that would be quite an insignificant sum compared with the commercial advantages alone of the Tunnel, if it answers at all the expectations which the promoters put forward, and which I think to a large extent are well founded."

That was Mr. Giffen's opinion. If they had to expend this money in the way proposed, Mr. Giffen said the commercial advantages that would be gained would be so great that they would save money by doing so. He thought that Mr. Giffen's opinion ought to have some weight with the Board of Trade. He would like now to ask another question—namely, why the Government took upon themselves the responsibility for refusing for all time to come, if they could, this second line of supply? What was the reason they resisted fulfilling the pledges which they, as a Conservative Government, gave through the right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), by the instruction of Lord Beaconsfield—whom, he supposed, was still considered a sagacious man—and of Lord Derby? What was the reason why they had now changed their front, and refused to consent to this most reasonable proposition? He would put these points to the Government. Even with an increased Navy, as desired by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), England might be subjected to a naval reverse, even although the five men-of-war and the cruisers asked for by the noble and gallant Lord were provided. The noble and gallant Lord said, when interviewed by The Pall Mall Gazette—

“They are making a great fuss in the House of Commons about the defencelessness of London, &c., and so long as the Navy leaves something to be desired they are right in wishing to strengthen the Army; but I do, and I shall, insist that England must rule the seas, if she expects to rule anything. In the House of Commons four or five of us from the Navy stood against 20 times as many Army men, and so we had hard work to make ourselves felt; but is it not evident that were England beaten in the waters which form her only frontier, the enemy would have only to block her food supplies and let her starve? They would conquer us without striking a blow. England can never be saved by her Army. Therefore, as it is our sole hope, our Navy must be very strong, very much stronger. I maintain now, as I have always maintained, that we want five more men-of-war and 23 more cruisers. Then we will be safe, and not until then.”

No man could say, as an infallible certainty, that whatever the extent of our Fleet we might not be subjected to naval reverses. Then, why should not Her Majesty's Government sanction a second line of communication which would prevent our being starved if blockaded? He wished to know why the Convention of 1876 was to be repudiated? No doubt, if it was repudiated it would be from a fear of France. The late President of France, M. Grévy, declared to a deputation of English workmen, who waited upon him three or four years ago, that—

“He regarded the Tunnel as a magnificent enterprise, and one involving the happiest effects. It was not, therefore, on that side of the Channel that any objection would be raised. France did not anticipate or fear invasion.”

[An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] “Hear, hear!” said the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and there they had the voice of prejudice at once. President Grévy made use of further expressions which were very important, and which he asked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to answer if he could. The words were—

“But it was not for him to judge the pre-occupations of eminent Englishmen. It was in England that the opposition existed. They had addressed themselves to the French workmen, who were certainly in harmony with them; but what influence could they exercise over public opinion in England? It was for England to reflect and decide. If England thought isolation and separation the best for her, she was the best judge. This was the only reply he could give so far as the Tunnel was concerned. No objection would be raised against it in France. It was purely an English question.”

On this question what did foreign nations and our own Colonies say about the construction of the Tunnel? Why, our Colonies were almost to a man in favour of it. Everybody in the United States laughed at our fears, and they knew very well that if England belonged to the United States, which, perhaps, might be the case some day for anything he knew, did they think that 24 hours would elapse before they began to connect themselves with France? He believed that we should increase our power and our commerce by putting aside our prejudices. The construction of the Tunnel was chiefly opposed by men who had narrow naval or military views, who discussed the question in cabins and drawing rooms, by half-informed editors, and by men who knew nothing of the great work. Some of them could not pass a thoroughly good examination in geography, and knew nothing about the great commercial requirements of the day. In America, as he had said, they spoke with contempt of the fears with which we chose to indulge in in this country. In Australia, every man to whom he had spoken had expressed a strong opinion of the folly of pursuing the line of action which the Government proposed to take with reference to this important question, and denounced our cruelty in compelling them, after they had crossed the ocean to visit us, unnecessarily to undergo all the horrors of the middle passage between this country and France. Caricatures were the laughing voice of nations. He would produce only two, out of hundreds issued in different parts of the world. One published in the United States represented the British Lion running away with his tail between his legs from one end of the Tunnel, with Lord Wolseley on his back, frightened by the crowing of a Gallic cock. Another cartoon, published in Spain, represented a British soldier with a great number of shells, swords, and guns around him, saying—"I am so afraid of being invaded." One man might be seen in the distance, and a few rats running out of the Tunnel. He was ashamed that we should allow ourselves to be made the laughing-stock of all nations. By doing so we were weakening our moral power and our prestige. He would conclude the few observations which the House had listened to so patiently and so kindly by quoting a letter which he stumbled across the other day. It was a letter written by the then King of Hanover to Lord Strangford, at the time of the opening of the Great Exhibition of 1851, in which he said—

"The folly and absurdity of the Queen in allowing this trumpery show must strike every sensible and well-thinking mind, and I am astonished the Ministers themselves do not insist on her at least going to Osborne during the Exhibition, as no human being can possibly answer for what may occur on the occasion. The idea of permitting 3,000 National Guards to come over en corps, and parade London in their side-arms, must shock every honest and well-meaning Englishman. But it seems everything is combining to lower us in the eyes of Europe."

He was afraid that the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade was animated by a similar spirit to that which had dictated the writing of that letter. He thanked the House for its indulgence, and he would only repeat his questions to the right hon. Baronet. He trusted that the right hon. Baronet would give him a plain, explicit, and unmistakable answer. Would the Government take the responsibility of preventing, if it could, for all time the construction of a second line of supply independent of the sea; would the Government explain to the House their reasons for their change of policy; and would they tell the House, if they objected to the construction of the Channel Tunnel as a means of national protection and national insurance, what they themselves would propose? He trusted that the House of Commons would not throw unnecessary obstacles in the way of one of the greatest works which had been conceived in modern times. The opinions of some of the best and most able men of the country were in favour of the project. He trusted, therefore, that the House of Commons would rise superior to the prejudices of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade, and would do justice to the promoters of the Bill, by referring the Bill to a Select Committee, which was all the promoters asked. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time, and be sent to a Select Committee to be inquired into in the ordinary way.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): My duty in this case is to follow the example of those who have represented the Board of Trade in this House, and to move that this Bill be read a second time this day three months. The hon. Member has used a great many hard words with regard to the Board of Trade. I do not wish to go into the relations that have existed between the hon. Member and the Board of Trade; but if any complaint is to be made in respect to those relations, it should be made rather with regard to the conduct of the hon. Member towards the Board of Trade than that of the Department towards the hon. Member.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: I rise to Order. Surely the right hon. Gentleman knows that I have had a letter from a former President of the Board of Trade thanking me for my conduct and for the very useful information which I had given to the Department.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: We have been told that the information given by the hon. Gentleman was neither candid nor accurate when the right hon.

Sir Edward Watkin

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was President of the Board of Trade. But I do not wish to enter into that matter. It is not merely on Departmental grounds that I oppose this Bill; I speak on behalf of the whole of Her Majesty's Government. I saw the other day a most extraordinary statement that went the round of the Press to the effect that it was the intention of the Government to treat this matter as an open question. I did not contradict that statement; I treated it with contempt. But we have heard to day from the hon. Member that that statement was made upon the authority of no less a person than my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Certainly.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: On the authority of the First Lord of the Treasury?

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Yes.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Then I can tell the hon. Member that that statement is absolutely without foundation.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say so himself? No; he will not do so.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes; he will. These are the words which my right hon. Friend has authorized me to state to the House—

"I told Sir Edward Watkin that the Government had considered his proposals, and had come to the conclusion that they would oppose the second reading; and, further, that the President of the Board of Trade would move its rejection, and, therefore, there must be Government Sellers."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: That is quite true, but not all the truth.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Therefore it is that I say that in moving the rejection of this measure I am doing so as completely on behalf of the Government as any of my Predecessors in Office in former years. At the outset of my observations I would deprecate the attempt of the hon. Member to minimize the importance of the Bill he has introduced. The hon. Member, in moving the second reading, described it as a Bill merely to authorize the continuance of a scientific experiment which it would be in the power of the Government of the day at any time to put an immediate stop to. But I know what would be the consequence if this House should, unfortunately, sanction the second reading of the Bill. The hon. Member himself would be the first to attribute great importance to the action of the House, and to assert that the House, by sanctioning the second reading of the measure, had not merely sanctioned the continuance of a scientific experiment, but had approved the principle of the construction of the Channel Tunnel. I will prove that by what the hon. Member has himself stated to-day. The hon. Member has put it before the House as a great grievance that whereas at one time the Governments of England and France looked with favour upon the scheme of the Channel Tunnel, and encouraged an experiment in which preliminary expenses were incurred, there was subsequently a change of policy; and he has actually suggested that, on this account, compensation ought to be given by the Government to a French firm which made this experiment and expended money under a French Charter upon the other side of the Channel. No, Sir; the fact is that we have before us a proposal to institute experiments which, if successful, would, according to the hon. Gentleman, be subsequently carried on to the completion of the works which he advocates. Therefore, the question we are asked to decide to-day is not a question of mere scientific experiments, but the principle of the Channel Tunnel. Well, Sir, I may say at once that I am opposed to that principle. I do not wish to discuss whether the construction of the Channel Tunnel is feasible. It may or may not be so, although that is a point upon which the hon. Member has not given the House or the public sufficient information. I do not want to dwell upon the sufficiency of the very varying estimates which at one time or another have been put before a credulous public—["Oh, oh!"]—Yes; I repeat before a credulous public, by the hon. Member, as to the amount of capital that would be required for the completion of such a work, or upon the probability of it proving a commercial success, if ever it were to be completed. These are matters upon which Parliament would certainly require to be fully and amply satisfied before they authorized the construction of this Tunnel. But those are not matters with which we have to deal in the debate to-day. The hon. Member has adverted to the opinions which he says have been expressed on the idea of the construction of a Channel Tunnel by several persons. I leave the House to judge of the good taste of the hon. Member in introducing the name of Her Majesty the Queen into such a controversy as this, or of the value of the opinion of a man in his 99th year, like Sir Moses Montefiore. But I say that I disbelieve the assertion of the hon. Member that the late Lord Derby ever gave an opinion in favour of the Channel Tunnel. Moreover, I believe that the hon. Member has entirely misrepresented to the House the opinion of the late Lord Beaconsfield on the question, and I challenge him to produce the letter in which he avers that the noble Lord expressed himself in favour of this scheme. When that letter is produced I believe that it will be found to contain a statement to the effect that the shareholders who might be deluded into taking part in such a scheme would never receive any interest on their money. But, however that may be, this is by no means a Party question, and I trust the House will look at it as that which should be far above Party differences—namely, a question relating to the national security. Well, that is the way in which this question has been considered by authorities whom I think even the hon. Member himself must respect. Those authorities, Parliamentary, military, and scientific, have reported adversely to the construction of the Tunnel as injurious to this country, and the House of Commons, on three previous occasions, has ratified the decision at which those authorities arrived. Now, Sir, what were the reasons on which that decision was based. I will endeavour very shortly to state them to the House. I think it is quite impossible for any reasonable person to deny that the insular position of this country, and the absence of a military frontier, have been of enormous advantage to us in the past, and may prove of enormous advantage in the future. Now, so far as it goes, the construction of the Channel Tunnel would give us a military frontier. It would open a door for attack which does not now exist, and I think it is not a little due to the fact that no such door exists that we have been saved in this Kingdom from the curse of conscription, and that for so many generations we have been spared those horrors of invasion from which every other European country has heavily suffered. Now, the first thing for the House to ask itself is whether—as it cannot be denied that such a door would be opened by the construction of the Channel Tunnel—that door could be closed with absolute certainty in time of danger? [Sir EDWARD WATKIN: Yes.] The hon. Member thinks that it can, and many hon. Members who will support the second reading of the Bill no doubt are of the same opinion; but my own opinion is that there is no such thing as absolute certainty in the conduct of human affairs, and I will venture to quote, if the House will bear with me, some expressions of opinion from high authorities on these matters, who agree in the main with the hon. Member opposite, which I think will show that on this point they are not precisely in accord with his views. The House is aware that this subject was considered by a very able and strong Committee of both Houses of Parliament, and that a Report of unquestionable ability was presented by a minority of that Committee in favour of the scheme of the hon. Member.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In 1883.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes; in 1883. Well, that minority, headed by Lord Lansdowne, admitted that the construction of the Tunnel would in some respect modify the conditions under which the defences of this country would have to be considered, and that special precautions would be necessary to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy; they admitted, further, that its possession either during the progress of operations or an occupation of English soil would be highly advantageous to the invading force and injurious to the nation, and they conceived that if it could be shown that no means could be devised to prevent the Tunnel, when once made, from passing into the hands of the enemy, its formation would be in the highest degree objectionable. The question was, could such means be devised? That was referred to a scientific Committee of military and engineering authorities, who made recommendations for the security of the Tunnel so complicated, so numerous, and so costly, that if they were carried out in any great degree at the expense of the shareholders, as the hon. Member once suggested—he does not, I see, now give any assent to that proposition—they would absolutely deprive the shareholders of any possibilities of making the Tunnel a commercial success. But this scientific Committee reported that while by the means they recommended the Tunnel might be made absolutely useless to an enemy it would be presumptuous to place absolute confidence in the most complete arrangements for preventing it from falling into the hands of an enemy, thus absolutely negating the presumption on which the Minority Report of Lord Lansdowne was based. Now, the hon. Member treated almost with ridicule any idea that we could possibly ever be at war with France. I hope and pray that such a calamity to both nations may never occur, but it is simply folly and madness to shut our eyes to the fact that wars between these countries, of the most serious character, have occurred. It is possible that they may occur again, and we have no right in this House to look at this question of the Channel Tunnel without reference to the possibility of war between this country and France. Now, I do not imagine that it has ever been contended by those military experts to whom the hon. Member—who is not a soldier himself—has referred in terms of remarkable contempt, that if in a war between France and England the English end of the Tunnel were in our possession the French would attempt to invade this country by sending an army through the Tunnel; but what has been contended is this—that there might be the possibility of surprise. Such things have happened in past wars, and the House will remember that they have sometimes happened without a previous declaration of war. One notable case is that in which we seized the Danish Fleet in 1807. Surprise might be attempted and made successful through treachery, for who will guarantee the loyalty to this country of all of the employés of a cosmopolitan company, many of the shareholders in which might be Frenchmen themselves? It might be aided by delay on the part of the authorities, or by the failure of the action of the apparatus for flooding the Tunnel in a moment of danger, because, of course, you never could test such an apparatus to see whether it would work when required. We should have no guarantee for its continuous efficiency, and I should like to know what Government would not hesitate until the very last moment before it gave the order for causing such a great destruction of property as would result from the flooding or blocking of the Tunnel? But supposing this danger avoided, the order given, the Tunnel blocked or flooded, and the risk of surprise or treachery gone, would not the English end of the Tunnel still remain as a point of the gravest anxiety to this country during the progress of a war? It would be the first point of contemplated attack by our enemies throughout. I will not attempt to express an opinion as to the possibility, military or engineering, of such an operation; but we hear a great deal in these days about the likelihood of an invasion of England. Surely it would be a much easier and simpler operation to send over a force sufficient to seize and hold the English end of the Tunnel for such time as would be necessary to repair and pump it out? Then, how can the hon. Member ridicule the idea that if this were once done, troops might be poured from France through the Tunnel in such numbers as would render it very fortunate for us if we ever secured the possession of the key of England again? I dare say that hon. Members will say that these ideas are exaggerated; but I would submit this to their consideration. There is no doubt that these opinions are widely entertained in this country. They are held by great military authorities, and have been enforced by able writers in the Press; and they have taken, and will take, hold very largely of public opinion. Do you think that that public opinion, so influenced, would have no bearing upon our military and naval expenditure? Do hon. Members opposite who are anxious for economy, and who are endeavouring in every possible and impossible way to promote it in these matters, think that they are doing something likely to tend to economy in military and naval expenditure by adding a greater scare to the scares which already exist? I venture to say that with every rumour of war on the Continent there would be fresh demands for fortifications, armaments, and garrisons for the defence of the English end of the Tunnel. At all events, even the hon. Member for Hythe will admit, if he will not take the burden of erecting these fortifications upon the shareholders of his Company, that the nation would have to spend a considerable sum for the purpose of providing fortifications, armaments, and garrisons, and that thousands of men, whether added to the strength already existing of the Army or taken from their present duties, would be fixed in one spot in peace and in war, their services being required for the protection of the Tunnel. Therefore, on the ground of risk, possible rather than probable though that risk may be, but even more on the ground of the great addition to our expenditure which such risk would certainly cause, I am opposed to the construction of such a Tunnel as this. But I should like to know what are the advantages which are held out to us? The hon. Member tells us that the construction of the Tunnel would promote and secure peace with France; and he charges us by implication to-day, and in so many words in his former speeches, with a policy of isolation and separation, the logical end of which must be to strain the relations and possibly lead to war between the two countries. I maintain that our insular position is the best security for peace. I believe that it saves many opportunities of quarrel and much temptation to an invasion of this country. Our relations with France now are admitted even by the hon. Member to be friendly.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Yes.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: They certainly are so. Then I ask the hon. Member, would he change them for the relations which obviously exist between France and her two powerful Continental neighbours, with whom she has an extended land frontier and such complete means of artificial intercourse by railways, roads, and other methods of communication? You cannot say—it would be ludicrous to pretend—that you can deprive nations of occasions of quarrel by increasing the means of communication between them. The hon. Gentleman made use of two arguments in support of the Bill which I must notice. He said that the Channel Tunnel would provide this country with an additional means of food supply. But if the other end of the Tunnel was in the hands of France, it certainly would not provide us with an additional means of food supply if we were at war with France, and France is the only country which could possibly deprive us for a day of the complete command of the sea. Therefore, what would be the advantage of the hon. Member's Channel Tunnel from that point of view? Then the hon. Gentleman dwelt on the great commercial advantages which would be derived from the proposed undertaking. I give him the benefit of the argument as to the greater ease and comfort of the passengers. He would mitigate the sufferings of many an old lady, and increase largely the passenger traffic. But the suffering might be lessened if the harbours on both sides were so improved as to make it possible to use steamers like the steamers between this country and Ireland, though a large proportion of passengers would prefer a cheaper mode of conveyance. So far as heavy goods traffic is concerned, I do not think the Channel Tunnel would do anything for it at all. I would invite hon. Members to look at the evidence which was given before the Parliamentary Committee. If they will do so, I think they will find conclusive proof upon the subject. For there is not only the difficulty of the break of gauge, which the hon. Member passed over so lightly—

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: There is no such thing as a break of gauge.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: But the hon. Member admitted that there is a break of gauge.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Only in Russia.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: There is not only that question, whatever it may amount to, but there is the fact that a tunnel 20 or 25 miles long could not by any possibility have the same relative capacity for carrying goods in 24 hours as an ordinary railway. If there is to be a great passenger and perishable goods traffic, there would not be room for heavy goods trains, and the cost of the line would be so great that the rates charged must necessarily be high if the shareholders are to get a return for their money, and goods would go by the cheapest route. Another argument is that we are losing the dépôt trade of the Continent, and that by better communication between England and the Continent we might retain that trade. I will tell you of a better and cheaper mode of retaining that trade. It is so to improve our own harbours as to make them better and more accessible to large ships than the harbours of our Continental rivals, and in doing that we should have the additional advantage of benefiting our Mercantile Marine, which, as far as it goes, would be rather injured than benefited by the construction of a Tunnel. I quite grant that the construction of a railway between England and France would, to some extent, stimulate trade, as undoubtedly it would encourage travelling; and it might, therefore, if it were done, be of service to the wealth of this country, and improve the relations between this country and France. But I do not believe that anything would be gained in this way which would not be far outweighed by the injury to trade from the anxiety caused by the perpetually recurring panics, and the feeling of insecurity which would arise from the existence of a Tunnel, and the gain would also, to a great extent, be counterbalanced by the expenditure that would be required for fortifications and defence. I do not know that it is necessary for me to detain the House at any greater length. I would remind the House that on three previous occasions it has rejected this Bill on the second reading. The first occasion was in 1884; and in 1885 it was also rejected, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), speaking on behalf of the Government of the day, moved the same Motion that I am about to make. I do not know what has happened since that time which would induce the House to alter its decision, unless it be that the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Mid Lothian is in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility, and that the rumour is true that on this occasion he is going to give his powerful support to a Bill against which he voted in 1884 and 1885. If that be so, it is even a more remarkable change than the political gyrations of the hon. Member for Hythe himself, for I cannot conceive the faintest reason for it. It may be, for the moment, that the European sky is clearer than it was. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I am trying to give him the benefit of a doubt. It may be that rumours of impending wars are not quite so rife as they were at that time. I do not know that either of those propositions are true, but of one thing I am quite certain—that the causes of great Continental wars exist in as great force now as they did then, and that the excessive armaments of the great Continental Powers have been largely increased since that time. And what is the condition of France? It is, unfortunately, far more unstable now than it was in 1884, and there is an uncertainty about its political future far greater than existed then. What is our condition here? We have a strong feeling abroad, propagated with great diligence, of the insecurity of this country. Is this the time to add to that feeling of insecurity by opening another door to the attack of a possible enemy? Is this the time to give a chance, and a very good chance, for that feeling to be increased, and a scare created which would sweep away the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) and all the economists on that side of the House, and land us in a military and naval expenditure which was never contemplated in the wildest dreams of the right hon. Gentleman when he was Prime Minister? If the right hon. Gentleman opposite has less responsibility now than in 1884, we have greater; and in pursuance of that responsibility it is my duty, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, to ask the House to-day, by refusing to sanction the second reading of this Bill, to maintain inviolate the silver streak which for so many ages past has been the natural and cheap defence of the liberty and the prosperity of our country. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The appeal which has been made to me by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is a very fair appeal.

He has a right to know, and I will endeavour to explain to him, why, having been at the head of the Government in 1884, and having voted against proceeding with the Channel Tunnel Bill, I do not take the same course on the present occasion. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken for the Government to which he belongs, and, so far, he is in the same position as was my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) when, in 1885, he asked the House to put a negative upon the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman will at once perceive the broad and vital difference between the speech which he has now made in stating the grounds for his proceeding and the speech which was then made by my right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman has opposed the Channel Tunnel Bill, I am sorry to say, upon its merits—upon grounds which will be as good in any future year as they are at the present moment. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham is not in the House, but I have had within the last week or 10 days an opportunity, through his kindness, of going over the whole ground and testing our several recollections, and I believe I am correct in saying that in the speech of my right hon. Friend there was not one word condemnatory of the Channel Tunnel upon its merits, and that his opposition was an opposition of time, and of time only. For my part, I could not have taken then any other position, and I will presently state why it was that I was a party to opposition on that ground. It is a matter of justice to the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) and to the promoters of the Channel Tunnel, after what happened in 1884 and 1885—I believe these were the years, though I am not certain that I am absolutely correct—that I should explain the view which I took of their case and the reasons which induced me at that period, without any doubt or hesitation, to join in the opposition to the progress of the Bill. I am very glad to think after the debate of last night that we are now engaged in a discussion of a very different kind. I do not think that any person who agrees with me will be induced to vote against the Government from any desire to displace it, or that any Gentleman who will vote with the Government will do so upon the ground that this is one of the sacrifices required from them to protect the country against the danger of a Liberal invasion of the Benches opposite. On the other hand, I am afraid that our arguments in this matter on the one side and on the other are looked upon as singularly unsatisfactory by our opponents. On political questions we often feel that, at any rate, there is something in what the other man says; but on this occasion we seem to get at the ultimate principles and modes of thinking which are fixed on one side and fixed on the other, and which would lead us, if we used the language that occurs to us, to describe the opposite arguments in very disrespectful terms. The right hon. Gentleman has stated his case with force, clearness, and ability; and yet I frankly own—and frankness is, after all, a great virtue—the whole of the considerations he has advanced, and his arguments against this Tunnel, are neither better nor worse than mere and sheer bugbears. Having gone thus far in the exercise of frankness, I will for the rest of my speech endeavour to fall back on the virtue of courtesy; and I will not recur to the use of any language of that character, by which I only meant to illustrate the position in which we stand to one another, and which we unhappily aggravated in 1884. Now, Sir, this subject was first introduced to me by a Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was first introduced to me in the year 1865 by a gentleman whose name will always be mentioned with respect in this House—I mean Mr. Ward Hunt. He was not Chancellor of the Exchequer at that exact time, for I was. He came to me as the leader of a deputation, and endeavoured to induce—or perhaps I should say seduce—me, the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Lord Palmerston, into giving my support to the promotion of this dangerous project. Mr. Ward Hunt was totally insensible of the dreadful nature of the petition he was making—notwithstanding his position in the Conservative Party, he was totally unaware of all the dangers that have been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. And here, Sir, I am obliged to correct a statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Hythe, who, on the authority of somebody or another, alleged that I alone among the Ministers of that day was disposed to give a guarantee in some shape or other to the promoters of the project. I was never disposed to give a guarantee to the extent of one single farthing to the promoters of this scheme, or any other scheme of a similar kind. I find it necessary, for my own credit perhaps, at any rate for the truth of history, to disclaim it. Sir, I was instructed on behalf of the Government, and with my own full concurrence, to refuse a guarantee; but we did so without giving the slightest indication of any opposition to the Tunnel scheme. A series of other Governments followed, and every one of those Governments officially committed itself on the merits of the Tunnel. Lord Granville on the part of the Government of 1868; Lord Derby on the part of the Government of 1874; and, I think, the senior Lord Derby, the distinguished Prime Minister of a former period, expressed precisely similar sentiments; and every one of those Governments, acting unanimously, was engaged so far in the promotion of this project that they gave it their unequivocal sanction. Nor did they stop there, but they entered upon international proceedings. Communications were established with France. A Commission was appointed on the part of the two countries, and I do wish to bring home to the minds of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen the degree to which our honour and our dignity in an international aspect are involved in the question before the House. I must say that that is one of the most serious considerations that operate on my mind with regard to the promotion of this Bill. The two Governments jointly instituted a Commission to consider the details—the important and difficult details—of the schemes by means of which this great project could be best advanced. The principle of the project was taken for granted, on the one side and on the other, when we entered into these general proceedings with the French Government. The Commission laid down conditions which were to be the basis of a Treaty between the two countries, and the actual signature of the Treaty was suspended, not upon the ground of any political apprehension whatever, but simply, I believe, upon the ground that financial considerations did not at that moment favour the progress of the scheme. What dwells upon my mind is this—that there was very much of the character of an engagement of honour in these proceedings between England and France, and that it is a matter of some difficulty to justify the recession of a Kingdom like this from a position of that kind, after you have voluntarily and deliberately, and after long thought and reflection, made it the subject of such international proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman says—and I have no doubt very truly—that there are serious objections raised by the military authorities against the scheme. Well, Sir, at the time I am speaking of, the opinion of the military authorities was in favour of the Tunnel. The two Governments did not act in respect of the Tunnel without consulting the military authorities, and those military authorities whom the Government had to consult were distinctly favourable to the Tunnel. But I think I may go a little further than that, and may venture to read, at least for the purpose of challenging contradiction if it can be challenged, a short extract from a very well-informed memorandum with which I have been supplied on the part of the promoters—and which is one which can easily be brought to issue. The extract to which I refer says—

Now, Sir, that is a remarkable fact. The Tunnel was then a scheme 20 years old. It had been discussed in every possible form. It had been the subject of much official Correspondence, and it had received the assent of a number of Governments. Those Governments would not have assented, and did not assent, without the authority of the Military Department and the advice of their military advisers, and until the year 1881 these portentous discoveries which have taken possession of the mind and imagination of the right hon. Gentleman, and, I suppose, of those who sit near him, were never heard of. Surely that is rather a staggering circumstance. And now I will relate the facts upon which the Government of 1881 and the following years had to base itself in dealing with this subject. At that time we find that the military authorities had commenced their opposition, and a great ferment began to prevail. A combination of powers was brought into operation. The literary authorities were brought to back up the military authorities. Great poets evoked the Muses, and strove, not as great poets in other times used to do, to embolden their countrymen to encounter serious dangers, but to intimidate their countrymen by conjuring up phantoms of danger that were not fit to be presented to anybody except that valuable class of the community that the right hon. Gentleman has described in his speech as suffering occasionally the pains of seasickness. Then, Sir, the Army—the military host and the literary host—were backed by the opinion of what is called “Society,” and society is always ready for the enjoyment of the luxury of a good panic. There is nothing more enjoyable than a good panic when that panic is based on a latent conviction that the thing which it contemplates is not in the least degree likely to happen. These speculative panics—these panics in the air—have an attraction for certain classes of minds that is indescribable, and these classes of minds, I am bound to say, are very largely to be found among the educated portion of society. The subject of this panic never touched the mind of the nation. These things are not accessible to the mind of the nation. They are accessible to what is called the public opinion of the day—that is to say, public opinion manufactured in London by great editors and clubs, who are at all times formidable, and a great power for the purposes of the moment, but who are a greater power and become an overwhelming power, when they are backed by the threefold forces of the military and literary authorities and the social circles of London. Well, Sir, these powers among them created at that period such a panic that even those who were most favourable to the Tunnel, of whom I was one, thought it quite vain to offer a direct opposition. We, therefore, proposed the appointment of a Joint Committee, and the issue of that Joint Committee has been very fairly stated by the right hon. Gentleman. I am bound to make a fair admission—and I do it in the presence of my noble Friend the Member for the Rossendale Division of Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington), whose opinion at the time I do not now remember—that, although in the Government of 1868, to which he and I belonged, there never was a question as to the propriety of the Tunnel, and Lord Granville wrote in that sense, and even instituted communications with France; yet when we come to the Government of 1880, and the circumstances of 1881, 1882, and 1883, a change of opinion did find its way even into the Cabinet. Some of us were what I should call not quite sound and others of us were, and we all agreed that the best thing we could do was to refer the matter to this impartial tribunal. And when that tribunal reported there was no improvement in the circumstances. If I am asked why, under these circumstances, I took part in throwing out the Channel Tunnel Bill, my answer is that we, the Government, were engaged in arduous affairs. Powers were put very freely into action against us at that time which are now happily in abeyance. We deemed that it was our duty to have some regard to the time of Parliament. We knew it was impossible to pass the Bill. It was a time of tempests, and as sensible men in time of tempest are not satisfied with the shelter of an umbrella and seek shelter under the roof of some substantial building, so we acted. Whether or not we ought to have shown more heroism I do not know. But we thought it idle to persevere in a hopeless struggle. We did not in the least condemn the Tunnel on its merits. We did not think there was the slightest chance of proceeding with the Bill to the end, and we, therefore, invited Parliament not to bestow its time on a discussion which we believed to be perfectly useless. That was the principle on which we proceeded at the time. I will say a little upon the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, but I am not going to attempt to follow those arguments as if we were engaged in a debate like that of last night. I do not think it would be expedient or convenient to make this a debate between both sides of the House. There are some on this side of the House who are probably unsound besides those who are usually so; and I hope there are some on that side who are sound, and, therefore, the House is totally without prejudice. But there is one thing which fell from the right hon. Gentleman which I regret, and that was his comparison between the internal condition of France at the present time and the internal condition of France some six or seven years ago. I own I think it was an error to enter upon that chapter of the subject, even if the right hon. Gentleman entertains the opinion which he apparently does entertain. But as he has said that he thinks there is not the same prospect of stability in France now as then, I must give myself the satisfaction so far of expressing quite a different opinion. And I may remind the Government and the House of this—that the French Republic never, since 1870, has been called upon to pass through so severe a crisis as the crisis, not yet, I think, 12 months old, with respect to the appointment of President. That was the most trying experience which it has had to go through, and it made many of its friends and well-wishers tremble as to the issue. It made every sound and right-minded man in France apprehensive of what was to happen, and I rejoice to say that France and the institutions of France came through the struggle with as much calm temper and solidity as any country in the world could have done. That is one thing I feel it right to say in consequence of what fell from the right hon. Gentleman. Following the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I do not touch on the engineering question. Neither will I touch upon the commercial question, except to say frankly that I differ from the right hon. Gentleman, and I believe the commercial advantages of this Tunnel would be enormous. I have nothing, however, to do with engineering or commercial questions. I am here simply as a Member of Parliament to see whether there is any reason why I should withhold my assent to the plan. Now, Sir, I have used the familiar illustration of the umbrella as shelter in a storm. After hearing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I am not quite sure whether the storm is still going on; but I was under the impression that the panic had passed away. My impression has been, and in the main my impression is, that the literary alarm, the social alarm, which backed up the military alarm are very greatly allayed, and that we have now, what we had not five or six years ago, a chance of a fair, temperate, and candid discussion. The right hon. Gentleman refers to a land frontier as if it were an unmixed evil. No doubt it is less secure, upon the whole, than a sea frontier; but he must not forget that a land frontier has enormous advantages with respect to intercourse between man and man, which are of great consequence in the view of those who believe that peace and not war is the natural and proper condition of mankind, and it is to be as we trust to a great extent for this country, at least, the ordinary normal and habitual condition in which we live with foreign countries. But on the question of procuring a land frontier, if it is a land frontier, which I do not think it is, the habitual and standing advantages of a land frontier are enormous compared with its occasional disadvantages and dangers. With regard to the political and military objections, I must say I feel pained, as an Englishman, in considering the extensive revolution of opinion that has taken place. For 20 years this project lived and flourished, difficult in an engineering sense, very difficult in a technical sense, and as a financial question. I do not presume to enter upon those questions, and leave them to those who better understand them—but with no doubt cast on it from the point of view of the security of this country. Now, Sir, a transition from darkness to light has taken place—and it ought to be hailed notwithstanding all the inconveniences which accompany such transitions—and it is rather a serious question for us to consider whether the English nation and Government from 1860 to 1880, or whether the influences which acted during the years 1883-4 and 1885, and which are to some extent acting now, lead us in the right or wrong direction. Speaking of the dangers of a land frontier the right hon. Gentleman, in a lugubrious manner, said that this end of the Tunnel must always be the subject of great anxiety. Well, if this end of the Tunnel is to be the subject of great anxiety, what will the other end be? But, strange to say, I find that the other end of the Tunnel is the subject of no anxiety at all. Many of us are in the habit of considering the French nation as light-minded, with great resources and great ingenuity, talents, and energy, but still light-minded, unlike ourselves, solid, and stable, perhaps rather heavy, but at any rate a very steady-going people, who make up our minds slowly and resolutely, and do not change them. [Laughter.] Oh, I am not speaking for myself—I am only speaking on behalf of my country; but I would ask hon.

Gentlemen to apply this test to the case of the French people. I must say that they have treated this matter with the most dignified self-restraint and consistency throughout. I am bound to give my opinion, and I think the French, had they any other than the most friendly disposition with regard to ourselves, might have made serious complaints of the manner of their treatment in having been invited to embark in this enterprize to an extent only short of the signature of the Treaty when we receded from the ground and left the light-minded people standing in exactly their original attitude, while we—not the nation, but the Government and the circles of opinion known in London—have very considerably altered. Well, but, you will say, the question of our invading France is not a matter to be considered at all. Therefore, the other end of the Tunnel does not seriously enter into the question. The real question that we have before us is the likelihood of the coming of that unhappy day—I agree it is a perfectly possible thing, I think and hope it is nothing more than a possible event, still it must be taken into consideration—when England will be invaded by France. I am very much behind the age in a great many respects, and I am sorry to say very much behind those Representatives of the age who sit on the opposite side of the House, for I have the habit of being guided to a certain extent in anticipations of the future by considerations of the past. I know that it is a mode of looking at a subject entirely dismissed from consideration at present. For about 800 years, beginning from the Conquest, I want to know which country has oftenest invaded the other, and I will state this proposition—that the invasions of France by England have been tenfold more than the invasions of the British Islands by France. Do you believe in a total revolution in the means of action between the two countries? I do not believe it. There has, indeed, been a great change in one matter—that of population. Now, Sir, during the Revolutionary wars what happened? The great Napoleon—the most wonderful general and strategist of modern times, the man of whom Dr. Döllinger says that he raised war as the mode of its planning and execution, not as to its morality, almost to the dignity and attitude of a fine art—addressed the whole of his resources and thoughts to the invasion of England. Ireland was tried three times by the Directory, and three times there were miserable failures. Two other Fleets had set out, one from Holland and one from Spain, and they had been destroyed by the power of British arms at sea. But Napoleon made it a study nightly and daily to devise and arrange the means of invading England, and he was obliged to recede from it as an impossible task. Not that it is an impossible task. Do not suppose that I am going to say anything so extravagant. I am going to say this. It is worth while for those who have these portentous ideas of the power of France, and so small an idea of our means of defence, to consider the relative population of the two countries. At the time when Napoleon prosecuted his schemes the population of Great Britain was 10,000,000; the population of France 22,000,000. I will not count the population of Ireland, for at that period, unfortunately, as at others, it added nothing to the military resources of this country for repelling invasion. Well, 10,000,000 Englishmen constituted the sum of those whom Napoleon had to invade, and he could not manage it. At the present moment this Island contains far more than 30,000,000 men not less strong, not less determined, not less energetic than the 10,000,000 in Napoleon's time at the beginning of the century, and they are close in mere numbers upon the population of France. Here, then, are two countries, and the question is whether one will invade the other by means of the Channel Tunnel? This is a country that has incessantly invaded France, and I am not sorry to say that, though we did it with marvellous success 500 years ago, we have not always been equally successful in recent years, though there is the paramount case of 1815, with respect to which, if a parallel case could be quoted on the other side for the action of England and Wellington, I would admit that there would be something more in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman than I can allow that it contained as matters stand. I shall be told that Napoleon had no steam. That appears to be a strong argument, but it is capable of being used both ways. I believe that the invention of steam, and the great revolution that we have seen in shipbuilding, have enormously increased our means of defence as compared with those of France. I believe that our defensive power in times of crisis would develop itself with a rapidity, to an extent, and with an efficiency that would surpass all previous examples, and would astonish the world. There is one question that I should like to ask—What is the ground taken up by those Gentlemen who point to our security as the main matter which we have to consider? Do they mean, on that ground, to limit our communications with France? Do they mean, as in the time of Queen Anne, to “abate” our trade with France, as being a source of danger and insecurity? “No,” says the right hon. Gentleman opposite; “anything but it; extend your communications to the uttermost; give every facility by which men and material”—for the word “goods” is synonymous with material—“can pass from one country to the other, but do not sanction the construction of this Tunnel.” That is the plan of the right hon. Gentleman. He proposes that the harbours of the country should be enlarged. He set no limit to the range of his philanthropy and enlightened views upon this matter. He has no apprehension upon this subject. Well, my apprehension of invasion is not great; but, if I am to conjure up any prospect of danger, I tell the right hon. Gentleman deliberately that his plan of harbours and great ships and of making the Channel a high road to be crossed with wonderful rapidity presents 10 times the danger that the prospects of the Tunnel could possibly present to the most excitable mind. Now, one word about the opinion of the military authorities. I am not going to speak of them with contempt; on the contrary, I must say that I have the deepest respect for the profession of the soldier, and especially for the function of a commander in the field, charged with the care of large bodies of men, with the duty of making the most of the resources of the country, and with the enormously difficult task of bringing all to bear on a particular point, under particular circumstances, and at a particular time, for the purpose of war. That I deem to be one of the highest and most extraordinary trials to which the human mind can be subjected, and

I do not know any other position in which the demand for energy and the exercise of every great quality of human force is so tremendous and overwhelming. Therefore, for the opinion of Lord Wolseley, whom I believe to be a man extremely valuable to his country in the great and possible contingency of military danger and military effort, I have the profoundest respect, as I have for the opinion of other military authorities. But that respect is mainly due in relation to the operations of war, or measures directly connected with the operations of war. On other matters not so connected their judgment carries weight, and always will carry weight; but in questions of this character the judgments of military authorities cannot be accepted as infallible, and we find that the prescriptions and recommendations of the military authorities of one day or one year are disowned and reversed by the military authorities of another time. We were told in 1860 that Lord Palmerston's fortifications would give us such a state of security that we need never be alarmed again; but have we not had within these latter years alarms more poignant, more startling, more costly than, perhaps, were ever reached before in times of peace, and these fortifications are regarded apparently by those who recommended them with the greatest indifference? If I am asked to rely on the opinion of military authorities as infallible, and required to surrender my own poor judgment and responsibility into their hands, I would quote the name of Alderney. If there is a single creation on earth that may be called the creation of military authority it is the work now represented by the remains, the ruins, the shreds and tatters of the fortifications at Alderney. Save that the funds were supplied from the Treasury, these works were a military creation. I know it is sometimes said that all faults and imperfections in such cases are due to the impertinent interference of civilians; but what civilian had anything to do with the works at Alderney? I had to do with them in the service of yielding to the imperative demands of the military authorities of that day, excellent, able, and highly distinguished men they were, Sir John Burgoyne, Sir Henry Hardinge, and others of whom the country may be proud. They told us that with an expenditure of £150,000 Cherbourg would be sealed up, and no hostile Fleet could ever issue from it. I was the man who proposed this expenditure, and the House agreed to it 35 years ago. But I need not say the matter did not stop there; the expenditure went up to £1,500,000—and I am not sure whether it stopped short of £2,000,000—and of that there now remain but the miserable fragments of that work, a monument of human folly, useless to us as regards any purpose for which we were urged by military authorities to adopt their plan, but perhaps not absolutely useless to a possible enemy, with whom we may at some period have to deal, and who may possibly be able to extract some profit in the way of shelter and accommodation from the ruins. Then take another and very different example from another branch of the subject—I wish to speak of nothing but of which I have some personal knowledge. Everybody knows that in the crisis of a great war the one real and appalling difficulty, if not danger, of this country is the fewness of men, and not the scantiness of any other resources whatever. We were, until the forethought and sagacity of Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell relieved us of the task, in military occupation of the Ionian Islands. Our garrison there used to consist in times of peace of 6,000 or 7,000 men, and I believe it was admitted that, considered in reference to times of war and in reference to Reserves, such soldiers as we should require to have there would stand to our debit in time of war at not less than 12,000 men. I am not speaking of political considerations; but I do not think any man in this House will say it is desirable to be charged with the responsibility of maintaining 12,000 men in a time of a great war for the purpose of maintaining a hold, even if it were otherwise possible, upon Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante and the other Ionian Isles. But at that time military authorities were unanimous in their belief, and strongly urged upon the Government that the maintenance of our military hold upon the Ionian Islands was a great, if not an essential, element in the maintenance of our power in the Mediterranean. Something, we must admit, is to be allowed for the professional zeal of men who know no bounds to the service they render and the sacrifices they are prepared to make when the country has occasion to call for their services; but much also must be allowed for the fallibility of human judgment when applied to an object they consider it necessary to secure, and these are considerations which in some degree equalizes our position, though not absolutely, to the position of the military authorities. It seems ludicrous for a person like myself to give an opinion on the military danger of the Channel Tunnel in the face of the opinion of military authorities; but I cannot get rid of the feeling—and it is simply common sense—that when I endeavour to consider all the points, which I will not now enter upon in detail, I am bound to point out that it is not a safe thing for us to say, “We have military authorities who tell us this thing or that, and we ought to be satisfied,” when of necessity we have before our eyes many exemplary cases where the predictions and injunctions of military authorities have been totally falsified; and when we know that what is preached by the military authorities of to-day is the direct reversal of what was thought and taught by military authorities 20 or 30 years ago. Under the circumstances, I trust we have arrived at a time of comparative calm, when the matter can be considered without prejudice, which was not possible in 1883. If I may presume to refer to an old and homely proverb, “Philip was then drunk;” but Philip is now, I trust, sober, and it is in the sobriety of Philip that I place all my confidence. I hope, Sir, I am not going beyond Parliamentary etiquette, if I express my hearty congratulations that you, Sir, in the midst of the storm and excitement, were one of the men who affixed a signature to the Minority Report on the subject. I believe even now we have arrived at a happier time when the gallant enterprise—for I must call it so, arduous and difficult it is—of my hon. Friend the Member for Hythe has some chance of fair judgment. The opinion of the nation was never against it. A factitious opinion, which is sometimes assumed to be national opinion, was too strong against it at one period, and it was too strong for me, and it even now exists, but weakened and brought within moderate bounds, and there is now some chance for common sense and the exercise of that spirit of enterprize that has been at all times among the noblest characteristics of our country.

SIR EDWARD HAMLEY (Birkenhead) said, they must all admit that the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) possessed the virtue of perseverance, and also the quality of not knowing when he was beaten. Year after year he went on bringing up afresh his rejected scheme for that imaginary work of an unknown future which he called the Channel Tunnel, and he had succeeded in making the public so familiar with it, and with everything that was to be said for and against it, that it was, perhaps, almost unnecessary to recapitulate the conditions of the question. Those who objected to the scheme must be very careful not to attribute to the hon. Member any, not even the most distant, desire to make a profit out of this scheme. The hon. Gentleman alluded to a letter he (Sir Edward Hamley) wrote to The Times last year. The hon. Member for Hythe also replied through The Times, and in his letter took him (Sir Edward Hamley) severely to task for having presumed to allude to the Channel Tunnel as a commercial speculation. More in sorrow than in anger the hon. Gentleman remarked that he would pass by what he pleased to call his (Sir Edward Hamley's) rude allusions as unworthy of notice; and then he took very lofty ground indeed, and talked of the great services rendered gratuitously to the country by those who were engaged in what he styled the grand work of the century. Well, if the Channel Tunnel were the grand work of the century, it must, he (Sir Edward Hamley) supposed, be the work of a Company, and that Company would be got together in the usual manner, and capital would be raised by offering the shares for sale with the usual inducements to purchasers, and therefore the shareholders would be very different persons indeed to those philanthropists who invested their money for the benefit of the human race. But he perceived that this was a tender point with the hon. Member, and therefore he would humour him so far as he had to allude to his Company by calling it a benevolent association. Now, when the matter had been so long discussed, it was in vain to expect that much new matter could be imported into it, and therefore they found in the present debate, as he found in the records of a meeting which was held last month by the promoters of the scheme, that very little that was new had been said, and that nothing had been said which had not been quite as forcibly expressed a score of times before. They had had the usual promise of immense benefits which were to flow from the Tunnel; the usual amount of contempt had been showered on those who were so weak and foolish as to suppose there could be any danger to the country in so beneficent a project. A new feature, however, was introduced at the meeting of the promoters which he had already mentioned. A speaker repeated the arguments used by the hon. Member for Hythe in his letter to The Times, and said that if France could invade us through the Tunnel, we could also invade France through the Tunnel, and then went on in a burst of patriotic valour to suggest that we should not wait for the invasion, but should ourselves become the assailants. To his (Sir Edward Hamley's) very great surprise, this view had also been insisted upon by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). He (Sir Edward Hamley) would only give one reason in reply, which he had no doubt hon. Members opposite would not accept, and that was that for every soldier we could land in France, we should find 10 French soldiers to meet him, and for every gun we should find 10 French guns. To those pusillanimous persons who had doubts about the policy of the Tunnel this might seem to be a sufficient reply. Colonel Hozier had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Hythe, and he had introduced a plausible argument which had some novelty about it, and which he (Sir Edward Hamley), therefore, desired to advert to. He wished to speak of Colonel Hozier with all the respect due to his qualifications for dealing with the military aspect of the question. Colonel Hozier said that if the Tunnel were made, and if we were at peace with France, we could still obtain all the supplies we wanted in this country through France in spite of the enemy's cruisers. To which he (Sir Edward Hamley) would reply, that if we were at peace with France we should be pretty sure to be able to protect ourselves against all other enemies at sea, and that at least we should always retain in such a case the command of the Channel, and so we should then, as now, be able to supply ourselves through France by shipments from that country. Though not much had been said which was new, yet all the old arguments had re-appeared in the present debate. They were once more promised a universal brotherhood as the result of the Tunnel; the Tunnel was to be the highway to the Millennium; and as soon as it was made the South-Eastern Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company of France were to lie down together in its peaceful shades, with, as they were now given to understand, Her Majesty's portrait overhead, and survey their work, and plan fresh schemes for the benefit of mankind. They were also told that great riches and prosperity would flow out of the Tunnel for everybody, especially for France and England. Then the cases were quoted in which tunnels had been made with great advantage under English rivers, as if there was any possible relation between establishing a communication between two English counties and establishing a connection between France and England. Then the old staple argument was trotted out, that the Tunnel would be a guarantee of peace, whereas many of them believed that by offering such a prize to an invader they would be establishing a perpetual inducement to invasion. But to all these promises of prospective advantage, they could still make the old response:—everybody agreed that the Tunnel itself might in certain circumstances constitute a possible danger to this country, a danger of a character which was nothing short of fatal. The friends of the Company maintained that by their precautions they would render this danger unworthy of consideration, and the hon. Member for Hythe had described to them how, by pressing a button somewhere, he could at once destroy the work, which he (Sir Edward Hamley) thought must be very agreeable intelligence for his shareholders. Well, he did not know how the hon. Member might succeed with his precautions, but this he maintained—that whatever precautions might be taken, and however effective they might be supposed to be, still no precautions could have the same value as having no need for precautions which was our case at present; and with such tremendous issues at stake we ought not to be called upon to accept the game, even with the chances which were alleged in our favour. He had formerly presented some arguments against the Tunnel which had never, so far as he knew, been disposed of, and he would only now reproduce one to the House. Putting aside the prospect of foreign troops obtaining possession of our end of the Tunnel, were there no enemies at home who might seize it; had we not those among us who made a boast of their hostility to England? He had heard of an hon. Member upon the opposite Benches on one occasion announcing, within the precincts of that House, that if we were at war he would place his sword at the disposal of the enemy. Considering the hon. Member's profession, he thought it was likely the hon. Gentleman did not mean his sword, but his lancet, which, in his hands, would probably be the more fatal weapon of the two. But, however that might be, the point of the matter was that the will existed there, and that men holding such opinions would acquire an immense importance if they could offer such an inducement to an invader, and we should be crazy indeed if we gave such opportunities to treason. Why, we knew there existed in this country a conspiracy which was maintained and fed by contributions from a vile faction in a foreign land, whose sole motive was malignity to England. He would only further observe that there were many who had considered this question from a military point of view, and who could have no possible reason for opposing the Tunnel as a commercial speculation, yet who had arrived at the very strong conviction that it would not be for the advantage of this country, but very much to the disadvantage, that this enterprize should be allowed to proceed. There was one other circumstance which it was impossible not to notice, because it was an entirely new feature in this question, and that was, that the hon. Member for Hythe had obtained a very remarkable recruit in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). No doubt, the hon. Gentleman was able to give the right hon. Gentleman very cogent reasons. They all of them remembered how an eminent statesman of a former time was described as—

“Straining his throat

To persuade Tommy Townshend to lend him a vote.”

If they substituted another name for “Tommy Townshend,” they might, perhaps, arrive at a faint and distant clue to the reasons which induced the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, at this late stage of his career, to become a convert to the Channel Tunnel. They all felt that when the right hon. Gentleman’s biography came to be written, it would largely consist of the history of his conversions. This conversion by the hon. Member for Hythe was the latest of them up to the present date; let them hope that all hon. Members of the House who might happen to have a dangerous or a mischievous project might not take the surest way of obtaining the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. But he knew that this was tender and delicate ground; for they all felt, especially since last night, how the necessities of the right hon. Gentleman were great and pressing. He would not, therefore, deal with the political view the right hon. Gentleman had expressed; and as to the right hon. Gentleman’s military opinions, he would refrain from following him either to Alderney or to the Ionian Isles. He would only venture to say that the right hon. Gentleman’s conversion appeared to him to be too recent to allow the right hon. Gentleman to gain any knowledge that could possibly be of service to anybody in relation to the present question.

MR. SLAGG (Burnley) said, he felt sure that the speeches which had been addressed to the House by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite must have been received with very great disappointment on the Opposition side of the House from two causes. The first was, that it appeared to be the determination of the Government to oppose a solid front of opposition to the Motion; and the second cause was, that it seemed that the old reputation for courage and self-reliance which hon. Members of the Party opposite used to pride themselves upon had disappeared, and had been replaced by a timid and unworthy state of mind an attitude which took alarm at any old wife’s story. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) referred at some length to the conclusions of the Joint Committee of the two Houses which sat in 1883, but he forgot to give due weight to one or two of those conclusions. It would be within the knowledge of hon. Members that the commercial part of the case in favour of the Channel Tunnel, which he (Mr. Slagg) admitted was a very important part of it, was proved up to the very hilt on the evidence of the most trustworthy commercial witnesses. What did those witnesses give evidence upon? They were almost unanimous in the opinion that means of communication of this description would very largely increase the commercial intercourse of the different countries; that the direct trade not only with France, but with the whole Continent of Europe, would be greatly stimulated; that for light articles of commerce especially, and for costly commodities, the proposed method of transit would be invaluable; and that we might hope, in the future, when this route was established, to see a most useful and profitable augmentation of our trade. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) asked what new reasons there were of a commercial nature which should induce them to go forward with this project? He (Mr. Slagg) ventured to offer to the House one or two new reasons which had developed during the period which had intervened between now and the presentation of the Committee’s Report. The method by which the commerce of the country was conducted had very largely altered. The manufactories of England had for a long time been regarded as specially adapted to the production of large quantities of cheap articles. That method of business was changing, and there was now seen on all hands, in regard to our staple industries, an effort, and a successful effort, to produce also smaller quantities of valuable and artistic articles. He could answer for the Cotton trade, of which he knew something, that a change was rapidly coming over its methods. Whereas the orders used to be mainly for huge bulks of a very limited class of commodities, manufacturers were now applying themselves to produce also smaller quantities of those articles in the production of which taste, skill, and artistic science entered very largely. The hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) would confirm him in the opinion that the same change was prevalent in regard to the trade of Yorkshire; indeed, wherever they turned, they found development and increase in the power of producing artistic work. What did that necessitate? It necessitated, of all things in the world, extended rapid means of transit. We could not now afford the time which used to be expended in taking our goods to their respective markets; time was of the essence of all this business, and where weeks under the former condition were of little consequence, now days, and even hours, were of the greatest significance in making profitable arrangements. The day had gone by when the producers of this country might be confined to the production of these masses of ordinary goods; technical skill and scientific teaching were now doing a great work among us, and we were entering upon a phase of industry in which we were becoming not only rivals, but, to a very great extent, successful rivals with Continental producers to whom we used too readily to relegate the production of scientific and artistic work. This march and change in regard to our industries would make greater strides in the future, and, therefore, he claimed for this new and civilized method of communication a position of absolute necessity in regard to the future development of our trade and industries. There was one point which he thought had not been touched upon by previous speakers in this debate, and it was one to which he attached very great importance. He was sure that the time could not be far distant when direct communication would be established between the Continent and India; and he asserted that our politicians and diplomatists would do well to consider this matter, and instead of pursuing a policy in India which was to some extent calculated to inspire feelings of jealousy, alarm, and animosity, they should direct their attention to making those alliances with Russia and the Ruler of Afghanistan which would insure the completion of the railway route to India. That this route would be eventually finished he thought there could be no doubt whatever, and he asked were we alone of all the great Powers of Europe—the greatest commercial Power—to be deprived of direct access by railway to our important Indian Dependency? So much for the trade aspect of this case. There was one other aspect upon which he wished to say a few words, and it was the international aspect. Hon. Members who had spoken from the Benches opposite had addressed the House as if a condition of hatred and possible war with France were a chronic state of things. Pray let them for once imagine the possibility of being at peace with France, and let them allow themselves even to stretch their imagination to such limits as to suppose France might be our possible ally. Were we for ever, to the end of all time, to regard France, our natural ally and friend, as an enemy and as a Power to be held always in a state of antipathy? He considered those old-world prejudices, those worn-out notions of hostility against France, would rapidly disappear under the benign influence of a communication of this sort. The two peoples would get to know each other, to understand one another's views, to appreciate one another's ideas, and in a short time we should all look back with surprise to those feelings of hostility and antipathy which now appeared to animate so many. Now, he approached the consideration of the military aspect of the case with very natural diffidence; he did not, in fact, intend to offer an opinion on it; he thought it would be sufficient for him just briefly to state what it was, and to draw the attention of hon. Members to it. He thought he was right in saying that the whole of the military scare which had been raised in opposition to this scheme rested not upon probabilities, but on possibilities drawn from a very excited imagination. What were we asked to believe, and he took the list of possibilities from the evidence given by military witnesses before the Joint Committee of 1883? First, they were invited to suppose that there might be a grand European plot, hatched and contrived in a more or less secret manner, against the peace and liberty of this country. He thought that even the gallant Gentlemen, including the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken (Sir Edward Hamley), who had given them so much warning of the sort, would hardly fear the assault of any single Power. They were to suppose that there would be secretly a combination of several Powers. As a matter of course, the force would assemble on the shores of France. This assembling was to take place without awakening the suspicion or the apprehension of anybody in this country. The combination having been effected, the united forces must agree upon a general course of operations, which he should think would be rather a difficult thing for them to do. Having so agreed, they must have a general who was foolish enough to trust his army in such a place as the Channel Tunnel. Remember also, that all this time our Military Authorities, our Naval Authorities, our Political Authorities were fast asleep, and that the garrison of Dover and the coast defences were sharing in this Rip Van Winkle slumber. He considered the arguments advanced that day against this civilizing step might be reasonably urged against the construction of any road between one State and another. If a railway made from one State to another was to produce all the terrible consequences which had been foreshadowed in the House that day, he was surprised that they should be continued on the large scale on which they were now projected. But they knew very well that, so far from producing hostility, they tended to peace and a better understanding among the nations. He was convinced that numerous commercial advantages would arise from the construction of this Tunnel; they in the House of Commons had nothing to do at that moment with the question whether the enterprize would pay or not. Hon. Members knew perfectly well that that was a matter which the shareholders would look after for themselves, and it was a matter which would be thoroughly sifted by a Committee of the House. They had only to consider whether it would be wise and prudent to adopt the course suggested; they had to consider whether it would increase or diminish the commerce and prosperity of the country; whether it would draw closer the bonds of friendship between two great countries and increase their good understanding. He was convinced that the establishment of the proposed communication would do all these things, and that by it we should be provided with a splendid insurance against any evil which could possibly arise.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea District) said, he was the only Member in the House except Mr. Speaker, and he feared that Mr. Speaker's voice could not be heard on that occasion, of the five Members who were appointed by the House of Commons to sit upon the Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons, in 1883, to investigate the question of the construction of the Channel Tunnel; therefore it would ill become him to be silent on this occasion. He did not think that in the speeches which had been delivered sufficient weight had been given to the exhaustive inquiry which took place before the Committee. Before, however, he entered upon the questions which came before the Committee, he thought it necessary to caution the House against being in any way misled by the manner in which this question was put before them by the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin). The hon. Member said that he brought the Bill forward for the purpose of enabling his Company, or the Company which he proposed to form, to carry on experimental works. It was rightly pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) that they could not regard the Bill in that sense; that, if the House passed the Bill to-day, it would pass a Bill affirming the desirability of constructing the Channel Tunnel, and they must take the Bill upon that distinct issue. Upon that distinct issue every man must vote to-day. He knew pretty well the conditions, and from a long experience of underground work, his distinct opinion was that there would be no difficulty in constructing this Tunnel. His opinion was that an undertaking of such magnitude was scarcely ever conceived which would be more easy of accomplishment than the Channel Tunnel. He never saw easier ground or more favourable conditions than he saw when he went through the already existing works of the Channel Tunnel, which were amply sufficient for experimental purposes; and, therefore, he thought it was altogether misleading to put the question forward as one of experiment. It could not be regarded in that light. Then the hon. Member tried to persuade the House that this was to be regarded as a small drift-way. They all knew that small drivings were always made before large tunnels were broken down, and here again he thought that it was necessary he should caution the House against being misled by any such statement as that this Bill must be regarded as permitting a drift-way which was to be used for electric wires and for the conveyance of mails. He hoped the House would in no way regard it in that sense. This Bill was, in fact, a Bill sanctioning the Channel Tunnel. Now, when he was selected to serve on the Committee, he entered upon his duties with a perfectly open and judicial mind; he was not prejudiced in one way or the other. He was not brought up in what the hon. Member for Hythe stigmatized as the cramped atmosphere of the cabin of a man-of-war, nor was he brought up in the office of an editor of a newspaper. His whole life had been spent in great commercial and manufacturing undertakings; and, therefore, he thought he was about as unprejudiced a witness upon this question as could well be found. The Committee investigated the case with the greatest care; 40 witnesses were examined; of these 40 witnesses, 10 were military men, 3 were naval men, 12 were connected with the great railways of the country, and they were really representative men, the very best of the railway officials and chairmen; 10 were engaged in commerce and manufactures, and two were Government officials. It would be seen that the witnesses brought before the Committee were thoroughly capable of giving to the Committee the opinions of the great undertakings with which they were connected. One remarkable point impressed itself upon him at the very beginning. It was natural, in the first place, to consider what advantages were likely to accrue to the country from the construction of this Tunnel, and whether they conferred adequate compensation for the undoubted dangers which might arise from its construction. One would have supposed that at the very beginning the commercial advantages would have been put forward by the promoters in the strongest possible terms, but such was by no means the case. The Committee thought it was their duty with this object to invite the opinions of the Chambers of Commerce, and they accordingly addressed themselves to the Chairman of the Associated Chambers of Commerce. They received from him this reply—

"The Council of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom are not prepared to offer evidence on the subject of the Channel Tunnel Bills referred to the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament."

If this had been a very large and important commercial question, surely the Associated Chambers of Commerce would have taken a very different line. If they had not done so as a great commercial organization, surely a large number of Chambers of Commerce would have taken an active part in representing to the Committee the advantages which it was presumed were likely to flow from the construction of this Channel Tunnel. But, instead of that, the Chairman, on behalf of the Association, as the extract he had read showed, informed the Committee that the Chambers of Commerce had no desire to say a word in favour of the construction of the Tunnel. The hon. Member for Hythe himself gave evidence, and he (Sir Hussey Vivian) thought those who supported this Bill would do well to read the hon. Gentleman's evidence, because he did not think they would find in it any very strong statement as to the commercial advantages which were to flow from the construction of the Tunnel. In his evidence, the hon. Member for Hythe admitted that—

"There has been nothing that deserved the epithet of a wide and enthusiastic declaration or demand for the Tunnel, upon the part of the trading and manufacturing interests of the country."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Read the context.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he was not aware that he had misquoted the hon. Gentleman's evidence.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: Read what precedes, and what follows the passage you have quoted.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he had the reference and the evidence, but he could not comply with the hon. Gentleman's wish without troubling the House at too great length; he had read the entire reply to a question put to the Hon. Gentleman. He listened to the hon. Gentleman's speech that day, and he thought he should have heard some strong statement setting forth the great advantages which would accrue to the commerce of this country from the construction of the Channel Tunnel. He was bound to say, however, that he was very much disappointed, for he heard no such statement; he heard prophetic words of a large and sonorous character, but there was an utter absence of detailed information as regarded the commercial effect of the construction of this Tunnel. Of course, prophecy was very easy; but they wanted material facts to establish the desirability of running the undoubted risk we should run in permitting this Tunnel to be constructed. The hon. Gentleman made four points in regard to the necessity for the construction of this Tunnel. He said that it was needed as a second line of supply for the food of the country. That had been perfectly well met by two speakers already, who had asserted that if we were at war with France we could not get our supplies of food through the Channel Tunnel—that it was only from France we could possibly fear we should lose the command of the sea, and that if we lost the command of the sea, we undoubtedly could not get our food supplies through the Tunnel. Therefore, he thought, the hon. Gentleman's first argument fell to the ground entirely. The hon. Gentleman's second argument was that we should strengthen our military power. He (Sir Hussey Vivian) hardly understood how that could be. Then came the question of the Government not being able honourably to retire from the engagements which were contracted beforehand. Upon that point, he could express no opinion, as he did not belong to either of the Governments concerned; but this was clear, that the question was never decided by Parliament, and that Parliament never came to any resolution whatever in the matter. His right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) referred a great deal to the flourishing condition of this question during the 20 years prior to 1883, yet during that period it never received the sanction of Parliament. He (Sir Hussey Vivian) believed that no one thought at that time that it was possible to construct the Channel Tunnel, and therefore the world at large disregarded the question and never thought seriously of it. At any rate, the question was never brought forward and sanctioned in the House, and they could not go back upon any correspondence which passed between the Government of this country and the Government of France; therefore he considered that this country was in no way honourably pledged or bound by such correspondence. It was only the Parliament of this country that could bind us to any particular action. Now, as regarded the general question. It came out before the Committee that it was perfectly certain that heavy goods would not pay to send through the Tunnel. Take the case of coal. Our transactions with France in coal were very large. Those who were best informed on the question of the coal traffic never ventured to say that the coal traffic with France would be taken through the Tunnel. Why, coal could be delivered in France from the Tyne or from Wales for 4s. a-ton and it could be laid down at the very place where it was wanted—at Rouen or Dunquerque, or some other port, close to the place where it was used, and he defied any Railway Company by means of a Tunnel to deliver coal from Newcastle to Dunquerque, or from Newcastle to Rouen, which is in the immediate vicinity of the great manufactories of France, for 4s. a-ton or for three times 4s. a-ton. The hon. Member (Sir Edward Watkin) knew perfectly well that no Railway Company could do it. There were many other heavy goods which no one had ventured to say were likely to be carried through the Tunnel. It was quite possible that some light and artistic goods might, as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Slagg) had just said, derive some advantage from going through the Tunnel, but heavy goods would never go through it. Then there was the question of distribution, and that, he admitted, was a most important question. The entrepôt business of the ports of London and Liverpool was most important and valuable to this country. The evidence given to the Committee upon that point was, that the distribution could take place better from the port of London or the port of Liverpool to the port in a foreign country nearest to the place where the goods were consumed than by going through a Tunnel at one fixed point distant from the place of consumption. Instead of taking goods to Dover and thence through the Tunnel to Calais, and from there forwarding them to distant places in France, Germany, or Spain, it was much better to deliver them at Havre, or Rouen, or Bordeaux, or Dunquerque, or other French port, or at Hamburg, or whatever port was nearest to the place where the goods were consigned, by a steamer direct from London. Not only was it infinitely cheaper and infinitely better to do so, but they would avoid delay on the French lines. It was pressed upon the Committee very strongly that great delay occurs on the French lines, that when once goods got on the French lines they were not forwarded with the same rapidity that they would be forwarded in this country, and therefore he contended that as fast steamers were now used, it was in all respects better and cheaper to distribute goods from the port of London, or the port of Liverpool, or elsewhere, to the French and German ports, than to send them through a Tunnel and then along the French lines. Such was the evidence given to the Committee, and it produced a very strong impression on his mind. It must be borne in mind that goods so distributed had only one extra loading and not two. It was just as easy, and easier, to put goods from one ship into another at the docks, and then let them be conveyed to a foreign port as it was to put them into a railway truck, and send them through the Tunnel. It was, therefore, only unloading from the ship into a railway truck at the foreign port which was extra, and no more. Very remarkable evidence was given to the Committee with regard to the question of the cost of conveying goods. Mr. Eeroyd, who was then a Member of this House, gave the Committee some very valuable evidence. Mr. Eeroyd said that—"The freight on wool from London to Bradford is 37s. 6d. per ton, and from London to Roubaix (in France) 26s. per ton."

Therefore, the man who bought wool in London and got it conveyed by rail to Bradford was 10s. per ton worse off than the man who, having his manufactory at Roubaix, bought wool in London and got it taken to Roubaix by steamer from London. Mr. Eeroyd went on to say—

Sir Hussey Vivian

"But when the goods are manufactured, the freight between Bradford and London for home-trade goods is 43s. 6d. per ton, and the freight between Bradford and Paris for the same goods is 33s. 9d. per ton"—

Again a difference of 10s. per ton, although in the latter case the goods had passed over the Channel; and he further remarked—

"So that even where the goods are sent to Bradford for sale and not to London, the French manufacturer has already a very great advantage in the matter of freights in both directions."

Mr. Eeroyd afterwards told them—

"I find, again, that the freight of woollen yarns, such as we produce, from the Roubaix district is 46s. per ton to Burnley, my nearest town; but the freight from London to Burnley for the like yarns is 50s. per ton."

He (Sir Hussey Vivian) thought these facts went to show that the French manufacturers had greater advantages by the present sea route than our home manufacturers had by the railway routes within their own country, and that no real commercial advantage was likely to accrue from the construction of a Tunnel. The Committee received a good deal of evidence with regard to wine and other things, but he would not trouble the House by noticing it in detail. What he was particularly anxious to do was to state distinctly, as a Member of the Joint Committee, that in his opinion no case was made out as to the commercial advantages which would flow from the construction of the Tunnel. He had no doubt that advantages would accrue to the passenger traffic; but, after all, what was the sea passage at present? It only occupied an hour and 10 minutes. How much time would be saved by the Tunnel? He doubted very much whether any time would be saved. As to sea sickness, the fact is, that the passage is now made in large boats, and thus fewer people suffered from sea sickness than formerly. Great exertions were now being made on the French side, and we also were expending large sums of money on our own side, to improve the Channel ports. Immense sums were being expended by the French Government at Boulogne and Calais, and he had no doubt that a very superior service of steamers would, before long, become perfectly practicable, and thus still further reduce sea sickness. This question was worked out with considerable ability by one of our foremost engineers, Mr. John Fowler. Mr. Fowler had produced a scheme for the construction of large steam ferry-boats to cross the Channel—ferry-boats which would take whole train-loads. The proposal was supported by 13 of our most eminent engineers. Mr. Fowler's scheme was twice sanctioned by Committees of the House of Commons, and once by a Committee of the House of Lords. He believed that Mr. Fowler's scheme was quite within the bounds of possibility. He believed that when the new harbours were constructed train-loads could be taken over in ferry-boats, and that people need never be compelled to leave their carriage in the journey from London to Paris. In a construction of that kind, there was no real danger to the country, because it was clear that, so long as we had the command of the Channel, we could prevent the passage of boats of that kind without the slightest difficulty. But if the House sanctioned a Tunnel passing 150 feet beneath the Channel, our fleets might sail uselessly over the Tunnel while thousands and tens of thousands of men were passing through to invade and occupy our country, and the vessels would be perfectly powerless to keep the enemy back. At present we had the grand barrier which Nature had interposed between us and France; but the case would be very different if we constructed such a communication as the Channel Tunnel would afford. In this debate the opinion of military men had been more or less referred to. The Committee examined 10 officers of foremost rank, distinction and experience, and out of that number only one was in favour of the construction of the Tunnel. That officer thought that the risk was infinitesimally small, not worthy of calculation, looking at the manner in which this country had been built up by "incurring risks;" and he went on to say that we ought to invade France; but, on cross-examination, he failed to show how, with our small Army, such an operation would be practicable. Why this country should voluntarily incur risks he altogether failed to see. Unless they could establish a very strong case, a far stronger case than had been established in the House to-day, or had ever been established before, for the construction of this Tunnel, he maintained that we had no business to entail these risks upon ourselves and our posterity. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was examined before the Joint Committee, and gave the strongest possible evidence against the scheme. He believed there was no more sensible Englishman in the country than His Royal Highness, and what had he said in his evidence? He said this—

"I think it would be destructive of the interests of this country, and, therefore, as you are now perfectly secure, I think anything you do to render it less secure than the country is now, is very dangerous, and, to my mind, not justifiable."

His Royal Highness pointed out to the House that by allowing the construction of this Tunnel they would be creating a land frontier, and that they would be compelled, by force of circumstances, to adopt the same means of defending the country that other countries with a land frontier had been bound to adopt. Now, what did Lord Wolseley say? Lord Wolseley stated that—

"There is no commercial advantage possible to calculate or put into figures that could compensate for the risk that would be entailed upon the country by the construction of the Tunnel, assuming also, commercially, the great inconvenience and loss which the country would sustain in panics when the relations between this country were strained, and that panics would give rise not only to commercial losses and damage to industry, but also occasion great and sudden increases to our military establishment, perhaps without any good reason."

And he further stated that—"He could think of no national advantage which could justify the construction of the Tunnel."

He went on to say, when asked whether it would be possible to drive an enemy out when it had once obtained possession of the Tunnel—

"I think it would be utterly impossible for this country ever to raise its head again, as a free and independent country, if the Tunnel were in the possession of a foreign nation."

The other military authorities entirely agreed with Lord Wolseley. Sir J. Lintorn Simmons said—

"I am of opinion that if an enemy got possession of the Channel Tunnel, Great Britain, with its present military organization, could not possibly expel that enemy from Great Britain."

And he went on to emphasize that in this way; in reply to Question 2,232—

"Then you think that our national dangers might be increased, and that our national interests might suffer?" He replied: "I think it might bring national ruin; that is my opinion."

"I cannot conceive any amount of commercial advantage that could in any way compensate the risk that would be run."

He (Sir Hussey Vivian) could read to the House evidence of that character repeated over and over again. It must be remembered that these were statements made by our most experienced Generals. Were we altogether to ignore the opinion of our Generals—experts in military matters—who were the best qualified men amongst us, and bound to consider this question under the grave responsibilities of their position. They had considered it with the greatest possible anxiety, and had come to a distinct and, he might say, unanimous decision against the construction of the Tunnel. He need hardly say that naval men were of exactly the same opinion as the military authorities. Then what an enormous cost would the construction of this Tunnel entail upon the country. Supposing that Parliament allowed the Tunnel to be made, one of the results would be, that we should have to construct a first-class fortress at the mouth of the Tunnel. That would cost a very large sum; some estimated it at £1,500,000, others at £3,000,000. In the first place, this enormous expense would be entailed in order to construct a first-class fortress, and then we should have to keep in it 8,000 to 10,000 men, who would cost from £40 or £42 to £100 a-year each, the latter sum being about the average cost of a soldier of the Regular Army. That meant a permanent increase of our military establishment to the amount of £1,000,000 per annum. But it did not end there. If we once had a land frontier to this country we should be bound to increase our Army—we should be bound to increase it, he might say, to the same extent as foreign nations had increased their Armies. Why had we not been under the necessity of increasing our Army heretofore? Simply because by means of our Navy we had command of the Channel, and because we believed, and he thought rightly, that no enemy could invade us. If they did invade us, we believed that we could shut them up in this country, cut off their base of operations, and entirely destroy and annihilate them. But the very moment they got a land connection all that ceased, and we might depend upon it that the first step of anybody who might desire to invade this country—a Napoleon if he came to life again—would be to seize our end of the Channel Tunnel. Our only security would be in increasing our Army, so that we should be able to meet the Army of France man to man. If they were prepared to do that he, for one, would never oppose the Channel Tunnel. He opposed it entirely because he knew that the Army of this country was not sufficiently numerous and powerful to meet the Army of France, and that it would give rise to a vast increase of our Military expenditure. If they would to-morrow decide upon the adoption of the conscription, and raise an Army of 500,000 men even—he would not say 1,000,000—then he would go into the Lobby for the Channel Tunnel; but so long as he knew that we were not prepared to meet France so long would he oppose the scheme, as he believed that it would be an enormous national danger. His right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian has contrasted the population of England with that of France now and at the time of the war, and had drawn the conclusion that we were now numerically nearly equal to France, while, at the time of the war, we were not much more than one half. He admitted that that would be a weighty argument if his right hon. Friend were prepared to pursue it to its logical sequence and to enact for this country conscription and the same military organization as that of France; otherwise the argument had no practical force. Well, hon. Gentlemen who were in favour of this Tunnel believed that we could be rendered safe against invasion by having the means of destroying the Tunnel at a moment's notice; but the evidence taken by the Joint Committee led him (Sir Hussey Vivian), at any rate, to a wholly different conclusion. So far as blowing up the Tunnel was concerned, he told the House distinctly, having had long experience in colliery matters, that they could not do it. They could not blow up a drift or tunnel 150 feet below the ground. If that were possible many of our collieries would have been blown up long ago. They had had plenty of explosions quite as severe as any which could be occasioned by dynamite or anything else which could be exploded in the Channel Tunnel—and though the underground workings were more or less shattered for a certain time, he had never yet known of a colliery blown up to the surface—it was impossible, in fact, to blow up 150 feet to the surface, and it was ridiculous nonsense to talk about it. Then it was suggested that the Tunnel might be mined—that mines of dynamite might be placed around it, and that by touching a button—he thought that was what the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Watkin) himself had suggested—at the War Office, or in any part of England, they would be able to blow the sides of the Tunnel in. But what did Sir John Hawkshaw—who was rather interested in the making of this Tunnel—say to that? Why, he said that no one would trust himself in a Tunnel mined and charged with dynamite, and liable to be blown to pieces by the touch of some official on a button. He thought Sir John Hawkshaw showed his wisdom when he said that. He (Sir Hussey Vivian) wondered what the sea-sick old lady would say when she knew that she was travelling over dynamite, and that it rested with some one at the War Office whether or not a button was to be touched. Then it was said they might construct such sluices as would flood the Tunnel; but the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had very properly pointed out that we should not know from time to time whether these sluices were in proper order. It would not be possible to exercise them every week or fortnight, and they might get rusted and refuse to act at the critical moment. They would be depending upon delicate mechanical construction which, after a given number of years, might not act as they were expected to do, and thus the safety of the country would depend upon the compliance or refusal of a valve to do the work required of it. Even if a system of this kind were adopted, the question would arise who was to turn the valve or press the button? It would be a very serious question to determine upon—namely, the destruction of this great work and the sacrifice of millions invested in it. If the Tunnel were made, who would take the responsibility on himself? Suppose that relations were strained between this country and France, at what period of this straining of relations would it be proper to give the order to flood or destroy the Tunnel? His own impression was that no one would be inclined to take upon himself the responsibility of giving such orders, and that the Tunnel would never be destroyed or flooded. They were not altogether without knowledge of what had occurred in cases of this kind. The tunnels through the Vosges mountains between France and Germany were mined, the mines were charged, and there was an officer in charge of the mines instructed to blow them up when the order was given. Instructions were sent to that officer to blow up the tunnels during the Franco-Prussian War, but the officer did not do it; he was afraid of doing it, and the result was that the German Armies passed through. Very well, were we in this country going to create a danger of that kind; were we going to lay this country open to invasion in that way, and for what reason? Had any sufficient reason been given? He answered that it had not. He declared as one who, having listened to all the commercial evidence upon this point, and to all the speeches this day, could not but submit that no sufficient evidence had been given to warrant this House in undertaking the enormous responsibility of creating this danger to the country. Long immunity from war would abate the vigilance we might at first exercise. They must bear this in mind, that long negotiations and extensive correspondence did not generally precede the breaking out of hostilities. The House had had a Paper presented to it which was prepared by the Intelligence Departments—showing that between the years 1770 and 1871 there had been 107 cases in which hostilities had broken out without notice. We might be well assured that if this country was going to be invaded, we should have uncommon little notice of the fact. Now, his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had instanced the case of Napoleon, and had said that that great General, with all his military skill and ability, had never been able to invade this country. But then Napoleon had no Channel Tunnel, and he possessed no fast screw steamers which he could concentrate upon a given objective point with absolute certainty at a given hour of any day. The conditions with which Napoleon had to deal were wholly different, as he prepared to bring his troops across in open boats. Therefore, they could not draw a parallel between the state of things in the time of Napoleon and those which would prevail to-day if war broke out. They must anticipate that hostilities would commence without notice, and if the House should sanction the construction of a Channel Tunnel, it must be prepared at all times, and under all circumstances, to resist any attempt by coup de main to take possession of the English end of the Tunnel. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had said that there had been no anxiety in France in regard to the French end of the Tunnel. Well, why should there be when France had 10 soldiers and 10 guns to our one? Why should they be afraid of any invasion from this country? That was really not in question. As he had said before, if they would raise the numbers of our Army so as to meet the French man to man, he was quite sure that we should not only be able to resist them, but to march from one end of France to the other and take possession of the country without the slightest difficulty. He had no hesitation in saying that. He was a great believer in the pluck and endurance of Englishmen, but that was not our position, and Parliament was not prepared to place the country in that position; and he believed that anyone who voted for the second reading of this Bill to day—though he might not believe it at the time—was assuredly taking a step towards rendering conscription inevitable in this country.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): If I may say so without presumption, I think the hon. Baronet (Sir Hussey Vivian) who has just concluded his speech has made a most valuable and effective contribution to the consideration of this subject this afternoon, and I deeply regret that the attendance in the House was not larger while that contribution was being delivered. Although one would not have thought, from the state of the House, that this question was one of great importance, still there can be no doubt whatever that the importance of the question cannot well be exaggerated, and the only deduction I draw from the somewhat scanty attendance on the Benches on both sides of the House is, not that the subject is not one of importance, but that no interest is taken either in the country or by Parliament in the project we are asked to sanction. The hon. Baronet has addressed to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Slagg), and those who think with him, a convincing and unanswerable argument with regard to the commercial results which are expected to flow from this enterprize. It struck me particularly, when the hon. Members for Hythe and Burnley were addressing the House mainly on this question, that they carefully avoided all facts, figures, and statistics, and dealt solely in generalities. Now, I put it to the hon. Member for Burnley—who is a practical man, and who occupies a deservedly high position in the commercial world, and who has defended this scheme in general phrases—whether, as a man of business, he would invest his money in this project? Unless he is prepared to give not only an unmistakable but a ready reply to that question, then his argument as to the commercial advantages of the Tunnel comes to absolutely nothing.

MR. SLAGG: I have stated that the commercial aspect of the question is not before the House. When it is before the House, I shall be quite ready to give an opinion upon it. It is a matter which, in the nature of things, it would be most improper to comment upon until it is put before us formally and we know the exact conditions and circumstances of the case.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I know that that question is not before the House. I know the hon. Member and the hon. Baronet have declined to bring this question before the House. But generally, in trying a commercial point, we must know whether investment in an enterprize would be likely to produce a good dividend; and on this point I should say there were no better judges anywhere than the hon. Member and the hon. Baronet, and if the enterprize in question were likely to produce a good dividend, those hon. Gentlemen would not be likely to conceal their opinion from the House. I pass from the commercial question to the other considerations involved. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), not in the least discourteously, but at the same time very forcibly, compared the arguments of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) to bugbears. Now, the speech of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade was especially useful in this, that he reminded the House of what seemed to have been forgotten, I admit, that the whole question has been carefully investigated by the highest investigating authority known to this House. We often have recourse to Royal Commissions and Select Committees, but we very rarely have recourse to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament; and it was the Report of such a Joint Committee, which has been so well summarized and explained by the hon. Baronet who spoke last (Sir Hussey Vivian), that formed the weighty foundation for what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has called bugbears. Have we really come to this, that an important, weighty, and prolonged Inquiry, conducted by men of position, taking evidence on a question like this, extending over several weeks, and its deliberately and carefully considered Report, is to be stigmatized by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian as a mere collection of fancies and phantoms and bugbears? That is an assertion altogether too loose, and it is unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The chief feature of this debate has been the intervention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian; and so high does Party feeling run at this moment, so exasperated even are certain subjects in politics, that I greatly fear that there will be a minute and microscopic inquiry to-morrow morning, mainly conducted through the Press, as to the motives which may have induced the right hon. Gentleman to lend his aid to the hon. Member for Hythe. I am not concerned myself to examine into that matter; but I fancy a calculation might be made of a very formidable character to the right hon. Gentleman, and the calculation which I think Party polemics may lead to is this. If the right hon. Gentleman is going to pay as the price of abstention from a vote against his Irish policy—if he is going to pay so much as a Channel Tunnel, what will he pay for a vote, and what will he pay for a group of votes? I do not go into that calculation myself, but that it will be made I have no doubt whatever. I am tempted to make the calculation on account of the extreme weakness and absolute inaccuracy of the reasons advanced by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in support of his change of mind on this question. The right hon. Gentleman said that, in 1881, in 1883, and, again, in 1885, opposition was made by his Government, as a Government, to this project; but that opposition had reference, he says, only to the time at which the proposal was made, and had no reference to the principles of the controversy. That is absolutely contradicted by the speech made in 1883 and by the speech made in 1885 by the then President of the Board of Trade (Mr. J. Chamberlain); and there is no one in this House who will be bold enough to assert that, at any rate in those palmy days, the then President of the Board of Trade did not possess the complete confidence of the right hon. Gentleman. What did the then President of the Board of Trade say in 1883? On the 24th July, 1883, he said that—

“A Committee of both Houses was appointed. That Committee had now concluded its labours; and although the Members of the Committee had been unable to agree upon any detailed Report, they had made a Report to the House to the effect that the majority of the Committee were of opinion that Parliamentary sanction should not be given to a submarine communication between England and France.”

Now, there is no limit of time to qualify this condemnation. Then he goes on—

“The Government having considered both the Report of the Committee, and also the state of circumstances which it disclosed, had decided to adopt their decision.”—(3 Hansard, [282] 285.)

Not a word in the nature of qualification, not a hope held out to the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe; but, Sir, we find a remarkable persistency, which is worthy of note, considering the way in which people change in the present day—a remarkable persistence in this view on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the then President of the Board of Trade, because, two years later, when not a shade or a shadow of difference existed between himself and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, he used these words—

“From the moment the question arose as to whether the making of this Tunnel might not constitute a great national danger”—

A bugbear, as the right hon. Gentleman says—

"they laid it down that the fullest possible inquiry must be held into that question; and, as a final result, they determined that the whole matter should be considered by a Joint Committee of both Houses, and they agreed to accept the opinion of that Committee."—(3 Hansard, [298] 337.)

Well, I think I have shown that the reasons which the right hon. Gentleman has given for lending the weight of his authority in support of a project which, as the Head of a Government, he had strongly and unreservedly condemned, are inconclusive reasons, and not based upon adequate Parliamentary considerations. I am, undoubtedly, impressed against this project; and perhaps I may as well here state to the House that it would be difficult for anyone to take part in a debate of this kind in a more impartial frame of mind than myself, for I am actually a shareholder in a Channel Tunnel, though not the Channel Tunnel of the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: The noble Lord is a shareholder in the Tunnel which I have the honour to represent. I saw his name on the register only yesterday.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: All I can say is I am extremely sorry to hear it. It is entirely against my will. The hon. Baronet seems to exercise that extraordinary power of absorption and of devouring every rival scheme which he has so often shown in connection with other projects. It was without my knowledge that he has absorbed into his capacious maw the little enterprize in which I had an exiguous amount of stock. I wish to look at this project from an impartial point of view and without prejudice. But we are told by the hon. Baronet that no possible danger can arise to this country from the construction of this Channel Tunnel. He has told us that it may be easily blocked. I hope the House observed that he carefully abstained from using the word "destroyed"—he said it might be easily blocked by certain machinery which he, or some friend of his, had invented, connected with a button which was to be touched by a Secretary of State for War in a Cabinet in Pall Mall. I ask whether such a ridiculous proposition was a worthy argument to be introduced into such a question as we have before us? Imagine a Cabinet Council sitting in the War Office, around the button;

fancy the present Cabinet gathered together and having to decide who should touch the button, and the difficulty of coming to a conclusion whether it ought to be touched. I think that point of the button shows the absurdity of all the precautions we might take to close the Tunnel in the event of war. But we have to consider other possibilities besides the event of war. We have to consider the possible event of what are called strained relations, and that is a matter of much importance, which has only been glanced at, but which I think should be considered with a great amount of care. We must consider the possibility of strained relations between this country and France, because this is a project which is to make our communications with France more easy. I venture to notice, in passing, the rebuke which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian addressed to my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade for having asserted, as I think rightly, that the prospects of stability in the Government of France were, perhaps, at the present moment, not so bright as they were four or five years ago. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"How can you make that assertion, considering that the French Republic went the other day through the arduous and critical operation of electing a President?"

But that is a proceeding which has to be gone through from time to time, and the fact that the political conflict has taken place does not seem to me to be an indisputable proof of permanence and stability in the Constitution. I wonder that the right hon. Gentleman, who I believe follows French politics very closely, does not recollect that my right hon. Friend had in his mind the very great and, possibly, for all we know, most formidable movement which is now passing through France, and especially in the Provinces against the Government. I do not want to dwell on the fact, although I think my right hon. Friend was right in alluding to the stability, greater or less, of the French Republic. But I come to a much more important question. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that a great change has come over the public mind with regard to our relations with France, and with regard to the construction of this Tunnel. But are there not ample reasons to account for the change? Twenty-five years ago there were at least three elements of great force which united us with France. We had at that time the recollection of the then recent Crimean War, and of having shared with the French Government all the dangers, the hazards, and expense of that war. We had the effect of the French Treaty which the right hon. Gentleman himself negotiated—and I suppose he would be the last to impair the effect of that Treaty in producing cordial relations between England and France; and then there was a Ruler in France who, on many occasions, had shown himself to be determined on close and friendly alliance with this country. These were the elements which produced real friendship between the two countries. I do not say that that friendly feeling has by any means disappeared; but I point out that the great elements have absolutely disappeared which gave rise to it. The feeling exists; but we have a new element which might, at any moment, produce most dangerous discord between the two countries, and I allude to the element for which we are indebted entirely to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and that is the occupation of Egypt. As an independent Member I can state my opinion without entailing any responsibility on anyone else, and I say it is my deliberate opinion and conviction that, as long as the occupation of Egypt continues, there is what I may call a sub-acute casus belli. In support of that assertion, I remind the right hon. Gentleman of what occurred last year, when not only was there a state of dissatisfaction in France, but the French Ambassador informed the Sultan that if he agreed to a Convention with us for the occupation of Egypt, it would be the cause of probable hostility between France and England. We know that our occupation of Egypt produces in the French mind most intense feelings of dissatisfaction. Whether it is beneficial or not, our occupation arouses every feeling of pride and jealousy of which the French mind is capable, and when we know that nothing but the placing of the most complete control upon themselves on the part of the people of France prevents an outbreak of those feelings, I say it is absurd to go back 25 years, and charge those who are sceptical as to the permanence and durability of the French Government as being mere alarmists. I feel sure that the right hon. Gentleman will, on reflection, be of opinion that there are now matters at issue between us and France that might produce a set of circumstances, now happily unknown, when all in this House, without any difference whatever, would be extremely thankful that the Channel Tunnel has not been made. The right hon. Gentleman threw doubts upon the value of military opinions with regard to the matter, but he naturally treated them with more respect than did the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe, who treated military opinions against his scheme with the same amount of contempt as he would those of a recalcitrant shareholder at a half-yearly meeting of the South-Eastern Railway Company. The right hon. Gentleman certainly adduced an argument which seemed to be satisfactory to his own mind to show why military opinion should not be held to be of great or conclusive weight in this matter. He said he had great respect for military opinion, so far as it related to the absolute operations of war; but he limited his respect to those operations. That strikes me as somewhat illogical. What should we say of a person who said to a physician—"I have great respect for you as long as you are treating a specific disease, but I have none whatever in you when you advise me as to what precautions should be taken to prevent that disease?" I am sure he would be regarded as a most impractical person. If we are not to pay attention to the advice of our naval and military men in this matter, whose opinions are we to consider? Upon this subject, it is to be observed, that there has been a remarkable unanimity among military men as to the effect of the Tunnel from a military point of view. I am opposed to this Bill on the general grounds such as I have indicated, which go to show that no case has been made out for our running the risk that would here be involved, and no case showing any great and preponderating advantage by which we should be compensated for running that risk. And now I come to the great argument which I am sorry I could not address to the right hon. Gentleman before he spoke, for it is one which I think, with great confidence, will have some effect on hon. Gentlemen before.

me. Sir, I am invincibly opposed to this project on the ground of economy. I am sure that one certain effect of the Tunnel would be to lead the country into largely increased military expenditure. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has a mind capable of rising to every subject which interests the mind of man, and he deals with every subject which he approaches with an ability which is surpassed by almost no other person; but there is one subject which I do not think has attracted the genius of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is expenditure and organization in military and naval affairs. Those are matters of which I think the right hon. Gentleman has not made himself master, and he is indeed somewhat ignorant of what is going on with regard to them, inasmuch as they do not attract his notice. At a time like the present, he is perhaps not aware of the tremendous opposition which exists among military authorities against this project of a Channel Tunnel. Is he aware that it has been proved month by month, and day by day, with increasing force, within the last two or three years, that our military and our naval organization, which is our bulwark without the Tunnel and would be ten times our bulwark with it, is in a state in which no sensible man would place any reliance? Is he aware that there are not 50 independent Members of the House of Commons who would vote confidence in our present military and naval arrangements? I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is aware of that fact. But does the right hon. Gentleman know that we are now going through what in this country produces panic, and that without any Tunnel in existence there are demands for millions of money to be spent in one direction and millions in an other, and for thousands of men to be added to the Army? Does he know that there is in this House a struggling Party for economy and a growing Party in favour of expenditure, who would use the Channel Tunnel as a lever in support of their demands for increased military expenditure? We know that if the Tunnel were constructed, between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 must be immediately laid out in fortifications. That is not denied. The hon. Member for Hythe, in a burst of unusual generosity—a generosity in his own career absolutely without precedent—when the right hon. Gentleman was in power and the proposal was made to construct the Tunnel, held out some hopes that the shareholders, over whom he appears to exercise some great influence, would vote those millions themselves; but he never denied that a large expenditure would be necessary for the purpose of defending the mouth of the Tunnel. Are hon. Gentlemen opposite who are interested in economy prepared by their votes this day—for the sake of illusory commercial advantages, for the sake of closer friendship with France, which has been shown to be of an equally illusory character—to impose on the taxpayers of the country, either next year or the year after, several millions of taxation for the purpose of fortifying the approaches to the Tunnel? If they are, then I cannot see how they can claim to be practical economists. I feel certain that my right hon. Friend the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) will be affected by this argument, and that he feels great difficulty indeed in supporting a project which he knows, as well as I do, must lead inevitably to a great increase of military expenditure. These are the grounds on which I oppose the Motion, and I consider the arguments are unanswerable in view of the fact that no corresponding advantage has been proved to be likely to accrue from the construction of the Tunnel. I conclude by urging on the House of Commons the well-known trite and common-place maxim—essentially a Conservative maxim—"Let well alone." It is not denied that our position at the present moment, so far as defensive purposes go, is a good one. I may take refuge in the obscurity of a learned language and compare the position of Great Britain to that of virgo intacta. I say it is essentially a good position. Now the hon. Baronet, with his immense patriotism and ardent desire to improve the condition of the people and the wealth and power of the country, comes forward and offers to make that position a better one. And again, Sir, I have recourse to a common-place, and will remind the House and the hon. Baronet, in the hope that they will treat it with the consideration which it deserves, that "Better is the enemy of Good."

Lord Randolph Churchill

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) (who spoke amid cries of "Divide!") said, he rose to speak on the question because he found himself placed in a very peculiar position with regard to this subject, and he felt he ought to apologize to the House for not having previously spoken. He had the honour, in 1875, of being appointed by the Conservative Government of that day, together with Mr. Kennedy, the eminent Head of the Commercial Department of the Foreign Office, and the then Solicitor to the Post Office, as a Commissioner to negotiate with some French gentlemen of eminence on the subject of a Channel Tunnel. He would point out that the Conservative Government at that time were thoroughly committed to the principle of a Channel Tunnel equally with the ex-Liberal Government. The right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) was at that time the Officer, as Secretary to the Treasury, of the Conservative Government, under whom he (Sir Henry Tyler) had acted in negotiating for 12 months with the French Commissioners, at the conclusion of which a Convention was framed and signed by the Commissioners on behalf of the two Governments, and that Convention was agreed to with the full approval of his right hon. Friend and the Conservative Government of the day. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Hussey Vivian) had given the House a précis of the evidence taken later, before Lord Lansdowne's Commission, which had awakened in his mind many memories with regard to the reports he had made in the past in connection with our communication with India, the Channel communications, and other matters. He felt that he stood now somewhat in the position of a principal criminal before those Members of the House who were so strongly opposed to the project, as one who had on public grounds originally approved and promoted the idea of a Channel Tunnel. He still believed, however, that a Channel Tunnel would be of great commercial advantage to this country and to Europe, and he believes strongly, from ample experience, in the humanizing and civilizing effects of facility of intercourse. In his opinion, instead of the 300,000 who went to and from the Continent in 1875 by the existing shorter means of communication, and the 500,000 who now travelled by those routes, there would be many times that number passing through the Tunnel. He was also of opinion that there was a good deal of misapprehension on the part of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House as to the danger which might possibly arise, from a military point of view, through this work being carried out. The questions of flooding, blocking, and defending the Tunnel were very simple. The length of the Tunnel would be 23 miles under the sea, and there would be three or four miles of approaches at each end making a total length of 30 miles. There would be a depth of about 200 feet of sea above the Tunnel and the tremendous pressure of water which that represented would always be available at any moment, under proper arrangements, for the purpose of flooding the Tunnel in case of need. Now, it was agreed by the Convention between the two Governments that it should be in the power of either Government not merely to flood or damage or destroy the works of the Tunnel when there was any apprehension of war, but, whenever it was thought fit, to stop the traffic, and that those powers should be exercised without compensation; the only stipulation being that the term of the concession should be lengthened by the addition of the time for which the traffic would be so stopped. He remembered that arguments similar to those now put forward were used against the construction of a railway to Southampton, and the construction of the Suez Canal had been warmly opposed as being likely to endanger British interests. He had at the time when that Canal was under construction ventured to suggest that it would be of more value to British commerce than that of any other nation; and, knowing as an old officer of Engineers how easily and cheaply and securely a Channel Tunnel might be defended, he was now of opinion that no case had been made out against the proposal.

LIBEL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 294.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I do not wish to offer any opposition to the third reading of this Bill; but, with the permission of the House, I would offer a short personal explanation with reference to matters which occurred when the Bill was in Committee, or came before the House on the Report stage. Frequent allusion had been made to a case in which 50 or 60 actions had been brought by a solicitor practising at Salters' Hall Court, E.C., in respect of the same libel. In order to avoid giving unnecessary pain to the surviving relatives of the plaintiff in those actions, I spoke of them as having been brought by a person whom I would call "John Smith," of Salters' Hall Court, instead of, as the fact was, by a Mr. Henry Tucker. It was mentioned that he had died before any of the actions had been tried; that at the time of his having brought them he had been a bankrupt; and that the libel consisted in a statement as to his having been struck off the Rolls as a solicitor who had been guilty of fraudulent practices. By a strange coincidence, it turns out that there is a Mr. Henry John Smith practising as a solicitor at Salters' Hall Court. He feels aggrieved at the name of Smith having been introduced into the debates, and desires me to state publicly that I did not in any way intend to allude to him. I therefore wish to say that I had at the time no knowledge even of his existence, and I am anxious to express my regret that, in attempting to spare others pain, I should have occasioned him annoyance. As to the late Mr. Tucker, it is wholly untrue that he was a bankrupt at the time of his having brought the actions. He had had to contend with some pecuniary difficulties some time before; but they were passing or had already passed away at the date of the publication of the libel. Under these circumstances, an absolutely false statement to the effect that he had been guilty of fraudulent practices necessarily did him great injury—so great indeed, as his relatives state, as to have actually hastened his death. I thank the House for having allowed me to make this short personal explanation, which, I think, in justice to the parties concerned, seemed to be both right and necessary.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

OATHS BILL—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Bradlaugh, Sir John Simon, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Courtney Kenny, Mr. Burt, Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Illingworth, Mr. Richard, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Jesse Collings.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Affirmation may be made instead of oath).

Mr. Kelly

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he had an Amendment to move to the Clause, the object of which was to exempt from the necessity of taking the oath any person who should declare that he entertained conscientious objections to doing so. He had put down this Amendment in consequence of seeing upon the Paper some others to which he objected, and the words of it he had taken from the Act of the 2nd Vic. Cap. 77, which was passed to meet a case similar to that with which the Committee had now to deal. In 1838 Parliament had to deal with the case of persons who had been Quakers, and who, so long as they were Quakers, had been excused from taking the oath, and who made an affirmation instead. But the provisions enacted with regard to them did not apply to those who had ceased to be Quakers, and who had consequently ceased to be able to make affirmation. The words of the Act were—

"I, A. B., having been one of the people called Quakers, and entertaining conscientious objections to the taking an oath, do solemnly and sincerely and truly affirm"

He submitted that those words were less offensive, less objectionable, and more suitable than the words of the other Amendments which he had seen on the Paper. He had no hesitation in saying that he should prefer to see the Bill passed in the form in which it had been introduced by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). The Bill as introduced gave an entirely free option to every person called upon to take the oath, as to whether he would take it or make affirmation. It had been alleged by some hon. Members in the course of the debates on the Bill, that if that free option were carried there might be a loss to the administration of the law, inasmuch as persons who were likely to be influenced by an oath might take advantage of the option to escape from their obligation. He did not attach much importance to that argument. The practice of requiring witnesses to take the oath or make affirmation was an historical survival; it had really little sense or meaning at the present day. The Committee could easily understand that when there was no punishment by the Criminal Law for those who gave false evidence in judicial proceedings—where the witness was left entirely and distinctly to his own conscience and exacted from him no solemn affirmation—the oath was of the highest consequence. But as soon as it enacted imprisonment with or without hard labour or seven years' penal servitude for those who gave false evidence, the more powerful sanction made the other far less necessary and important, because the only case in which it could be suggested that the oath was important was in the case where neither of the other sanctions had any effect on the mind of the witness. There were three sanctions which operated on the mind of a witness—first, the sanction of the law; secondly, the sanction of the moral law; and, thirdly, there was the sanction derived from the particular consequences supposed to follow the violation of an oath. It seemed to him that the class of men incapable of being influenced by the religious sanction, but capable of being influenced by the moral sanction, or by the fear of seven years' penal servitude, must be extremely limited, if, indeed, it did not exist purely in the imagination. Now, it was for the sake of that limited class that some alteration was proposed to be made in the Bill of the hon. Member for Northampton. He entirely objected to any alteration which would convert a man's appearance in the witness box into an opportunity for counsel to make inquisition into his religious belief. There were, unfortunately, at the present day many persons who Boycotted others who did not understand their religious notions, and no one who came from Scotland could have lived without experience of that kind. It was not right, and it was not just, therefore, that a man who involuntarily, and, perhaps, against his will, was dragged forward to a Court of Justice to assist the administration of the law, should be required to say either that he had no belief at all, or that his religion was very queer, in order that he might be able to make affirmation instead of taking the oath. Now, the words which he found in the Act he had referred to did not raise any inquiry into the character of a man's religious opinions; he simply had to say that he entertained conscientious objections to taking the oath; and more than that, he thought it was not right in the interest of the public that it should be demanded from him. For these reasons, considering the shortness of the time at their disposal, he would not occupy the time of the Committee further than to move the Amendment in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 5, after the word "person," insert the words "who shall declare that he entertains conscientious objections to the taking of an oath."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he was bound by the undertaking given to the House on the second reading. He should be glad to see the Amendment carried; but if it were carried, he should take it as the sense of the Committee, and should not be bound by the other Amendments.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he thought the Solicitor General should state whether he was ready to consent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth) said, he was just about to do that when the hon. Gentleman rose. He certainly could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen, and if it were carried, he should feel it his duty to resist by every possible means the passing of the Bill. He thought they were entitled to have some definite expression of intention from the hon. Member for Northampton with regard to the question; upon a matter of the kind, however, he did not think the Committee could come to any decision that afternoon. His intention in rising was simply to say that he could not accept the Amendment, which seemed to him to depart from an essential matter of principle. His experience had led him to believe in the value of an oath, and he was entirely opposed to the view of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter), that it was an absurd historic survival. He knew that the oath was a very valuable instrument for getting at the truth in Courts of Justice, and he should certainly resist any Amendment to enable an individual who wished to escape from the influence of the religious sanction upon his mind to do so by saying that he had conscientious objections to taking the oath. If the discussion should go on upon an other occasion in Committee, he might have something further to say; but he wished to make it clear that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman was vital, and that if it were accepted, he should wish it to result in the rejection of the Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he should have considered it more respectful to the Committee to have explained his views on this subject; but, as he was prevented from doing so by the shortness of the time at his disposal, he should reserve his remarks to a future occasion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he would ask the hon. Member for North Aberdeen to consider whether the Amendment which he proposed did not place before anybody who objected to tell the truth very strong grounds for saying that he had conscientious objections to taking the oath?

It being half after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday, 4th July.

MOTION.

EDUCATION—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—PREMATURE PUBLICATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross) My Lords, at a meeting of the Royal Commission on Education held this day, in consequence of what has appeared in the columns of The Times newspaper and some other papers, I was requested, as their Chairman, to state in my place in Parliament that the account which has appeared in The Times of the Report of the Royal Commission upon Elementary Education is unauthorized and is incorrect in many important particulars. It is based, apparently, upon drafts which had not received the final sanction of the Commission, but which must have been surreptitiously obtained. It would, of course, be a gross breach of duty to communicate to the public any matter contained in a Report to be submitted to the Queen before it has been laid before Her Majesty, and the Commission will not be able to make any Report public until their recommendations have been submitted to Her Majesty, which will probably not be for some weeks. The statements professing to indicate the character of a minority Report have no authority or justification.

HOUSE OF LORDS (LIFE PEERS) BILL. QUESTION.

EARL BEAUCHAMP asked the Prime Minister when the second reading of the Peerage Bill would be taken?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): Tuesday week may be a suitable day.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS ACT (1879) AMENDMENT (NO. 2) BILL.—(No. 138.) (The Earl of Aberdeen.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the purpose of the Bill, which had come up from the House of Commons, was to make permanent the Act of 1879. It was not necessary for him to dilate upon the misery and distress resulting from habitual drunkenness. He would merely observe that the attention of medical science had been increasingly applied to the malignant and relentless character of what might rightly be described as the "disease of inebriety," and the verdict of medical science was unquestionably in favour of such legislation as that contained in the Bill—only it would go a great deal further. Parliament, however, was wisely jealous concerning any measure which appeared to afford the slightest risk of undue interference with liberty. The Bill was, therefore, limited to 10 years. Two things were apparent from this experimental legislation—first, the complete sufficiency of the safeguards proposed for the regulation of the homes for habitual drunkards provided under the Act; and, secondly, the extensive need of, and also the extensive benefits conferred by, those homes. Those benefits would be extended if the Act were made permanent, because the temporary character of the Act of 1879 necessarily hampered the good work such homes as those now existing were intended to promote, for the obvious reason that people were not willing to invest capital in institutions in which no permanency could be guaranteed. From the excellent results obtained in many of these establishments, they held a high place in public estimation. Persons in all conditions of life—doctors, lawyers, and clergymen—who had inherited or acquired a disposition to alcoholic excess sought their shelter. He would only add that ample provision was made for inspection. In the absence of such an Act as this there was a real danger of unauthorized establishments springing up where no such guarantee could be provided. He hoped their Lordships would read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

EARL BROWNLOW said, he should offer no objection on the part of the Government to the second reading of the Bill. He would only call attention to Clause 3, the wording of which was not, he thought, sufficiently strong to secure the object of the clause. He had conferred privately with the noble Earl in charge of the Bill, and believed that he would be prepared to strengthen the clause in Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COMPANIES BILL.—(No. 153.) (The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD BRAMWELL said, he would remind their Lordships that the advantages of limited liability were so great that the great banking houses of London had adopted the principle very much to the good of everybody concerned. He believed the principle of limited liability had been very useful in enabling parties to combine small capitals. They were told the law had been abused, but he would ask their Lordships not to attach too much weight to that. He did not make these remarks for the purpose of objecting to any amendment of the law. On the contrary, the good will with which he regarded the law of limited liability would rather make him desire to see any improvement made that could be devised; but he doubted whether his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack or the Gentleman who drafted the Bill were the persons most qualified to discover the defects and to remedy them. Long before he knew this Bill was to be introduced he stated his own inability to do so. Lawyers were not so well acquainted with these matters as those who were concerned in the promoting and winding-up of Companies, and he thought those who could best inform their Lordships of the defects in the law were the solicitors, accountants, and others who were concerned in such business. He thought that this Bill would be a proper subject for consideration by a Select Committee which could take evidence. The first clause provided for the provisional registration of the Company. This he did not think at all unreasonable; but it was to be remembered that under a previous Act such provisional registration was required, and that Act had been repealed. The provision as to the appointment of trustees in whose names the money paid in respect of shares was to be deposited would not, he thought, afford much protection, for promoters who meant mischief would appoint trustees who would be puppets in their hands. The second clause appeared to have been drawn up upon the assumption that all Companies were publicly advertised and that the shares were allotted to the public. But that, he was informed, was a very great mistake. Many Companies were got up by persons who allotted the shares among themselves. He did not suggest that there was anything secret or irregular in these cases; they were perfectly respectable and bond fide. The conditions necessary to entitle a Company to complete registration were some of them open to great exception. It was provided that one-fourth of the shares should have been subscribed for, and that not less than one-tenth of the nominal amount subscribed should have been paid in cash. That would mean that if the capital was £1,000,000, shares to the amount of £250,000 should have been subscribed for, and that £25,000 should have been paid in cash. But it now often occurred that though the nominal capital was very large, the amount required to be called up was very small. Thus, in the case of the Law Fire Assurance Company, the nominal capital was £5,000,000, but an exceedingly small portion of this had been actually paid. He knew of a case of a Mining Company in Cornwall whose success was such that it was never found necessary to call up more than £10. This provision would be exceedingly inconvenient in many cases. Thus, in the case of a patent, a small amount might be sufficient to test its value and work it, yet no Company could be formed unless this large proportion of the subscribed capital was called up. If the capital was fixed at a high figure more would have to be called up than might be required, whereas, if it was fixed at a low figure, it might turn out that extensive experiments were required, and the capital would in that case not be sufficient. The requirement that each director should not hold less than 10 shares, and that the total number of shares held by the directors should be not less than one-fifth of the total number applied for, would also, he thought, unduly interfere with the legitimate creation of Companies. According to the Bill it appeared that the provisional directors would alone be responsible for misstatements in a prospectus. He thought that the directors who succeeded them ought also to be held responsible, for they ought not to become directors without having made all proper inquiries into the arrangements made by the provisional directors. Clause 11, which dealt with the liability of directors in respect of qualifying shares, was a well-intentioned section, but the provision that any man who accepted the post of director must at once pay up his shares was open to criticism. A preferable arrangement would be that the director should either pay up his shares or undertake not to transfer his rights in respect of them. Section 13, which provided for the issue every year of a balance-sheet seven days before the meeting of the Company, contained what was really a useless provision, for it was impossible to guard against fraud and roguery by the publication of a balance-sheet. The provision was objectionable because if a Company were compelled to distribute a balance-sheet its secrets would become known to its competitors, and it would thus be seriously hampered in its operations. He had personal knowledge of a most respectable and successful Company which had certainly been in existence for 60 years and which never produced a balance-sheet for the inspection of the shareholders. Clause 15, providing for a report by the liquidator on the winding up of a Company, was open to objection because it would impose a very disagreeable task upon the liquidator, who was generally nominated by the directors of the Company to be wound up, and because it contained no provision giving a person incriminated by the report the right of being heard. A provision ought to be inserted in the Bill to enable a man who was asked to lend money to a Company to inspect the register before making the loan. As the law would stand, unless the Bill were amended, he would not have the right to inspect the register before lending his money, and that right ought certainly to be given.

LORD THRING said, he was bound to characterize the Bill as a retrograde measure, for it would re-impose upon joint-stock Companies all the burdens and difficulties from which they hoped the past legislation had set them free for ever. The series of Acts which were consolidated in 1862, and again subsequently, had enabled Companies to be formed with a minimum of cost, and as a result commerce had increased by leaps and bounds and the country had benefited largely in a variety of ways.

THE EARL OF MORLEY asked the Lord Chancellor to explain how the permanent directors were to be made liable for any statement calculated to mislead in the Memorandum issued by the provisional directors.

LORD HERSCHELL said that he would not trouble their Lordships with many observations, as most of his remarks on the Bill had been anticipated by the noble and learned Lord who had addressed the House. Were they in a position to judge whether a measure of this sort would be likely to work well or ill? Schemes might look very well on paper and yet work indifferently; indeed, if they did not do good they might do harm by creating a false impression or by hampering undertakings which it was not desirable to subject to difficulty. Therefore, unless there was reasonable certainty, and this scheme was likely to answer and do good, there would be the danger of serious risks in adopting it. Had they the information which would enable them to express a substantial opinion? He had read criticisms praising the Bill as likely to be useful and others condemning it as mischievous; and the light of nature did not enable him to arrive at any certain decision. In his opinion some modifications would be necessary in the scheme proposed for the requisites to complete registration. He doubted whether any real security was gained by requiring that the directors of a Company should hold one-fifth of the paid-up capital. The result might be to exclude from the directorate the men best fitted to direct the affairs of a Company, for it did not follow that the man who had the most money would be the best director. What might be a large interest to one man might be a small one to another. It might be well to require that each director should have a status which should insure his taking interest in the affairs of the Company; but a large interest on the part of the directorate as a whole was compatible with one man having a very large stake and with the stakes of others being very limited. He had some doubt as to the expediency of presenting the form of the balance-sheet. In cases where there was keen competition, balance-sheets would be studied with the object of injuring those who published them, while they could easily be made to appear to be satisfactory in the case of Companies that were not on a sound footing, and the good done in checking reckless conduct might not at all compensate for the injury that might be done in other cases. In the case of paying Companies, he did not think the provision as to audit would be of much value; and as to the allowance for depreciation, the directors were left to fix that as low as they pleased. He did not make these remarks in any spirit of hostility to the Bill, for some improvement in the working of the Limited Liability Acts was called for, and if anything could be done to make them work better it was well worth doing. He only doubted whether they were in possession of sufficient information to enable them to remedy existing evils.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that, as there was no Notice of Amendment, he did not see what was aimed at by critical speeches on all the clauses of the Bill. There were serious evils deserving of a serious effort to remedy them if it could be made, as he believed it might be, without retrogressive legislation. Some of the provisions of the Bill might require to be amended, but he did not see in it any evidence of intentional retrogression. It was generally felt that more might be done than had been to check frauds and abuses in connection with the formation of Companies, and the Bill seemed calculated to do that. The subject was one on which the opinion of the Board of Trade might be important; and, if the Bill was a lawyer's measure, and had not been considered by the Board of Trade, then it might have been desirable that it should be referred to a Select Committee, if the state of the Business of the House had made that course possible.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble and learned Lord's strictures upon the debate would apply to the discussions upon all second readings. The subject was not a new one; still it was a convenient practice that, on the second reading of a Bill, some justification of its provisions should be offered. He was not quite sure that it was a matter upon which the authority of the Board of Trade would be absolute, for it could scarcely possess any special knowledge. But it would be satisfactory if they could hear some defence of the Bill against the arguments of the noble and learned Lord by whom it had been criticized.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, it seemed to him that one of the speeches that had been made would properly have been followed by a Motion for the rejection of the Bill. But it was an error to suppose that this was a lawyer's Bill, in the sense that its provisions had been suggested by lawyers. They had only put into shape the remedies that were recommended by mercantile men for the evils that had been complained of in the working of the Act of 1862. No one who had to do with the Courts of Law could doubt that there was an enormous amount of fraud committed in connection with some of those Companies, or that there was an enormous quantity of capital taken from innocent people by persons who issued fraudulent prospectuses. It might almost be said that a class of persons existed who lived by getting up fraudulent Companies and then wrecking them. In using the word draftsman on a former occasion, he had simply adopted the phrase as it was commonly used in the Courts of Law in reference to any clause. It very often happened that there was a volunteer draftsman of particular clauses when a Bill was going through Committee, and he certainly had not had the smallest idea of reflecting on the noble Lord (Lord Thring) in using the phrase in the sense in which he had employed it; nor had he supposed that the noble Lord was the draftsman of the particular clause in question. He felt the difficulty which a noble Lord near him had pointed out—that if he were to go through the Bill and justify it clause by clause, he should be doing what was not usual on the second reading, although he admitted that it was quite right that he should be asked to state the substance of the measure. The principle of those clauses was that, in the first instance, the promoters of a Company should, during the period of provisional registration, be Directors, and should be responsible for the conduct of the intended enterprise; and the provisions to which attention had been drawn in that discussion were designed to make it necessary that those persons should have a real and substantial interest in the concern. The object was to make those who presumably would issue the prospectus and put forward the scheme personally responsible for every false statement in the prospectus. There were now persons without means, without any capital at all to work the concern, who got up the scheme in the first instance, and then coaxed or beguiled a number of respectable persons to join the Company; and after that other persons were deceived, by seeing those respectable names, into taking shares and investing their money. That was the system which it was now sought to challenge; and it had been thought, not by lawyers, but by commercial men, that legislation with that object should be introduced. He had received remonstrances against the Government not being sufficiently active in bringing forward that Bill for the protection of commerce from many of our great towns. A noble and learned Lord had said that the insistence by legislation on the preparation of a balance-sheet was one of those mediæval superstitions which it might have been thought had died out. But an analogous provision of that kind had been introduced into a previous Act with good effect, and it was considered that it would prove useful in the present measure. With regard to the comments which had been made as to the defaults of Directors, he did not agree that a man who by his negligence caused injury to others should not be called on to pay a fine. If a Director wilfully and intentionally issued a false prospectus, or in other respects issued statements which were fraudulent to his knowledge, he ought to be held guilty of misdemeanour; but if the thing was not done wilfully or with his knowledge, but through the want of proper care on his part, he could be fairly made to pay a pecuniary fine. If their Lordships thought that the proposal of provisional registration was itself a mistake, then he conceded that a Bill on those lines could not receive their approval; but if there was to be provisional registration, and that provisional registration was only to be for a certain period, then he asked what class of legislation was desired in order to insist that persons putting forward a scheme of a Company should be themselves really interested in it and should give such a guarantee to the public that they had a substantial stake in the concern? Nothing could be, he thought, more appropriate than that such persons should subscribe a certain amount of the capital. The Government, having considered the matter on their responsibility, had deliberately adopted the principle of provisional registration. The history of that Bill was this:—As originally framed it was introduced to their Lordships by his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Preston) when President of the Board of Trade. That noble Lord had since been called to another sphere of duty; and now he himself had succeeded to the treatment of the subject. he should say, rather than of the Bill of which that noble Lord was the author. The result of that had been that the Bill now before their Lordships was the Bill which Her Majesty's Government now asked the House to read a second time. As to the suggestion that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, he had to remember the period of the Session at which that suggestion was made. If the Bill had been brought in early in the Session he would at once have acceded to that suggestion; but it was impossible not to see that acceding to it now would mean that they were not to pass any such Bill at all this Session. There was a pressure on the part of commercial men for a measure dealing with that subject, and he did not feel at liberty to agree to send that Bill to a Select Committee. At the same time, when they came to the Committee stage of [the Bill, he should be very glad to receive the assistance of noble and learned Lords in improving its details.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

TIMBER ACTS (IRELAND) AMEND-MENT BILL.—(No. 69.)

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1 (Amendments on the Timber Acts).

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Earl of CADOGAN) proposed an Amendment, which, he explained, would have the effect of practically taking the Schedule out of the Bill, and referring only to one of the old Timber Acts—namely, the 23 & 24 Geo. III. c. 39, intituled—“An Act to amend the Acts relating to the planting of Timber Trees.” He proposed this Amendment in order to meet the objections which had been raised by a noble Earl behind him on the second reading of the Bill.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 5, leave out (“the Timber Acts”) and insert—

(“The Act of the Session of the Irish Parliament of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of the reign of King George the Third, chapter thirty-nine, intituled 'An Act to amend the Acts relating to the planting of Timber Trees'");

in line 9, leave out ("the Timber Acts") and insert ("the said Act of King George the Third"); and in line 12, leave out ("the Timber Acts") and insert—

("The said Act of King George the Third, and the other Acts relating to the planting of Timber Trees in Ireland.")—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Amendment of Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, s. 4).

A noble LORD (for Lord SUDELEY) proposed an Amendment providing that no claim may be made under this Act, or under any of the Acts mentioned in the Schedule of this Act, exceeding in amount the value of the trees at the time the claim was made. In 1886, when the Bill identical to this was passed through their Lordships' House, a similar Amendment to this was also passed.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 25, after ("Acts") insert ("Provided always, that no claim may be made under this Act, or under any of the Acts mentioned in the Schedule of this Act, exceeding in amount the value of the trees at the time the claim is made.")

EARL CADOGAN said, he would recommend their Lordships to accept the Amendment; but he would wish to have an alteration made in the wording of it. It would be unfair to the tenant that the compensation should be limited simply to the value of the trees at the time at which they were planted, because he might have incurred other expenses in making fences, trenching, and so on.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

The Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 188.)

LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS BILL.

(The Lord Bramwell.)

(No. 159.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BRAMWELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that as his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack stated that the Bill which had lately been under discussion was recommended by mercantile people, so he would begin by saying that this Bill was recommended by the Associated Chambers of Commerce. The principle of the measure was to enable several persons to be united in partnership of whom one or more should be liable under the ordinary terms of partnership, while one or more should be liable only to a definite and limited amount. If he should be asked to what use the powers thus given could be put, he would quote the answer which he gave to a similar question when Limited Liability was under discussion—it was impossible to say. There was scarcely any case in which the Bill might not be applicable. Suppose a man was carrying on a private business and that illness made him desirous to retire. He might have got children or old servants whom he wished to assist in continuing the business. But he did not want to continue a partner so as to be liable to his last acre or his last shilling, though he was willing to stake a certain amount for which alone he should be liable. The principle of the Bill seemed to him a perfectly right one, and therefore he asked their Lordships to read it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bramwell.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES — DEFENCE OF ESQUIMAULT HARBOUR.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, as your Lordships will remember, in the discussion which took place in your Lordships' House a short time ago on the subject of the defences of Vancouver's Island, Her Majesty's Government stated that, after fully considering the rival positions of Esquimault and Burrard's Inlet, they had, on the advice of their experts, decided to keep the naval headquarters at Esquimault. That being the decision of Her Majesty's Government, I have no wish to say one single word with regard to it, though I regret very much that they came to that decision; but although, My Lords, as that decision has been arrived at, I regard the matter as finally settled. I am sure your Lordships will agree with me that it is of the utmost importance now that it has been definitely arranged that Esquimault is to be the permanent naval headquarters of our Naval Station on the Pacific, and that it is absolutely necessary that no time should be lost in rendering that position thoroughly defended, it being at present absolutely undefended. I am anxious, therefore, to ask Her Majesty's Government a Question of which I have given Notice; but before doing so, there is another point to which I desire to refer for one moment, and it is a point of some importance. It appears that considerable alarm has been produced in the minds of Gentlemen connected with Burrard's Inlet, as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at the idea which was conveyed during the discussion to which I have referred, that Burrard's Inlet was not in any way to be protected. The impression was given by that discussion that Burrard's Inlet could not be defended, either from the mainland or from the sea, and that that was one great reason why the Admiralty thought it necessary to keep the naval headquarters at Esquimault. I have received information from a naval officer of very high standing, connected with the locality, showing that from the mainland it would be very easy to defend Burrard's Inlet, as the attacking force would have to cross three rivers and an impenetrable forest. I hope my noble Friend when he comes to answer my Question will be able to say that when Esquimault has been fortified the Admiralty, or Her Majesty's Government, will consider the advisability of placing some guns at the entrance to Burrard's Inlet, so that it may also be protected from the sea in the event of hostile ships passing Esquimault and coming up to attack it. I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government, What arrangements have been made with the Dominion Government of Canada for the defence of the naval headquarters in the Pacific, Esquimault Harbour; and if the plans for the fortifications and defences have been finished, when the works will be commenced, and when the armaments will be sent out; and, whether the Government will state by what date the fortifications will be completed and the guns placed in position?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord Knutsford): My Lords, in reply to the Question which appears on the Paper, I have to inform the noble Lord that no arrangements have been actually made with the Dominion Government of Canada, but that arrangements have been proposed for the defence of Esquimault, as was stated in your Lordships' House on June the 12th, and have been communicated to the Dominion Government by me on the 18th of June. On learning from the Dominion Government that they assent to the arrangements, with or without any alteration of details, Her Majesty's Government will then be in a position to immediately proceed with the works that are contemplated, and no time will be lost. I may say that the guns and such further armaments as are to be provided from this country are in a very forward state at present, and there will be no delay on that score. Therefore, that answer really covers the whole of the noble Lord's question. Before, of course, the plans for the fortifications and defences have been finished here, no works can be commenced, and no further steps will be taken until we receive the answer of the Dominion Government. As regards the point the noble Lord last referred to, I think that those who are afraid for the safety to Burrard's Inlet may rest tolerably well at ease, considering what was stated on June the 12th by the noble Lords who then spoke, and by the opinion which I have stated to the Dominion Government, an opinion which received the concurrence of both the Naval and Military Departments. Perhaps the noble Lord will allow me to read in support of this view, one passage from the despatch which I then forwarded to the Dominion Government—

"It will be observed that the proposed scheme of defence has been drawn up more especially with a view to the direct defence of the harbour of Esquimault, protection is, however, at the same time conferred upon the town of Victoria. When Esquimault has been made into a strong naval base, the danger of attempting a bombardment of Victoria, which would be fruitless of all real military result, becomes so great as to render such a measure highly improbable."

And then comes the part which will especially interest the noble Lord—

"For similar reasons any hostile operations, directed against Burrard's Inlet and Nanaimo, need hardly be anticipated. No naval commander would be likely to risk his vessels in the somewhat intricate navigation and the prevalent fogs which characterize the How Straits, leaving in his rear the strong strategic position of Esquimaux, serving as the fortified base of Her Majesty's Pacific Squadron."

With regard to any fortifications by land, that also will receive careful consideration, but not at the present time. There is no necessity at present for strengthening the land fortifications of that part.

VAUXHALL PARK BILL (by Order).

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.), who had a Motion on the Paper to re-commit the Bill in respect of Clause 8, and a new clause, said he would move, if he were in Order, that the consideration of the Bill be postponed until after the discussion upon the Brixton Park Bill.

Lord Knutsford

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) objected to the proposal, on the ground that the hon. Member had stated no reason for postponing the third reading of the Bill until after the Brixton Park Bill had been taken.

MR. SPEAKER said, the House had already consented to postpone the consideration of this Bill and the Brixton Bill until after the other Orders of the Day, and they must now be taken in their regular order.

MR. KELLY said, that, under those circumstances, he did not propose to take any action with regard to the Vauxhall Park Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

BRIXTON PARK BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, he rose for the purpose of moving the Amendment which stood in his name, and which was, in fact, to leave out Clause 15, which provided that the question of purchasing the land should be decided by a public meeting of ratepapers held in the Vestry Hall and presided over by the rector of the parish, after the necessary advertisement, unless at least one-fourth of those present should demand another, making requisite the approval of the ratepayers shown by a poll to be taken in the same way as under the Public Libraries Act, and re-insert in a clause which that House agreed to unanimously with the consent of all parties concerned in the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): No; that is not quite accurate.

MR. BROADHURST said, that his hon. Friend said that that was not quite accurate. He wished to be strictly accurate. The clause to which he wished to refer was agreed to by hon. Gentlemen opposite; at least no objection was taken to it, and there was no Division upon it.

MR. COURTNEY said, that perhaps the hon. Gentleman would allow him to explain how the matter stood. He said that the clause he proposed to insert was agreed to. That was not the case. A certain proposal had been assented to, and that was embodied in the Bill as it stood.

MR. BROADHURST believed his hon. Friend was technically right; but an Instruction was agreed to on that occasion, and the new clause he had now to propose would carry out that Instruction. The object of the clause was to provide that the question whether the Bill was to be adopted and the purchase of that plot of land assented to, should be submitted to the whole of the ratepayers, and not be decided by the Vestry or by a public meeting. So far as the clause was concerned, which had been inserted by the Committee after the Instruction he had alluded to was agreed to by all parties, he should have to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while he explained how the matter stood. He would state, as shortly as he could, the history of the Bill, and the reasons why he opposed it. Now the Bill related to a plot of ground on Brixton Hill, which was owned by a Vestryman, and the son of its owner was also, or had been, a Vestryman. The land was originally purchased for building purposes, no doubt with a view of bringing shop fronts up to the margin of the pavement. That House, in its great wisdom, in the early part of last year defeated a scheme which had for its object the breaking of a law in reference to property in that part of London, and which provided that within a certain distance of a main road no permanent building should be erected. They defeated a Bill which was introduced into that House for the purpose of breaking that law. The owner of the property immediately turned round when he saw there was no hope of the Bill being passed by that House, and got up an agitation for the purchase of the property for a park. It seemed to have been discovered at once, but not until after it became known that there was no prospect of passing the Bill, that this was an admirable place for a park, and an agitation was at once commenced at the instance, he believed, of the owners of the property, in order to induce the Lambeth Vestry to take steps for purchasing these 12½ acres of land for a park site. He wished hon. Members present to notice the fact that there were three acres of this ground which could not possibly be built upon, and which consisted of enclosed gardens, nor could any building be erected upon that ground. Therefore, all the calculations made as to its value were erroneous, because they had been based on the theory that the whole of the 12½ acres were available for building purposes; whereas three acres could not be touched, because they were protected by the Act he had already referred to—namely, the Rushcommon Act. What happened after the agitation for the purchase of the property in order to convert it into a public park was this—There was another Vestryman who had a site for sale. He also seemed to have discovered that that part of Lambeth was very much in want of a park site. He (Mr. Broadhurst) had no doubt that Vestrymen who were landowners had very great sympathy for one another, and he had not the least doubt in his own mind that the Vestryman to whom he had referred took a course which best suited his own interests, and, consequently, he was desirous of securing the interests of a friend who was in a similar situation, and that, last of all, he took into consideration the necessities and requirements of the poor ratepayers of the parish. The first step taken in this case was the promotion of a Private Bill. It was presented to that House, promoted and petitioned against; but who were those who petitioned against it? He hoped hon. Members would mark this fact. Among the Petitions presented against the Bill, the chief Petition was one from the man who desired to sell the land. He petitioned the Committee, presumably, against the Bill; but his Petition had been rightly and properly described as a bogus Petition, because it was a Petition presented in order to mislead, and, no doubt, it did mislead, the House, although, happily, it did not deceive, because everything in relation to that particular Petition was discovered. The next step to take was to negotiate with the Metropolitan Board of Works. Now, there was a distinguished gentleman, an architect named Fowler, who represented one of the wards of Lambeth on the Lambeth Vestry, and represented Lambeth Vestry on the Board of Works. In consequence of certain statements, or revelations, which had been made, Mr.

Fowler no longer represented Lambeth on the Vestry, and the Vestry had rejected him as their representative on the Metropolitan Board of Works. Consequently, that connection between the Lambeth Vestry and the Metropolitan Board of Works no longer existed, and another representative had been sent by the Vestry to the Board of Works in the place of Mr. Fowler. He came now to the question of the necessity of acquiring this land for the purposes of a public park, and he wished to point out to the House that although the site was a small one of 12½ acres, about two acres of it were already built upon, and contained houses and gardens which could not be got rid of for some years, because there were 22 or more years lease yet to run. That meant a very small piece of land available for park purposes; and it was a piece of land which lay at right angles back from the main road, so that it presented itself in the form, as it were, of a hole in the wall—there was only one way in and one way out. Now, they were all in favour of open spaces where they were reasonable and required by the public, and where proper arrangements in every shape might be carried out. But as to the requirements of this particular parish—and he spoke as a friend of open spaces—they were far less than the requirements of other parishes. In that instance, the whole of the ratepayers of Lambeth were to be called upon to pay through their rents an exorbitant price for the purchase of this piece of land which was situated at the further end of the parish of Lambeth, where open spaces were least necessary than in any other part of the parish. If this were a space near the Westminster Bridge Road, they would all be at once prepared to support its conversion into a public park on account of the over crowded condition of the neighbourhood. But this neighbourhood was not over crowded. Unfortunately, he had not got the figures with him, but he read them to the House on the last occasion that that Bill was discussed, and he thought he said that there were only from 140 to 150 persons to a square mile. Certainly, that was not a very over crowded neighbourhood. In the next place, Clapham Common was within less than a mile of this very spot, and within one mile and 100 yards in another direction there was Tooting Common.

Mr. Broadhurst

Consequently there were two fine commons within easy walking distance of this wretched little plot of land for which the Vestry sought to extort an exorbitant price out of the pockets of the ratepayers. And what had been the means employed to bring this matter underneath the notice of the ratepayers? All sorts of schemes and plans had been adopted, one of which was the recognition of the Temperance League, who held a large meeting on this site on Whit Monday. Happily for his quietude and peace of mind, he was not at home on that day; but he was told that the temperance demonstration resulted nearly in a riot, and nearly everybody who attended it was exceedingly drunk, and that the whole scene was one of the wildest disorder that could be imagined. It disgusted the whole neighbourhood, and people came to the conclusion that if this piece of land were turned into a public park, it might on any day be employed for a similar purpose. It carried reason on the face of it, and he had no doubt it was drawn by the Committee without knowing much of the depth of cunning which animated the promoters of this scheme. The clause in its beautiful innocence said that—

“The decision of the ratepayers is to be taken at public meetings assembled to be held at Brixton Hall, Acre Lane, after proper and necessary advertisement had been given, and is to be presided over by the rector of the parish.”

At that meeting, a resolution was to be submitted approving of the purchase of the said land, and the question

“Shall be decided by the majority of the ratepayers present and voting thereat; provided that not less than one-fourth of the ratepayers present, on the show of hands taken for the purpose, shall demand that such question be taken by a poll of the ratepayers, such poll to be taken in the same manner as under the Free Libraries Act.”

Perhaps he would be allowed to point out to the House that the promoters of the Bill were persons who had an interest in the sale of this piece of land. He was not saying whether they were actually to reap a profit or not; but they had a large interest in the Bill, which meant that if they were successful, they would obtain a profit of from £22,000 to £23,000. Now, was it to be supposed for a moment that in the hall holding only 600 or 700 ratepayers these persons, having £22,000 or £23,000 at stake, would not take care that the hall was thoroughly well packed and the meeting primed with the right sort of men to give the necessary vote when the resolution came to be submitted by the rector of the parish, who was to preside as ex-officio Chairman of the Vestry of the said parish. There could be no doubt that the hall would be packed and that those present would vote as they had been instructed and induced to vote by every means known to persons of that class. What he asked the House to do, in place of that clause, was to insert a clause which would give the right to the ratepayers of the whole parish to decide whether the park should be purchased or not—that was, that every ratepayer should have a paper left at his house and should vote in precisely the same manner as he would do in the case of the Free Libraries Act, saying “yea” or “nay” to the proposal. Surely, that was a proposal which hon. Gentlemen would agree to. Could anyone say that it was not a fair and reasonable proposal? The Vestry, by a majority of two to one, had decided against the proposal two or three times. An election had since taken place on which there was a considerable expenditure of money, and the result was that that majority had been reduced, but still there was a majority of the members of the Vestry against the Bill. He asked the House to secure to the ratepayers the right of saying whether this Bill should be passed into an Act, or whether it should not. He (Mr. Broadhurst) saw that his hon. Friend who sat for the division in which he lived was at that moment in his place. This plot of land was situated in the centre of the division his hon. Friend represented. He (Mr. Broadhurst) did not think that his hon. Friend intended to support the Bill. On the contrary, he thought he was going to vote against it. He had only one other point. The completion of this scheme partly rested with the decision of the Metropolitan Board of Works. As he said earlier, the Metropolitan Board did, through the representative from the Lambeth Vestry, agree, under certain conditions with regard to the purchase, to subscribe £1,000 per acre; but he would ask the House whether it was right that the ratepayers of Lambeth should be left to the mercy of the Metropolitan Board under existing circumstances. Why, the ratepayers of London were at that moment without a municipal government. They had no proper authority on which they could rely or in which they had confidence to protect them against jobbery and outrage. The Metropolitan Board of Works existed in law, but it did not exist in the confidence of the people of the Metropolis. He saw, and he was glad to see, that there were two Members of the Cabinet present. He would ask them and the Government to place themselves between those who were the lambs in this conspiracy and the wolves who were promoting it. He asked them to act as shepherds, because their natural shepherd had disgraced their standard and he trusted would soon be disestablished by law. Never was there a more unreasonable, a more unnecessary, or a more doubtfully promoted scheme submitted to the House of Commons for the so-called benefit of Lambeth than the Bill he was then opposing, and he appealed to hon. Members on both sides of the House to reject it. This was no Party question. There were no politics in it whatever. Some Conservatives were supporting it, and many were opposing it. Some Liberals were supporting it, and many were opposing it. He trusted that the House would protect the ratepayers, and insert the clause which stood on the Paper in his name in place of Clause 15, which he proposed to strike out.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out Clause 15, and insert the following Clause:—“The purchase of the said lands shall not be made until the opinion of the ratepayers of Lambeth has been taken on the desirability of such purchase, by way of a poll of such ratepayers, such poll to be taken in the same manner and with the same incidents as to voting papers, expenses, and otherwise as a poll of ratepayers under ‘The Public Libraries Act, 1855,’ and the Public Libraries Amendment Act, 1877.’ For the purpose of this section the expression ‘ratepayer’ shall mean every person who will be liable to contribute towards any rate levied for the purpose of any expenditure or contribution by the Vestry under this Act.”—(Mr. Broadhurst.)

Clause (Approval of ratepayers) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Clause be read a second time.”

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), in his opening remarks, stated that he intended to give a short history of the Bill. Perhaps the hon. Member would permit him (the Marquess of Carmarthen) to give the House a short history of his action in regard to it. The hon. Member said that he was in favour of open spaces wherever they were needed and wherever they were necessary. But when this Bill came before the House on the first occasion he opposed it on three grounds. Firstly, because he maintained that it was a great piece of jobbery, although he produced absolutely no evidence whatever to make good that assertion in any way; secondly, because he thought the price proposed to be paid for the land was excessive, although evidence was brought before the Committee to show that, in the opinion of Messrs. Debenham and Mason, the eminent firm of auctioneers, the price was a very reasonable one indeed; and, thirdly, because there were houses upon it. The promoters suggested at the time the Bill was brought in that those houses might be kept up, and that arrangement made by which they could be utilized for the purpose of keeping up the park. The hon. Member, however, objected to that proposal, and to meet his objections the promoters withdrew that clause altogether. As the hon. Member very well knew, the houses to which he objected were only to stand until the lease expired, when they were to be pulled down, and there was a clause in the Bill which said that no house was to be re-erected. When these provisions were inserted in the Bill it was thought that they would draw the teeth of the hon. Gentleman's opposition, but it appeared now that his opposition was of a different character. He must confess that the course he had pursued was somewhat remarkable. If there was one scheme which he denounced more strongly than others it was the Vauxhall Park Bill; but where was his opposition now? It had vanished into thin air. His reasons, as he (the Marquess of Carmarthen) had explained, for opposing the Bill were that it was a piece of jobbery, that too great a price was to be paid for it, and that there were buildings upon it. One would certainly have thought that if his opposition was based on such grounds he would have had a word or two to say against the Vauxhall Park Bill, which was to acquire a site of only eight acres, whereas the site for the proposed Brixton Park was 12½ acres. He should certainly offer to the proposal of the hon. Member a strenuous opposition, because he regarded it as absolutely unnecessary. Certain Instructions were given by that House to the Committee on the last occasion that the Bill was under discussion, and the Committee, with those Instructions before them, inserted the clause which now stood in the Bill, which gave the ratepayers full control over the purchase of this piece of land. If the ratepayers were strongly opposed to the Bill, it was no great hardship to ask them to attend a public meeting and declare their views. The hon. Member said that Brixton Hall was only capable of holding 600 or 700 people. Perhaps his (the Marquess of Carmarthen's) experience was greater than that of the hon. Member. He was sure he had seen more than twice the number mentioned by the hon. Member assembled in that hall. [Mr. BROADHURST: Nothing of the kind.] For those reasons he wished to oppose the clause which had been submitted by the hon. Member. He considered it nothing more nor less than a direct attempt to wreck the Bill, and it was thoroughly characterized by the hon. Member's action throughout. The hon. Member never liked the Bill, but he never cared to get up in his place in that House and say so. He should undoubtedly divide against the Amendment, because he would be no party to saddling the ratepayers of the parish with the expense of opposing the Bill. He saw that the hon. Member was making signs to his hon. Friend the Member for the Norwood Division of Lambeth (Mr. Bristowe), who was sitting on that side of the House, with a view of inducing him to get up in his place in opposition to him. He was afraid that his hon. Friend, whose constituency the future park was to serve, would have nothing to do with it. He feared that he was much more interested in another scheme which was not quite in so forward a stage. Nevertheless, his name appeared upon the back of the Bill. He sincerely trusted that the House would support him in opposing the clause.

MR. BRISTOWE (Lambeth, Norwood) said, his noble Friend (the Mar-

quess of Carmarthen) had said that his (Mr. Bristowe's) name was on the back of the Bill. That was quite true, but he put his name on the Bill because he considered it his duty to do so, seeing that he represented the division in which the proposed park was situated. He was certainly not prepared to back up every word that had been stated by his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Broadhurst) with reference to this part of Brixton in the division of Norwood not being in want of open spaces. He believed that open spaces were highly advantageous to all parts of London, and he was very much in favour of them. He was certainly not aware of the unseemly meeting which the hon. Member said took place on this piece of ground on Whit Monday. At the same time, he should go into the Lobby with his hon. Friend for this reason, and this reason only—that there was a strong feeling in the parish of Lambeth in regard to this question of the purchase of the park. He, therefore, did not think that any arrangement should be entered into, except with the consent of the ratepayers generally. On the 30th of April a Petition was presented to that House in reference to the Vauxhall Park Bill, which ran on all fours with that scheme from the Lambeth Vestry, asking that the matter should be decided by the ratepayers. Since then there had been another election, and nothing had taken place to alter the decision of the Vestry with regard to that Bill. The question, therefore, should be left to be settled by the ratepayers themselves. Now, he considered that what had taken place with regard to the Vauxhall Park Bill applied also to Brixton, where the feeling undoubtedly ran high. At the last meeting of the Board, on the 14th of June, several divisions upon this question took place, and the voting was in one case 49 to 48, in another 53 to 52, and in a third 51 to 50. Therefore, although he was in favour of open spaces, and his hon. Friend was perfectly aware of that, seeing that the feeling of the parish ran so high, and taking into consideration that the Vestry did not wish to have this power thrown on them, but desired that it should be placed in the hands of the ratepayers, he supported the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend opposite. Perhaps he might have a little more respect for the Vestry than his hon. Friend had. At all events, they were the representative Body of the parish of Lambeth, and he considered that he was only acting in accordance with their wishes and what he believed to be the feelings of the ratepayers of the parish, if he went into the Lobby with his hon. Friend, with a view of throwing the responsibility of the purchase upon the ratepayers.

MR. COURTNEY said, he wished to make the House acquainted with the exact point which was to be considered. His hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) had posed before the House as a lamb. Now, in the days of Mr. Bernal Osborne, the House used to hear about the Nottingham lambs, but they were always supposed to be able to take care of themselves. He had no doubt that his hon. Friend, one of the present Members for the borough, was quite able to take care of himself. Whatever amount of accuracy there might be in the allegation that the price to be paid for the park was excessive, or that the feeling in Lambeth was against the purchase, none of these questions were involved in the issue before the House. His hon. Friend made many objections to the second reading of the Bill, and he would make similar objections now. The Bill, however, was read a second time, and no step was ever taken to bring before the Committee to whom the Bill was referred, the allegations which were made on the second reading by the hon. Member. Surely, that House was not a proper tribunal for inquiring into the accuracy of the statements of the hon. Member. The issue before the House was simply this—The Bill had been read a second time, referred to a Committee, and in accordance with a Resolution and Instruction passed by the House, the Committee put into the Bill a provision to enable the votes of the ratepayers, if necessary, to be taken, and the only question now was, in which of two ways should the opinion of the ratepayers be taken upon the question of the purchase. The question of the propriety of the purchase itself was not raised; but the question which was raised was, what guarantee they could have that the ratepayers of Lambeth were in favour of the purchase. In the absence of any opposition, the Committee, before whom the Bill went hurst), in his opening remarks, stated that he intended to give a short history of the Bill. Perhaps the hon. Member would permit him (the Marquess of Carmarthen) to give the House a short history of his action in regard to it. The hon. Member said that he was in favour of open spaces wherever they were needed and wherever they were necessary. But when this Bill came before the House on the first occasion he opposed it on three grounds. Firstly, because he maintained that it was a great piece of jobbery, although he produced absolutely no evidence whatever to make good that assertion in any way; secondly, because he thought the price proposed to be paid for the land was excessive, although evidence was brought before the Committee to show that, in the opinion of Messrs. Debenham and Mason, the eminent firm of auctioneers, the price was a very reasonable one indeed; and, thirdly, because there were houses upon it. The promoters suggested at the time the Bill was brought in that those houses might be kept up, and that arrangement made by which they could be utilized for the purpose of keeping up the park. The hon. Member, however, objected to that proposal, and to meet his objections the promoters withdrew that clause altogether. As the hon. Member very well knew, the houses to which he objected were only to stand until the lease expired, when they were to be pulled down, and there was a clause in the Bill which said that no house was to be re-erected. When these provisions were inserted in the Bill it was thought that they would draw the teeth of the hon. Gentleman's opposition, but it appeared now that his opposition was of a different character. He must confess that the course he had pursued was somewhat remarkable. If there was one scheme which he denounced more strongly than others it was the Vauxhall Park Bill; but where was his opposition now? It had vanished into thin air. His reasons, as he (the Marquess of Carmarthen) had explained, for opposing the Bill were that it was a piece of jobbery, that too great a price was to be paid for it, and that there were buildings upon it. One would certainly have thought that if his opposition was based on such grounds he would have had a word or two to say against the Vauxhall Park Bill, which was to acquire a site of only eight acres, whereas the site for the proposed Brixton Park was 12½ acres. He should certainly offer to the proposal of the hon. Member a strenuous opposition, because he regarded it as absolutely unnecessary. Certain Instructions were given by that House to the Committee on the last occasion that the Bill was under discussion, and the Committee, with those Instructions before them, inserted the clause which now stood in the Bill, which gave the ratepayers full control over the purchase of this piece of land. If the ratepayers were strongly opposed to the Bill, it was no great hardship to ask them to attend a public meeting and declare their views. The hon. Member said that Brixton Hall was only capable of holding 600 or 700 people. Perhaps his (the Marquess of Carmarthen's) experience was greater than that of the hon. Member. He was sure he had seen more than twice the number mentioned by the hon. Member assembled in that hall. [Mr. BROADHURST: Nothing of the kind.] For those reasons he wished to oppose the clause which had been submitted by the hon. Member. He considered it nothing more nor less than a direct attempt to wreck the Bill, and it was thoroughly characterized by the hon. Member's action throughout. The hon. Member never liked the Bill, but he never cared to get up in his place in that House and say so. He should undoubtedly divide against the Amendment, because he would be no party to saddling the ratepayers of the parish with the expense of opposing the Bill. He saw that the hon. Member was making signs to his hon. Friend the Member for the Norwood Division of Lambeth (Mr. Bristowe), who was sitting on that side of the House, with a view of inducing him to get up in his place in opposition to him. He was afraid that his hon. Friend, whose constituency the future park was to serve, would have nothing to do with it. He feared that he was much more interested in another scheme which was not quite in so forward a stage. Nevertheless, his name appeared upon the back of the Bill. He sincerely trusted that the House would support him in opposing the clause.

MR. BRISTOWE (Lambeth, Norwood) said, his noble Friend (the Mar-guess of Carmarthen) had said that his (Mr. Bristowe's) name was on the back of the Bill. That was quite true, but he put his name on the Bill because he considered it his duty to do so, seeing that he represented the division in which the proposed park was situated. He was certainly not prepared to back up every word that had been stated by his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Broadhurst) with reference to this part of Brixton in the division of Norwood not being in want of open spaces. He believed that open spaces were highly advantageous to all parts of London, and he was very much in favour of them. He was certainly not aware of the unseemly meeting which the hon. Member said took place on this piece of ground on Whit Monday. At the same time, he should go into the Lobby with his hon. Friend for this reason, and this reason only—that there was a strong feeling in the parish of Lambeth in regard to this question of the purchase of the park. He, therefore, did not think that any arrangement should be entered into, except with the consent of the ratepayers generally. On the 30th of April a Petition was presented to that House in reference to the Vauxhall Park Bill, which ran on all fours with that scheme from the Lambeth Vestry, asking that the matter should be decided by the ratepayers. Since then there had been another election, and nothing had taken place to alter the decision of the Vestry with regard to that Bill. The question of the propriety of the purchase itself was not raised; but the question which was raised was, what guarantee they could have that the ratepayers of Lambeth were in favour of the purchase. In the absence of any opposition, the Committee, before whom the Bill went as an unopposed measure, endeavoured to carry out the desire of the House, and provided that the scheme should not be carried out unless the resolution, which must first of all be taken by the Vestry, was brought before a public meeting of the ratepayers. If such public meeting of the ratepayers decided in favour of the purchase, even then the thing was not complete, if one-fourth of those present demanded a poll. But if the opposition at a public meeting did not amount to one-fourth, then the decision of the public meeting would be held sufficient to ratify the decision of the Vestry. His hon. Friend, on the other hand, wished to have the whole parish put to the expense of a poll, even, though, at a public meeting, especially convened for the purpose, there should not be one-fourth of those present objecting to the scheme. It must also be remembered that this was a very large parish extending from beyond Brixton down to Westminster Bridge. Now, he confessed, that it was a serious matter to go beyond the representative authority of the parish at all, and many Members objected to it on principle; but inasmuch as the House decided that there should be a reference beyond the Vestry, the Committee put in a clause embodying a reference first to a public meeting and then to the ratepayers at large. His hon. Friend insisted that the proper course was to appeal to the ratepayers, even, although, more than three-fourths of those present at the public meeting were in favour of the scheme. Now, if it be true that at that moment the Vestry itself was opposed to the Bill, was it conceivable that the promoters of the scheme would succeed in getting a public meeting, presided over by the rector of the parish, so packed that the opponents of the Bill would not be able to number one-fourth of those present. He certainly thought that they would expose the ratepayers of Lambeth, or any other parish, to very great hardship if they were to insist upon saddling them with the expense of a poll taken for so large a parish, when the Vestry were opposed to the scheme and a public meeting was to be called for an express purpose of giving a decision by a majority of three to one. That was the whole point. If a public meeting decided by three to one, then the matter was complete. He did not think they ought to put the parish to the expense of a poll in opposition to the wishes of three-fourths of the ratepayers assembled at a public meeting. He confessed that that was not a reasonable proposition, and he asked the House to reject it.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked, might he point out, in answer to the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Courtney), that he had a considerable natural distrust of the operation of these public meetings. In this case, the ratepayers of Lambeth were threatened to be saddled with an enormous burden of taxation for the purchase of that park, and it was alleged that the sum to be paid for the land was greatly in excess of what it ought to be. He should certainly be disinclined to accept the opinion expressed at a public meeting as the ultimate decision of a parish, because it was perfectly well known that that test had been applied in other cases, and had been found wanting. He thought it would be far better in this case to adopt the course which was pursued in connection with another important matter—namely, the establishment of free libraries. In that case, if there was a difference of opinion, it was competent for a small minority to force a ballot upon the parish, and have a poll taken for the purpose of ascertaining what were the wishes of the ratepayers. It appeared to him, therefore, that the hon. Member for West Nottingham was strictly following a precedent which had been long accepted by the House and the country, in asking that a similar method of ascertaining the wishes of the ratepayers should be adopted on that occasion. He was not, for the moment, going to suggest that any public meeting which might be held on that occasion would be packed or otherwise, but it was a matter of general experience that meetings of that kind had proved very unsatisfactory. Many people were not able to attend them, and many who did attend were unable to give a satisfactory expression to their views. He thought it was worthy of the consideration of the House whether, in view of the County Council which was proposed to be established for the Metropolitan area, and the municipal duties which were about to be conferred upon the Metropolis, it would not be wise and beneficial to the people of Brixton to allow this important question to be decided by that newly constituted authority when it was called into existence, rather than have it thrust on them at the hands of a moribund authority which was certainly not a representative authority. It must be fully borne in mind that if that park was purchased, the burden of taxation in the parish would be greatly increased. He thought the principle he suggested had invariably been acted upon in connection with Acts of Parliament passed by that House, and he trusted that it would be adopted here. He was sure that it was a suggestion worthy of consideration.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was sorry to find himself in conflict with his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham. He fully recognized his efforts in reference to the open spaces, and he regretted, therefore, on the present occasion, to find that he could not concur with the views he had expressed. But in all these cases he was opposed to a reference to the ratepayers. As, however, the House gave an Instruction to that effect to the Committee, he had not objected. In the case of Vauxhall Park, if he had been present, he should certainly have opposed the provision which was inserted in the Bill to that effect; but he had not thought it right to propose that the Bill should be altogether rejected on the third reading. He thought that the course suggested by the Chairman of Committees would, to a great extent, remedy the evils which had been pointed out; and he thought that, on the whole, the House would act wisely in agreeing to the clause as it stood in the Bill, and in not adopting that which his hon. Friend proposed to substitute. His only object in rising then was to protest against the insertion in future of clauses of the kind.

QUESTIONS.

LAND ACT, 1881, SEC. 19—LABOURERS' DWELLINGS—APPLICATIONS.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is in a position to state the number of applications to fix, under the Land Act of 1881, in which the Land Commissioners have made an order under the 19th section of the Act for the erection of labourers' dwellings, the number of cases in which such orders have been complied with, and the number of cases in which steps have been taken to enforce such orders?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that the number of orders referred to is 820, together with one made under Section 3 of the Labourers' Cottages and Allotments Act, 1882. The duty of securing compliance with such order is attached by Statute to the Sanitary Authority of the district concerned; and I find that in order to reply to the concluding portion of the Question it would be requisite to call for Reports from the clerks of each of the Unions in which orders have been made, which would necessarily take some time. If my hon. Friend thinks it necessary I will make further inquiry.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS gave Notice of a further Question on Monday.

ADMIRALTY—THE CHANNEL FLEET —BELFAST LOUGH—ANCHORAGE IN BANGOR BAY.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Why, on the occasion of the recent visit of the Channel Fleet to Belfast Lough, Her Majesty's ships anchored in Bangor Bay instead of the usual man-of-war roads, midway between Bangor and Carrickfergus; whether the anchorage at the roadstead is much superior to that in Bangor Bay; whether the contracts are held in, and the mails sent to and from, Carrickfergus, which necessitated the ships' boats having constantly to cross the Lough; and, whether orders will be given for Her Majesty's ships in the future to adhere to the man-of-war roads?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD) (Lancashire, Ormskirk): Perhaps my hon. and gallant Friend will allow me to answer the Question on behalf of the First Lord. The Admiral commanding the Channel Squadron was ordered to visit Belfast

Lough in the course of his cruise, but no restriction was placed on his selection of the anchorage which he considered most convenient. With certain winds the Bangor anchorage is stated to be preferable, and communication with the shore is easier. The Admiralty have no contracts for the delivery of the mails to the Fleet in Home Waters, which is conducted by the ordinary Packet Service of the country. As the Admiral is responsible for the safe conduct of the Fleet, it is not desirable to fetter his discretion in the selection of the place of anchorage for his Squadron, and it is not proposed to issue any orders to that effect. No part of Belfast Lough has been set apart for a man-of-war anchorage, as the Question implies.

WAR OFFICE—5TH BATTALION ROYAL FUSILIERS—MAJOR ROE.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, assuming that Major Roe is not able to do the duties in the 5th Battalion Royal Fusiliers which he has actually performed for three years, it is a fact that the remaining seven captains are so inefficient that none of them are fit for promotion, although the drill and discipline of the battalion has been reported to be in the highest state of efficiency up to the date of the honourable Charles Edgcumbe's resignation of the command in 1887; and, whether officers of the Militia are to understand that a certificate from a School of Instruction is not ipso facto official proof of military competency?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I do not think it is desirable that through the medium of Question and Answer a discussion should be carried on as to the relative merits of officers of the Army. I may, however, inform my hon. Friend that two of the captains referred to are not recommended for promotion; and that the remaining five have not yet passed the prescribed examination. The answer to the second part of the Question is given by paragraph 42, Militia Regulations, 1886, which lays down that—"It is extremely desirable that officers should attend a School of Instruction to learn their duty thoroughly; but the possession of a certificate from a School of Instruction will give no claim to promotion, irrespective of other qualifications which are necessary for superior rank."

PHARMACY BILL — ACCIDENTAL POISONING AT LEWISHAM.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) (for Sir HENRY ROSCOE) (Manchester, S.) asked the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the statement reported to have been made at an inquest held at Lewisham on June 20, that the son of a chemist and druggist had dispensed eight grains of strychnine in one dose of medicine instead of 1-24th part of a grain, is correct; whether the statements that the son of the chemist was often left in charge of his father's branch shop, and that he passed his examination when he was 15 years of age, are also correct; and, whether, in view of such an alarming accident, the Government will give facilities for the consideration of the Pharmacy Bill now before the House, which is intended to provide against such accidents by requiring all managers of branch shops to be qualified and registered?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statements recited in the Question. Speaking for the Government, I should be glad if the Bill to which the hon. Member refers could be proceeded with; but in the present state of Public Business, I cannot undertake to afford it any special facilities.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CORK BOARD OF GUARDIANS—CASE OF WILLIAM ROBINSON.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Resolution passed on the 7th instant by the Cork Board of Guardians with reference to the case of William Robinson; whether it is the fact that this man, aged 58, was removed from the Croydon Union to Cork, his place of birth, notwithstanding that he had gone to reside in England when three years old; whether the Guardians are correct in the complaint they make, that, while English Unions possess the power of deporting paupers who have not obtained a settlement to their place of birth, no corresponding power is possessed by Irish Unions; whether he is aware that the ratepayers of the Cork Union suffer in an especial manner from this state of things, owing to the fact that many strangers, stowaways, and others are landed from vessels touching at Queenstown; and, whether he proposes to amend the Law, so as to put English and Irish Unions on an equality in the matter in question?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The reply to the inquiries in the first three paragraphs is in the affirmative. Complaints have been made by the Board of Guardians of Cork Union to the effect indicated in the fourth paragraph. The consideration of legislation on the subject is, in the present state of Public Business, quite impracticable.

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked, did not the right hon. Gentleman think the matter deserved consideration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR admitted that it did deserve consideration; but he could make no promise of legislation on the subject.

INDIA—THE SIKKIM EXPEDITION— MILITARY OPERATIONS—DEATHS OF COLONEL BATTYE AND CAPTAIN URMSTON.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the following statement in The Globe of Saturday last is correct—namely:—

“Colonel Battye and Captain Urmston were attacked by Gujars and Akazais while out with 58 Goorkhas and 19 police for an exercise march on the Black Mountain. The troops were a portion of the force of 300 Goorkhas holding Oghi, the outpost which Colonel Battye commanded. They were within our border when fired on near the crest of the Black Mountain. Colonel Battye and Captain Urmston were shot while succouring a wounded Havildar. The bodies of the two officers were taken to Abbotabad, and buried there on Wednesday with military honours. The Punjab Government desired to punish the Akazais for their misconduct last spring by an Expedition, but the Government of India negatived the proposal. The tribe was placed under blockade, and the outpost at Oghi was strengthened to guard against surprise; 250 more men have now been sent down there, and a squadron of Guides. Cavalry will also probably be sent. Besides the two British officers, six Goorkha sepoy were killed, and one Havildar wounded;” and, especially, whether it is true that, while the Punjaub Government recommended a course which would have prevented the loss of two eminent officers, the Indian Government refused to allow that course to be adopted?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has received official information of the unhappy loss of two valuable and distinguished officers—Colonel Battye and Captain Urmston—under circumstances which have been described with substantial accuracy in the public Press. He has no official information of any proposal of the Punjab Government to direct an Expedition against the Akazais last spring. Such an Expedition might, no doubt, have cost many lives. In the last Expeditions against the Black Mountain Tribes, in 1868, there were 17 killed and 80 wounded. The Secretary of State has no reason to think that the troops attacked were outside the British Frontier.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS) — RICHMOND PARK—THE PROPOSED VOLUNTEER CAMP.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, before the Government arrive at any conclusion to grant the use of Richmond Park for a Volunteer Camp, an opportunity will be given for the inhabitants of the adjoining parishes of Putney and Roehampton, and other parishes in the borough of Wandsworth, containing 75,000 inhabitants, to consider any proposals which may be in contemplation, and to express their opinions thereon?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The proposals made by the National Rifle Association, with a view to obtaining a site for their annual shooting competition in Richmond Park, were conveyed to me on the 14th of June, but no final decision has yet been taken by the Government on the subject; and any consideration which may be urged within a reasonable time for or against those proposals, either by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Richmond or from any other quarter, will be carefully considered.

MR. KIMBER: What does the right hon. Gentleman consider a reasonable time?

MR. PLUNKET: I suppose about a fortnight or three weeks.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the Government had taken any steps to have a survey and inspection made of other sites suitable for the Volunteers in South-East Essex.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. and gallant Gentleman must see that it is quite impossible for me to answer a Question of this kind without Notice.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—REGISTRATION OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any Register of Retired Civil Servants fit for service, with a view to re-employment in other branches, has yet been established by the Government pursuant to expectations held out by him on July 26 last in this House; and, if so, where, and whether it is open for inspection; and, if not established, has the scheme yet been laid before, or received the assent of, the Treasury, as was then suggested would be necessary?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I found that the form of such a Register existed under the title of "Civil Pensioners under 50 years of age available for further service." No further scheme or assent of the Treasury was necessary, and I am giving directions to have the Register made up to date; but the Register would not be open to individual inspection. I shall have no objection, however, to a Return being moved for giving the full particulars.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—KILKENNY DISPENSARY DISTRICT.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the matter of the vacant Registrarship of Births and Deaths in the No. 1 (sub-divided) Dispensary District of the Poor Law Union of Kilkenny; whether, a vacancy in such Office having occurred in the month of November last, the Guardians, in pursuance of the directions of the Registrar General, proceeded to make an appointment therein within the statutable period of 14 days; that two candidates presented themselves, duly qualified; that one of them, Dr. Hackett, claimed a "preference," pursuant to the Statute (26 Vict. c. 11, s. 23); that the Guardians, having given consideration to this preference, nevertheless, in the lawful exercise of their discretion in the matter, made their selection, and appointed the other candidate, Mr. Carroll, as Registrar, and did then call upon, and have since repeatedly urged, the Registrar General to sanction such appointment; whether, upon the occasion of the previous vacancy in this Office, the same claim of preference having been made by the same medical officer, under precisely similar circumstances, the Registrar General sanctioned the appointment of one Mr. Lalor; and, whether, in view of the public interest, he will call upon the Registrar General to ratify this exercise of the lawful patronage of the Guardians of the Union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the Registrar General reported that the facts as stated in the Question were substantially accurate. The difference between the cases in question arose from the fact that legal proceedings were instituted in the latter case, and not in the former. The Registrar General had found it necessary to take legal advice in the matter, and the question was now before the Attorney General for Ireland.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—FAIR RENT APPLICATIONS, BALLYCASTLE UNION.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can now state how many fair rent applications from the Union of Ballycastle were heard by the Sub-Commission sitting in County Antrim in July last; whether he can mention how many of the applications then listed for hearing were adjourned; whether he is aware that a number of the applications entered from this Union in the year 1885 still remain undisposed of; and, whether it is the intention of the Land Commission, as was stated, to move to County Antrim in July next the Commission now sitting in County Down?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that 35 applications from Ballycastle Union to fix fair rents appeared in the Sub-Commission list for July, 1887. They were all disposed of at that sitting. No applications received in 1885 from that Union remain undisposed of. The oldest outstanding fair rent case was received in June, 1887. The Commissioners find it necessary, having regard to the claims of the County Fermanagh, to move the Sub-Commission sitting in the County of Down to the County Fermanagh for the month of July next.

MR. M'CARTAN asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was not a fact that about 3,000 or 4,000 applications by tenants to have fair rents fixed were still remaining unheard in the County Down, and also when a Sub-Commission would next sit there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was afraid he could not give the hon. Gentleman a more specific answer than he had already given as to the time a Sub-Commission would sit.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked, if the right hon. Gentleman would say whether all the Sub-Commissioners whose appointment had been approved of by the Treasury were actually working?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he could give no answer; but the hon. Gentleman knew that he had a plan at present before Parliament for dealing with the existing block in the Land Court.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.), speaking on behalf of the tenants in Fermanagh, asked, would the Government take any steps to deal with the great number of applications that still remained unheard in that county?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he proposed to take steps to deal with the arrears in the Land Courts by a plan which was embodied in a Bill now before the House.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: When is that Bill likely to come on?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a Question which I think should be addressed to the Leader of the House. As far as I am concerned, I am extremely anxious to push the Bill forward.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the Leader of the House, what steps the Government intend to take with regard to the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill; and if it is not the intention of the Government to take that Bill soon, will the Government take some temporary steps for relieving the block?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I do not know, Sir, whether I am quite in Order in answering the Question now; but if I am, I may say that it is the intention of the Government to make the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill one of the first measures after the Committee on the Local Government Bill. I trust the House will not think it necessary to prolong the discussion on the Bill, seeing that it would interfere with the progress of other important Business.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: May I ask the Chief Secretary, whether he is aware that the effect of postponing the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill until after the Local Government Bill will be that no effective steps can be taken to bring the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill, when it passes, into actual operation until the month of November next?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Sir, I do not know that that is the case; but I should remind the hon. Gentleman that the decisions of the Land Court are retrospective, and date from the time that the application is made.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is it not the fact that, in the meantime, tenants are obliged to pay the old rents?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of a single case in which a landlord whose tenants have gone into Court has tried to extract the old rent.

MR. M'CARTAN: I know of hundreds of cases.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should be very glad if the hon. Member would furnish me with any of them.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION—SITTINGS IN KEADY.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that no arrangement has yet been made to hold a sitting of a Sub-Commission in Keady, which it was promised would be held in June; whether about 200 applications to have fair rents fixed in the district of Keady remain unheard; whether he is aware that in a number of these cases eviction notices have been served by the landlords on the applicants; and, if he can state on what date a Sub-Commission will sit at Keady, and the names of the persons who will constitute the Sub-Commission?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that in March last they hoped to be in a position to have a Sub-Commission at Keady in June; but the cases in the County of Down were very important, and it was found more to the public advantage to continue the Sub-Commission in that county. There are about 190 applications to fix fair rents undisposed of from the Keady District. The Land Commissioners cannot yet state when the next Sub-Commission will sit at Keady, or the names of the persons who will constitute the Sub-Commission.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked, whether in view of the positive promise made in March last by the Chief Secretary that a Sub-Commission would sit at Keady in the month of June, he would take steps to see that a Court would immediately sit there, especially as numbers of unfortunate people were threatened with eviction?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was not in his power to determine when a Sub-Commission should sit, nor did he ever give a promise that one would sit at Keady in June. He said that the Commission intended to have a sitting at that place at that time.

IRISH LAND COMMISSIONERS—SUB-COMMISSIONERS FOR WESTMEATH.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now state the date on which the Sub-Commissioners will hold their next sitting for the County of Westmeath, and the names of the gentlemen who will constitute the Commission; and, whether, having regard to the large number of fair rent applications remaining undisposed of, an early date will be fixed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that a Sub-

Commission sat in the County Westmeath so recently as February and March last. Having regard to the claims of other counties, they are not at present in a position to state when the next sitting will be held.

MR. TUIE asked, had not the right hon. Gentleman given a promise that a Sub-Commission would sit in Westmeath at the end of June?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had given no promise.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPEALS LISTED AT BELFAST.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that of the 100 appeals listed for hearing by the Land Commission at Belfast on July 2 next, 75 are from the Union of Magherafelt, County Derry; whether he is aware that Magherafelt is a Quarter Sessions town, and has a commodious Court-house; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will advise a sitting at Magherafelt, and save the tenants and their witnesses from the long and expensive journey to Belfast?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that there are 37 cases only from the Magherafelt Union to be re-heard at Belfast at the approaching sitting, the other cases listed from that Union having been either settled or withdrawn. The cases from Magherafelt Union are listed for hearing at Belfast, as that town is of more easy access than Londonderry, the county town where, under other circumstances, the cases would naturally be heard. In arranging the places where appeals and re-hearings shall be heard, the Commissioners have endeavoured to meet, as far as possible, the convenience of suitors. They cannot undertake to alter their existing arrangements.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked, if there was any reason why these three gentlemen who constituted the Sub-Commission should not hold a sitting at Magherafelt, having regard to the fact that, on the one hand, only the three of them would have to journey to Magherafelt; while, on the other hand, the whole number of applicants in Magherafelt would have to travel to Belfast?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he could not answer without Notice Questions relating to the arrangements of the Land Commissioners.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST.

Mr. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, with reference to the assurance frauds at Belfast, Whether he can now state what steps have been taken to bring to justice the parties responsible for the issue of the policy on the life of Finlay M'Cance, esquire, J.P., which was obtained in favour of Mr. James Henderson, proprietor of The Belfast News Letter, by means of misrepresentation, and by the forgery of the name of Mr. M'Cance; whether he can state if the proposal on the life of Mr. M'Cance was admittedly signed by Mr. Henderson; whether this proposal contained several gross misrepresentations, which induced the issue of the policy by the Company; and whether the name of Mr. Henderson, who obtained the policy was sent forward to the Attorney General with the names of others now on their trial, charged, among other things, with having attempted to obtain policies which were not issued; and, whether the Government intend to take any further proceedings in this matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): As I have already stated to the hon. Member in reply to previous Questions, I must refuse to answer any Questions relating to the particular facts of this case to which he has referred, pending the proceedings which are now going on.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) begged to give Notice that at the earliest opportunity he should call attention to the fact that the Government instituted proceedings against certain persons charged with making fraudulent applications for insurance policies, while they had refrained from instituting a criminal prosecution against the proprietor of The Belfast News Letter, who was charged with having actually obtained a fraudulent policy, and would move—

"That, in the interests of public justice, it was not desirable that the Government should refrain from proceeding with a public investigation into a criminal charge when the person charged was the publisher of a newspaper in their interest."

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (IRELAND) — DISQUALIFICATION OF VOTERS BY MEDICAL RELIEF.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If voters who receive medical relief on a doctor's order through a relieving officer are disfranchised?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I can hardly undertake to give an abstract opinion of law; but if the hon. Member will mention any particular case, I shall inquire into it.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (IRELAND)—SOUTH-WEST DIVISION OF DUBLIN—REVISION COURTS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that it is the desire of the residents of south-west Dublin to have Revision Courts established at each polling place in the Division; and, if he will use his influence to give effect to their wishes?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): None of the persons concerned appear to have made any representations to the Irish Government on the subject; nor, so far as I can ascertain, is there any necessity for such additional Courts.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — CONSTABLE CURRY.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, To state the reason why the honourable Recorder of Dublin, in the action of "Smyth v. Madden and Curry," heard at the Quarter Sessions, Kingstown, on April 15, 1887, gave Constable Curry a "special certificate," "exonerating" him from "from all blame;" why, and when, did the Recorder direct the amount of the verdict obtained for the plaintiff to be paid to the jury; and, did the Superintendent of Curry's Division, who was present during the trial, make a Report to the Commissioner of Police, as to the nature of the evidence; if so, was it sent forward, with the certificate given by the Recorder, to the Attorney General, who sanctioned the payment of the verdict and costs out of the public funds?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he was unable to state what the Judge's reasons were in the matter, nor had he the right or the desire to inquire into them. The Superintendent's Report was submitted to the Attorney General.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE ACT, 1888—REMISSION OF PENALTIES.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he would be prepared to instruct the Board of Inland Revenue to remit the penalties payable on stamping instruments executed prior to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1888, which are presented to them for the purpose at any time before the 1st of January next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The question has been fully considered; and the penalties payable on stamping instruments executed prior to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1888 will be remitted, subject to certain conditions, which will be laid down in a Memorandum which will be issued to solicitors and others by the Board of Inland Revenue.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICITION OF HUGH BOGUE—ALLEGED HARSHNESS.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will order an inquiry to be held into the conduct of the Sub-Sheriff in evicting Hugh Bogue when he was in a dying condition; whether the attention of the Government has been called to the statement of Father M'Kenna, P.P., of Clogher, that he publicly protested at the eviction that the man was absolutely dying when carried out; and, whether, in view of these facts, the Government intend to take any steps to prevent the forces of Her Majesty being used to evict under such circumstances?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The

Sir Thomas Esmonde

District Inspector who was in charge of the Constabulary reports that the facts are as stated. Father M'Kenna arrived after the formalities of the eviction had been completed, and Bogue was being placed in a cart. He appears to have said that it was a hard case, and that a medical certificate ought to have been procured; but this was after the eviction was over. The tenant had paid no rent for five years; in fact, from the period that his fair rent was originally determined.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give Notice that on the Constabulary Vote I will call attention to the indefensible use of the Constabulary in Ireland for the purpose of evicting people.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether a Sheriff in Ireland had power by law to postpone an eviction when it appears that the lives of the persons to be evicted are in danger; and, whether the police in such a case have instructions to refrain from carrying out such evictions?

[No reply.]

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to ask—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will explain the nature of the recent troubles in Zululand; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will refrain from any action in South Africa likely to lead to a war with any of the Native Tribes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The recent troubles have been caused by Dinizulu, the son of Cetewayo, who has, without justification, attacked other Chiefs in Zululand and Government police stations. Her Majesty's Government have at no time relaxed their efforts to carry out the policy best calculated to prevent the recurrence of war with Native Tribes, and have no reason to think that that policy has failed.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under

Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give the House any further information as to the state of affairs in Zululand?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The following telegram was received on Tuesday from the Governor of Natal, in reply to an inquiry from the Secretary of State:—

"Your telegram of yesterday. Usibepu and followers were attacked and defeated by Usututu near Ivuna, 23rd June. It has consequently been found advisable to withdraw police office at Ivuna, which was attacked at the same time. Usibepu took refuge with police. No casualties among police. Force sent from Nkon-jeni safely returned yesterday; brought back all from Ivuna, including Usibepu and families, women, and wounded of his tribe. Have just conferred with Lieutenant General, Cape of Good Hope, as to sufficient number for force. He reserves opinion until arrival in Zululand, whither he proceeds to-morrow."

It will be seen from this telegram that Lieutenant General Smyth has proceeded to Zululand, and will be able to judge of the position, and whether any additional forces will be required; but a day or two may probably elapse before any further communication is received.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked, whether it was not the case that Dinizulu was merely re-capturing cattle that had been stolen from him by Usibepu; and whether the land had not been in the possession of Dinizulu for several years; and, whether Usibepu, since he was sent there, had begun cattle raiding, as he had done before? He further wished to ask, whether other native allies were being used in this manner; and whether the Government would take care that this did not happen again?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question was to ask the Under Secretary whether he had any information. The Questions must be given Notice of in the usual way.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked, whether the Government had given General Smyth, who would proceed in a short time to Zululand, any particular instructions with regard to the disposition of the force there?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I do not think that it would be in the interest of the Public Service that I should give information to the House.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give Notice that on the Estimates I will call attention to the action of the Government, which is certainly leading up to another war in Zululand.

DR. CLARK rose to put another Question.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DR. CLARK: I want to—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—REFUSAL OF REFRESHMENT TO TRAVELLERS—CASE OF MR. NOUD, OF ROSCOMMON.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on Saturday the 24th instant, Mr. Michael Noud, T.C., of Roscommon, having driven from there to Boyle, a distance of 20 miles, upon important business, on arriving there at 1.30 p.m. and calling at the only hotel in the town, Monson's Hotel, was refused admission or refreshment for himself or his horse by order of the police, who told the hotel owner to "admit no outsiders;" whether Mr. Noud again applied at 4.30 p.m., and was again refused for the same reason, and was obliged to drive to Elphin, a distance of nine miles, before he could get anything to eat or drink; whether Noud's son and two others who were in his company were treated in the same way, although they, as well as Mr. Noud, claimed and were entitled to be served as bona fide travellers, and were ready and willing to pay for what they required; and, if the facts stated are found correct, what steps the Government propose to take in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The local Constabulary authorities report that on Sunday (not Saturday), the 24th, in view of apprehended disturbances, the magistrates ordered that all sellers of retail drink should close their houses. In accordance with this order—not by order of the police—Mr. Noud and his party were refused admission to Monson's Hotel, which was included in the order.

WAR OFFICE—THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CARRIAGE DEPARTMENT—WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Superintendent of the Carriage Department, Royal Arsenal, employs several of the employés of the Department as members of the crew of his private pleasure yacht; whether he can give the names and character of the employment respectively of the several persons so employed, and the several periods at which all or any of such employés were absent from their duties at the Arsenal, and, if by leave, then by whom such leave was granted; and, whether the pay and allowances of such persons continue during their respective absences?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): I am informed that there are no men belonging to the Royal Carriage Department employed on the yacht referred to; nor have any men been so employed while belonging to the Department.

BOARD OF CUSTOMS—THE SECRETARY AND SURVEYOR GENERAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is at present any Secretary to the Board of Customs, since the abolition by the Treasury of the post last year to secure a saving of £1,400; whether there are more than two Surveyors General; whether one of them is now acting as Secretary; why the Estimates provide for a resuscitation of the post of Secretary, and also for three Surveyors General; and, what has become of the reduction effected last year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover-square): The post of Secretary to the Board of Customs never was abolished, only suspended; so there is no question of its resuscitation. There are at present only two Surveyors General, one of whom is also acting temporarily as Secretary, and there is also a Surveyor acting temporarily as Surveyor General; the third Surveyor Generalship is thus also in abeyance. The Estimates provide for a Secretary at a salary of £1,200, and for three Surveyors Generals, the same as last year. The ultimate staff is dependent upon the question of amalgamation; but, in any case, there will have to be a Secretary for Customs business. In the meantime, it is necessary to make provision for the normal strength of the Office, until some decision is come to as to the practicability of amalgamation. But, of course, the money will not be spent unless the places are filled up.

WAR OFFICE—ARMY CONTRACTS—SUPPLY OF ACCOUTREMENTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that helmets, knapsacks, gaiters, pouches, and other accoutrements, have been for about 18 months, and still continue to be, manufactured for the British Army in a foreign prison by a large contractor still on the Government list of selected firms at prices much below even those paid to sweaters; whether the condemned mule traces at Woolwich are now being fitted with new iron squares; and, if so, whether it is intended to issue them to the troops in the event of war; whether saddles are now being padded with what is described by an eye-witness as filthy, rotten hair out of condemned hospital beds; and, whether he has consulted the Law Officers of the Crown as to the possibility of proceeding against contractors who supply, and officials who admit, bad stores under the existing law?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): In answer to the first Question, the War Office has no reason for suspecting the existence of any such practice as that referred to. If the hon. Member will give me privately the name of the contractor he refers to, further inquiry shall be made. In answer to the second Question, no condemned mule traces are being fitted with iron squares, or are to be issued to the troops. In answer to the third Question, no saddles are being padded with filthy, rotten hair out of condemned hospital beds. I should like to add that the hon. Member, by holding personal communication with disaffected workmen at Woolwich, is doing his best to make the maintenance of discipline impossible.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is exceeding the usual limits of an answer to a Question.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I at once bow to your ruling, Sir. I withdraw at once this statement, which I recognize I should not have made. I wish to add, however, that the duty of any man there, if he thinks he sees anything going on which is detrimental to the Public Service, is to report it to Colonel Barrington. In answer to the last Question, there can, I think, be little doubt as to the existing law; but I am taking further advice upon the subject.

MR. HANBURY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he knows that I have communicated with anybody whatever except the man Dunn, who disclosed the whole of this scandal?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not able to express any opinion about that; but as the hon. Member refers to an eye-witness as to what took place recently, I have no doubt the information has been communicated to him.

MR. HANBURY: Is the right hon. Gentleman justified in describing Dunn and Moody as disaffected workmen?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not done so in any way.

MR. HANBURY: But the right hon. Gentleman distinctly said that I had been in communication with disaffected workmen.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Owing to your ruling, Sir, I am not able to deal with that particular part of my answer.

MR. HANBURY: I shall refer to this matter when the Vote for the Director of Contracts comes on.

SUGAR MANUFACTURE—NEW ZEALAND.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Colony of New Zealand has passed an Act or Acts granting special fiscal advantages or bounties on the manufacture and export of sugar; whether the repeal of these Acts forms part of the policy of abolishing sugar bounties contemplated in the recent negotiations; and, whether there are any other British Colonies which give bounties on the manufacture or export of sugar?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): There is an Act in New Zealand to encourage the cultivation of beetroot and sorghum for the purpose of making sugar. It was passed in 1884. It is practically inoperative; and the Colonial Government have undertaken to enter into the Sugar Bounty Convention. According to the latest information in the Department, there is no other Colony which gives any bounty on the manufacture or exportation of sugar.

PREVENTION OF CRIME ACT, 1882—MR. PETER SWEENY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Local Government Board and the Irish Registrar General took any, and, if so, what steps, to ascertain whether Mr. Peter Sweeny was arrested at any time under "The Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act, 1882," before refusing to sanction his appointment by the Loughrea Board of Guardians to the offices of Sanitary Officer and District Registrar, on the grounds that Mr. Sweeny was arrested on a charge of suspicion of murder in the years 1880, 1881, or 1882; whether there is any truth whatever in the statement that Mr. Peter Sweeny was ever under arrest on such a charge; whether he is aware that Mr. Sweeny has undertaken, by contract, to sink two wells in the Craughwell Division, and has had to suspend work, after having gone a considerable depth, because of the refusal to grant him a licence for dynamite and blasting powder necessary for the work; whether, for the same cause, he is unable to proceed with the building of two schools in the parish of Kiltulla; and, if he can state the grounds for the persecution to which Mr. Peter Sweeny is subjected?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board, in the course of their inquiries, ascertained that Sweeny had been in prison for three weeks in Galway Prison under the Peace Preservation Act; and, further, that his antecedents were such as to render him an unfit person for service under the Poor Law Acts. It is the case that he was arrested on the 4th of July, 1882, under the Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881, on suspicion of being accessory to murder, and his two brothers were likewise arrested on the same suspicion. The Guardians did not make an appointment within the statutory period to the vacant office of Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, which thereupon vested in the Lord Lieutenant, who appointed the interim Registrar, who had discharged satisfactorily the duties of assistant and deputy for some time. I am not aware of what contracts the man may have undertaken. The responsible authorities, however, cannot consent to his holding a licence for dynamite and powder.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES—FINANCIAL CONDITION.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the documents containing particulars of the financial condition of the University and other Colleges in England have now been received; and, whether, if so, he can state when the Education Department will be able to report to the Treasury thereon?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The information asked for has, I believe, been made complete within the last few hours, and the Department will lose no time in making their Report to the Treasury.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1887, SEC. 29—ADJUSTMENT OF RENTS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, with reference to the equitable provisions of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887," he is aware that in holdings where the gale day is the 1st November, and where there is only one gale day in the year, the tenant to whom the section applies was, under the 29th section, entitled to adjustment of the rent for the year ending November 1, 1887; whether it was intended that he should also be entitled to adjustment of the rent for the years ending November 1, 1888, and November 1, 1889; whether he is aware that, with regard to the second year's adjustment in such cases, the section provides that it shall be for the year commencing from November 1 (the first gale day) in 1888, and no provision is made for adjustment of the rent for the year ending on November 1, 1888; and, whether, considering this serious defect in the section, he will advise the Government to take steps to have it remedied?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I will give the matter my very best consideration, having regard particularly to the fourth paragraph of the Question.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—DISTURBANCE AT DUNDALK RAILWAY STATION.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that on Wednesday last, when the people were quietly and peaceably moving from the Dundalk Railway Station, where they had met the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and his friends, Mr. Cullen, Divisional Magistrate, ordered the dragoons and constabulary to stop the procession, and thereby caused considerable confusion and disorder, during which several persons were thrown down and injured; and, whether Mr. Cullen had received instructions from Dublin Castle to act in this way?

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.) also asked, whether it was not admitted on all hands that the people of Dundalk and Louth were exceedingly peaceable and law-abiding people; that the crowd on this occasion were perfectly orderly, and largely composed of women and children; that being so, what was the object of an armed demonstration on the day against respectable men, women, and children; and he would also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was not also true that a large number of people were injured in Dundalk on that occasion by police and military?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I do not know the circumstances referred to well enough to express an abstract opinion on the peaceableness of the Dundalk people. Mr. Cullen reports that he did not act in the manner described, and he had no instructions from Dublin Castle to do so. He is not aware that any persons were injured.

MR. M'CARTAN: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will hold an inquiry? I assure him that I heard Mr. Cullen using the words.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. NOLAN: Since the information supplied to the right hon. Gentleman differs entirely from that which was given in the Press, and stated by hon. Members of this House and other eyewitnesses, will he make a full and open inquiry into the matter?

[No reply.]

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Subsequently,

MR. NOLAN said, he hoped he would be excused for again asking the Chief Secretary what he was going to do with regard to what happened on the occasion of Mr. Dillon's trial? He had it on the best authority that a number of his constituents were ridden over by the dragoons and struck down by the police with their batons. Was the right hon. Gentleman going to let the matter fall to the ground because the incriminated person said these things did not happen? Would he grant an inquiry? He would also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, was it a fact that the chief officer who had charge of the police on that occasion was the same who was gravely censured by the late Under Secretary for compounding a charge which was made against him of perjury and assault?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the slightest idea of what the hon. Member refers to in the latter part of his Question. As to the former part, I may remind him that the incidents occurred on the occasion of a very large gathering of people, at a time when a gentleman was being tried on appeal. On such an occasion it is absolutely necessary to take precautions, and it is almost absolutely necessary to disperse the crowd. Of course, that ought to be done, if possible, without injury to anyone. I am not aware, nor are the police aware, that any people were injured on this occasion; and if the hon. Gentleman is aware of it, I am very sorry.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): Is it not the function of a public highway to allow people to proceed quietly and unmolested?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is now arguing a point, not asking a Question.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was not lawful for Mr. Dillon and his friends to proceed from the railway to the Court House without molestation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That does not make it right to have a large concourse of people accompanying him in triumphal procession.

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it not the fact that the large concourse of people were in town because it was a fair-day, and because they had business to transact?

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there was any threatened disturbance to justify the attack on the people?

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if in the necessary precautions for taking a prisoner for trial in Ireland is included the breaking of people's heads?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

PRISONS (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John Dillon, while exempt from all forms of prison labour, has access to books and writing materials in the infirmary of Dundalk Prison?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he could not answer the Question without further Notice; but he could tell the hon. Gentleman that the ordinary Prison Rules were applied in the case of Mr. Dillon the same as in that of any other prisoner.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked, if the right hon. Gentleman would consider, in this case, whether a condition of laborious idleness was not more exasperating and injurious than hard labour itself.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): As Mr. Dillon has been placed in the infirmary in consequence of the condition of his health, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the medical officer of the prison has the power of ordering him the means of reading and writing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it is in the power of the medical officer of the prison to take any steps for the preservation of the health of any prisoner in his charge.

LAW AND JUSTICE—COURTS OF SUMMARY JURISDICTION—PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL.

MR. FIELDEN (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the recommendations of the Committee appointed by him to inquire into the accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial at the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, he proposes to take any, and, if so, what, action to remedy the present defective arrangements?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am now in communication with the Office of Works and the other authorities in whom the control of the Police Courts of the Metropolis is vested, and have earnestly invited their co-operation in carrying out such alterations as will be necessary to secure an improved accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial. I have also communicated with the authorities responsible for the accommodation at all Stipendiary Courts; and I have, in several instances, received from them satisfactory assurances that substantial improvements will be effected. I have now under my consideration the best course to pursue with the view of securing satisfactory accommodation at the Petty Sessional Courts throughout the country. That is a much larger question, owing to the number of such Courts.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE MIDLAND SUMMER ASSIZES—AYLESBURY AND LEICESTER.

MR. COBB (Warwickshire, S.E., Rugby) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether under the arrangements for the Summer Assizes on the Midland Circuit a week is given at Aylesbury, where there is little business, and two days are given at Leicester, where there is much business; whether these arrangements have been made after communicating with the leading counsel on the Circuit; and, whether he will endeavour to induce Her Majesty's Judges to give more time for the business at Leicester?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that at Aylesbury (where the Assizes have already been held) there was one clear day—namely, Monday, the 25th—besides the Commission Day. At Leicester the Commission Day is on July 10, and the next Commission Day (at Oakham) is on the 13th, giving two clear days. The arrangements are made by the Judge going the Circuit, after ascertaining the probable amount of business, in such manner as he thinks fit. It is part of the Circuit system that no case shall be left untried; and if the time allowed for Leicester proves to be insufficient the Commission Day at the next place will be deferred.

POST OFFICE—LETTERS OF IRISH MEMBERS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Postmaster General, By whose authority are the letters of Irish Members of Parliament opened in the post; and, if he will take steps to put an end to the practice?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): To the Question of the hon. Baronet the answer is simple—that it is not in my power to put an end to a practice which does not exist.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: If a case is put into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman in which letters to an Irish Member from his constituents were opened, will he order an inquiry to be made into the matter? I also wish to ask him, is it not a fact that there is in the post office at Cork an individual especially employed for the "Grahamising" of letters from America?

MR. RAIKES: Certainly. I will have an inquiry made into any case that may be brought before me.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that the practice does exist.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND — A SUPPLEMENTAL CHARTER.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is correct that Her Majesty's Privy Council has advised Her Majesty to grant a "Supplemental Charter" to the Royal College of Surgeons of England; and, whether the said Charter recognizes, and, if so, to what extent, the claims of the members of the College to take part in the election of, and to representation on the Council of the said College, as embodied, with other requests, in a Petition signed by 4,665 members, and presented to the Privy Council in May, 1887; if not, whether Her Majesty's Ministers will be prepared, at the urgent request of the members, to recommend Her Majesty to delay the granting of the said Supplemental Charter until such time as a Report from a Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the constitution of the College and the position of its members shall have been received, or until some further investigation shall have been made into the several matters contained in a Petition of the Members to the Privy Council?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Lords of the Council have agreed to advise Her Majesty to grant a Supplemental Charter to the Royal College of Surgeons of England. The Charter does not in any way deal with the question of election. The Government do not consider it necessary to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the constitution of the College, or the postponement of the grant of a Charter, which does not affect any of the questions which have been matters of controversy.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL gave Notice that, in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he would move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty not to grant a Supplemental Charter until such time as a full inquiry had been made into the constitution of the College.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS—DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL SECRETS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What are the Regulations of the Treasury as to the disclosure by officials of public scandals of which they have knowledge; whether such knowledge constitutes an official secret; and, whether an official, who is aware of such scandals, and has unsuccessfully brought them to the notice of his official superiors, renders himself liable to punishment for disclosing, in good faith, the fact that the public, his masters, are thereby being injured?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): There are no general instructions to officials as to the disclosure of public scandals of which they may have knowledge, although there are instructions relative to the divulgence of official documents. It would be the duty of a public servant to report an official scandal to his chiefs. Any official who is aware of such scandals, and has unsuccessfully brought them to the notice of his official superiors and to the notice of the Government, would, undoubtedly, be protected for disclosing, in good faith, the fact that the public, his masters, are being injured. But such public servant is under the same responsibility as other subjects; and the fact of his being a public servant would not protect him if he should make false charges, or should publish libels on character.

PERPETUAL PENSIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps, if any, he has yet taken to give effect to the Resolution of this House for the abolition of perpetual pensions; and, whether, in accordance with the remainder of that Resolution, the Government are now prepared to make any statement to the House on the subject of pensions generally?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): A Treasury Minute on the subject of perpetual pensions has been prepared, and will shortly be laid on the Table. The question of pensions generally is, I understand, being dealt with by the Commission on Civil Service Establishments, and I have every reason to believe that they will report very shortly.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS—LITERARY PENSIONERS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will take into consideration the advisability of requiring from all future recipients of literary pensions an assurance, similar to that obtained by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) from certain political pensioners, that in case they should receive a considerable addition to their incomes they will cease thereafter to draw their pensions?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked, whether, in the event of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman being in the affirmative with regard to these small allowances, it would be possible to carry out the same arrangement in the case of statutory allowances to ex-Cabinet Ministers?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the answer will cover that ground also. The Act (1 Vict. c. 2), under which Civil List pensions are granted, gives no power to the Government to demand from recipients the assurance suggested by the hon. Member. These pensions, which are not largely literary, are, for the most part, granted to those who, in addition to other claims on the nation, are in urgent need of such assistance; and in the Annual Return made to this House of pensions granted during the year a statement to that effect is made. The pensions being given on these grounds, I think the question of their surrender on accession of wealth may be left, as in the case of the political pensions alluded to, to the honour of the recipients.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON EDUCATION—THE REPORT — PREMATURE DISCLOSURE.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which he had given private Notice, Whether his attention has been called to the publication in that day's Times of the Majority Report of the Royal Commission on Education; whether last week a confidential document, together with some conclusions of the Commissioners, did not appear in the same journal; whether the Report of the Commission, or any part of it, had yet been received at the Home Office to be submitted to Her Majesty; and, if not, whether he could in any way account for this scandalous irregularity? He (Mr. Mundella) found that a Manchester paper had also published what purported to be a complete version of the 143 paragraphs of the Majority Report, as well as an indication of the Report of the minority.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I was aware that the Majority Report was published in this morning's paper. It has not yet reached the Home Office; and I am at a loss to understand how any gentleman who has access to a document which is confidential and has not been laid before Her Majesty can possibly have communicated it to the Press.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Has it escaped the observation of the right hon. Gentleman that the Report only appeared in The Times?

MR. MUNDELLA: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to follow up this scandalous case of breach of confidence?

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I wish to ask, whether the Government are prepared to take any measures to prevent and punish such scandalous breaches of public confidence?

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) asked, whether the observation of the right hon. Gentleman covered the confidential Memorandum referred to in the Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield?

MR. MATTHEWS: I had not noticed the publication of the Memorandum. With regard to the other matter, I will certainly inquire how it is that this document has been published. There is a Bill on the Table that may possibly reach such a case; but, except in that manner, I know of no other way of punishing it.

MR. PICTON asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman had noticed that the document had not appeared in any other London paper except The Times?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not seen all the London papers; but I will take it from the hon. Member that it is so.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—JUDGMENT IN THE KILLEAGH CASE—SHORTHAND WRITER'S NOTES.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he would grant, as an unopposed Return, a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Judgment delivered in the Killeagh conspiracy case on the 20th of June?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I think that there were no official shorthand notes taken; but, even apart from that, it would be extremely inconvenient to present them.

MR. SEXTON: Then will the Chief Secretary lay on the Table a copy of the document—whatever it was—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted in the course of the recent debate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not quote from any official documents. The rule is to lay upon the Table official documents from which extracts are quoted. This was not an official document.

MR. SEXTON: What was the manuscript from which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General for Ireland quoted the language of the Lord Chief Baron and other Judges?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I must ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be kind enough to answer the Question; because the practice—which is new—has become so habitual on the Ministerial Bench of quoting documents night after night which they do not produce. ["Order!"] I will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the documents from which he quoted?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to repeat the Question on another occasion.

MR. SEXTON: I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a shorthand note of the Judges' Charges taken by a person paid by public money?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it was not. But if the hon. Member will put a Question again I will answer him categorically; but I believe it was not.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked, When the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill would be further proceeded with?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It cannot possibly be taken until after the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill.

In reply to Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, that some Votes on the Civil Service Estimates would probably be taken on Monday. He would, however, make a statement to-morrow as to the order of Business.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Will there be a Morning Sitting to-morrow.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 22nd June.]

[TENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Powers of County Council.

Clause 8 (Transfer to county council of powers of certain Government departments and other authorities).

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 27, to leave out "such Order in Council," and insert "Provisional Order under this section."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 27, to leave out the words "such Order in Council," and insert the words "Provisional Order under this section."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question, "That the words 'such Order in Council' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'Provisional Order under this section' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne), in moving, in page 6, line 30, to insert—

"Provided that, in the constitution of any such joint committee, the number of county aldermen appointed to serve thereon shall in no case be more in proportion to the number of councillors so appointed than the number of aldermen in the whole council bears to the councillors,"

said, he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) was disposed to accept this Amendment?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No, Sir.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that, under those circumstances, it would be necessary to explain the reasons which induced him to propose this Amendment. He maintained that it was a reasonable and proper Amendment, seeing that it simply provided that, in the constitution of the joint committee, the number of County Aldermen appointed to serve should in no case be more in proportion to the number of Councillors than the number of Aldermen in the whole Council bore to the Councillors. It had already been decided that the nominated Aldermen should be one-fourth of the County Council; and, that being so, he thought it would be undesirable, when a committee was formed to represent two County Councils, that there should be upon that committee as members more than one-fourth who were Aldermen. He took it that the duties of the joint committee would be very important, as the clause now stood, since the passing of the Amendment which had been moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). There might also be at any time a transfer to the Council of very important functions now exercised under different Acts of Parliament, and it seemed to him that the more these matters of business affected two different counties the more important they were likely to be. It was, therefore, highly desirable that nothing further should be done than had already been done by the Reactionary Party connected with the passage of this Bill to deprive the elected representatives in the County Council of their just right of control in this matter of public business. Their rights had already been much curtailed and limited, and it was possible, unless some such provision were adopted as was suggested in this Amendment, that a joint committee of two County Councils might be composed of the unrepresented section of such Councils—that was to say, that the elected representative might be altogether excluded. In order to avoid such a case as that, he thought they ought to provide that the proportion laid down in the Act as being the proportion to be observed in the constitution of the Council itself between the Aldermen and the elected representatives should be observed on the joint committees it was proposed to constitute. He had no wish to waste the time of the Committee by making unnecessary remarks; but he confidently asked for the support of the Committee upon this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 30, to add the words—"Provided that, in the constitution of any such joint committee, the number of county aldermen appointed to serve thereon shall in no case be more in proportion to the number of councillors so appointed than the number of aldermen in the whole council bears to the councillors."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. RITCHIE said, that, of course, the Government could not accept the proposal of the hon. Member, which really placed a limitation upon the power of the County Councils which did not exist in any of the Town Councils elected under the Municipal Corporations Act. The hon. Member was probably aware that the Town Councils, as a whole, elected their committees. It was, therefore, desirable that the County Councils should also be left to choose their committees as they thought best; and, as three-fourths of the County Councils would be elected representatives, the hon. Member might have every confidence that they would be thoroughly well able to wield their just weight and influence.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he wished to point out, as the right hon. Gentleman had compared this case with the appointment of committees by the Town Councils, that in this instance powers were absolutely delegated to the joint committees of the County Councils, who would, therefore, have far more authority than committees elected by the Town Councils. In the case of committees appointed by Municipal Corporations, they were not responsible for the exercise of the powers they enjoyed; but those who were responsible were the Town Councils which appointed them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) said, his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) must have forgotten his experience of Municipal Councils. In the case of Watch Committees, when they were once appointed they had independent power.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had stated reasons why he could not accept the Amendment. One was, that he did not wish to make an invidious distinction between County Aldermen and elected Councillors. He (Mr. Conybeare) had no desire to establish a distinction, but a distinction had already been established by the right hon. Gentleman himself. Hon. Members on that side of the House had contended all along for the principle of popular control by the popularly elected representatives of the people; but the Government, while pretending to grant that principle, had persistently withheld it, and had taken care to make their Bill a sham and a farce by the institution of County Councillors. Having done so, he thought they were bound not to raise invidious distinctions between the County Aldermen and the elected representatives. It was only right they should see that in all respects the proper limitations and the proper proportions, as laid down in the Bill, should be maintained wherever committees were constituted, and wherever it was possible that too great a proportion of the nominated members might be appointed at the expense of the elected representatives. He had not such great confidence in the class from which the nominated Aldermen were likely to be taken as to believe that in all cases the elected representatives would be properly considered, and for that reason he had ventured to place the Amendment on the Paper. The other argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that there was no provision of this kind in the Municipal Corporations Act. He would venture to remind the right hon. Gentleman that there was nothing in the Municipal Corporations Act in regard to the constitution of joint committees such as were proposed to be constituted here. If the right hon. Gentleman could show him a case where, under the Municipal Corporations Act, it was proposed that two boroughs should appoint a committee for the purpose of joint control, there would be something in his argument; but he was raising a false issue based on an entire fallacy. Therefore, there was no force in his argument; and he hoped that the Committee would not think he was needlessly obstructive if he asked for a Division to be taken upon the Amendment. He did not wish unnecessarily to waste the time of the House, but he really thought it a point that was worthy the attention of the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he hoped that his hon. Friend, having placed his argument before the House, would not take a Division upon the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished to say one or two words upon this clause before it was passed. He had no desire to go back to any of the matters that were discussed under the clause; but it must be remembered that this was the only Decentralization Clause of the Bill. In regard to the powers hitherto given, they were not strictly decentralization powers, because the magistrates were a Local Authority, and it was simply transferring power from one Local Authority to another. But this clause was intended to be decentralizing, because it gave powers that were now exercised by the Executive Government to the County Councils. He regretted that in the clause they were about to pass so very little was done in the nature of decentralization. As a matter of fact, nothing was done actually, but whatever was to be done hereafter was to be a matter for future legislation. As the matter was to be considered in future, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman, when he came to frame his Provisional Order, to endeavour to amplify the powers conferred by it. He would speak of an Office with which he was familiar—namely, the Home Office. He believed that there were powers now vested in the Home Office far more important than those which had been placed in the Schedule, and which might with great advantage be transferred to the County Councils. He had always felt, and the present Home Secretary must feel, that the Home Office had no proper staff to deal with such questions as the inspection of mines and the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Acts. Those duties were thrown upon the Home Office without providing the Office with any means of dealing with them. The consequence was that the staff was most imperfect, and the duties were not satisfactorily performed. He could not conceive questions more appropriate for the Local Authorities to deal with than mines, the circumstances and character of which varied in every locality. For instance, the mines in South Wales differed from those in Durham, those in Durham from those in the central counties, and those in the central counties differed again from those in Lancashire. He was deeply convinced of the utter inability of the Central Authority to deal properly with these questions; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman, when he came to frame his Provisional Order, would consider the propriety of transferring these powers to the Councils, so that they might be under the supervision and control of persons fully acquainted with, and chiefly interested in, the subject.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said he wished, before the clause passed, to call attention to the operation of the clause upon the Burial Laws. The whole condition of the Burial Laws was very unsatisfactory, and even discreditable. The intention of the clause, as it was originally drawn in the Bill, was to confer upon the County Councils all the powers now exercised by the Home Office under the old Burial Acts, and also the powers exercised by the Local Government Board under the Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879. That, at least, was the view of the President of the Local Government Board, as expressed in an answer given to him (Mr. Morgan) 10 days ago. To that he had no objection; but, as a matter of fact, he found that the clause would have no such operation, for several Acts by which important duties which were now imposed upon the Home Secretary were not mentioned in the Schedule; and, moreover, several sections, both of the Burial Acts and the Act of 1879, which ought to have been included in the Schedule, were omitted therefrom. What he wished to point out was that, unless more care was taken in framing the Provisional Order Bill, they would find themselves landed in further difficulties; confusion would become more confounded, and instead of having, as at present, to deal with two Bodies, it would be necessary to deal with three.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that every care would be taken to provide adequately in the Provisional Order Bill for the administration of the Burial Law. He promised that the matter should be carefully considered before the Provisional Order Bill was drawn up. In reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), of course, like the right hon. Gentleman, he had no wish to enter into any previous discussion as to the proposals which were made originally and the proposal which was submitted now. At the proper time it would be open for the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether or not some further powers which now existed might not be transferred. The right hon. Gentleman had referred specially to the inspection of mines. As the clause was originally framed, the Government were anxious to decentralize as far as possible. They not only provided at once for the transfer of many powers to the County Councils, but in the clause they took powers of an extensive character to make further transactions of business by an Order in Council. That had arisen from a desire to provide work for the County Councils when they were set up, and also to deal as lightly as possible with the whole matter in a decentralizing spirit. Although they had adopted now another proposal which had been pressed upon them from more than one quarter of the House, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman it would be their duty, and their willing duty, to consider the suggestions or observations he desired to make in reference to the matter. He hoped, when the Provisional Order Bill was laid on the Table of the House, that the right hon. Gentleman would feel satisfied that the Government were as anxious as ever to bring about a satisfactory and effective decentralization.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, that the clause, which was to be passed in its present emasculated condition in deference to the desire of that House to have further legislation next Session, was worth little or nothing. All that it did was to give a promise on the part of the Government to bring in a Bill in another Session. The only distinction between it and an ordinary Public Bill was that it was to be brought in in the shape of a Provisional Order Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was much too sanguine if he expected that his Provisional Order Bill would be at all like ordinary Provisional Order Bills, and would be passed without difficulty. Ordinary Provisional Order Bills were dealt with under certain circumstances; but this would effect so great a change that it was impossible to suppose that it could be introduced and disposed of in that House in the course of a few hours. He trusted that it would be a liberal Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 (Powers as to closing public-houses on special days).

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he desired to make an appeal to hon. Members who had given Notice of Amendments to this clause. As the Committee were aware, it was within the right of hon. Gentlemen who had Amendments on the Paper to move those Amendments before they came to consider the question whether the clause should stand part of the Bill. Looking, however, to the fact that the Government proposed to omit the clause, he would press upon them not to propose their Amendments. In the event of the Committee coming to the conclusion that the clause should be omitted, of course their Amendments would be unnecessary. If, on the other hand, the Committee should conclude that the clause should stand part of the Bill, hon. Members would not be prevented from moving their Amendments on the Report. He hoped, therefore, that hon. Gentlemen would not move their Amendments, as that course would be very greatly for the convenience of the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he was sure that the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would be the most convenient one, and he, therefore, hoped that it would be adopted.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 9 stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE said, he had to ask the Committee to omit this clause from the Bill. They would be aware that originally the Government proposed to deal, not only with this phase of the question, but with the whole question of licensing and matters of that description. He did not propose—in fact, it would be out of Order—to enter into discussion of the matters touched upon in the various clauses which affected the liquor traffic. The Government made those proposals in the hope that both sides of the House would find in them, at least, a basis for a satisfactory settlement of this great and difficult question. Unfortunately, the Government had been compelled to come to the conclusion that their proposals were not likely to find acceptance from that Party in the House which had identified itself for so many years, and so honourably, with the cause of temperance. The Government had, therefore, come to the conclusion, that, as far as time was concerned, it was impossible to deal with the question. They perceived that if they determined to proceed with those clauses it would only be done after a most protracted discussion, and in the face of very great opposition. They felt that, looking to the period of the Session, it was impossible for them to hope that they would be able to discuss this question adequately, and to deal with all the Amendments, which filled several pages of the Notice Paper, and also with the other various important matters in connection with the Bill. With considerable reluctance the Government came to the conclusion that, so far as time alone was concerned, even apart from other considerations, it would be impossible for them to deal with this, and likewise with other questions in the Bill during the present Session. But it was not merely a question of time. They felt that, notwithstanding the good intentions of the Government, there had been a very considerable amount of feeling created out-of-doors upon this question. He did not propose to discuss whether that feeling was justifiable, but the fact remained that an enormous amount of feeling had been excited upon the question, and that it was likely to continue to be excited. Therefore, the Government considered that even if they were able in point of time to carry these clauses they would have been face to face with this enormous difficulty—that the first election of the County Councils would have been prejudiced by the feeling created throughout the country on this question. They were desirous that all the County Councils should be chosen simply with a view of selecting the best men, and they felt that it was most essential the first Council, looking to the great importance of the duties which would devolve upon them, should be free from the excited public feeling which would, undoubtedly, have been excited if these clauses had been pressed. Therefore, both in regard to time and the efficiency of the first Council elected, they felt it was extremely desirable that these matters should not be proceeded with. He knew some hon. Members thought the Government might, at least, have dealt with this particular question of Sunday closing under the 9th clause. But the Government did not shrink from the position they had taken up. They had always contended that these matters might be dealt with locally in a satisfactory manner; but both the considerations which had prompted them to ask the House for leave to abandon the Licensing Clauses applied also to this particular clause. If hon. Gentlemen would look at the Notice Paper, they would see that there were a large number of Amendments on the clause, and that if the clause were pressed it would probably be discussed at great length. But the other considerations he had already named also entered very largely into the question. It would be very unfortunate, he thought, if the first election of County Councils were to be complicated by any question of Sunday closing. With reference to the views of the Temperance Party, he believed there was a strong desire—as was apparent from resolutions which had reached the Local Government Board—that that Party did not desire that Sunday closing should be referred to the County Councils and dealt with in the way proposed by the clause. There was hardly a single resolution upon the question which had been sent to the Board which did not commence at once by saying the question of Sunday closing was not one that need be referred to the County Councils at all. Therefore, the Government felt that in abandoning this particular clause they were not going against the views of the Temperance Party of the country. He thought he had stated, very fairly and very frankly, the reasons which had actuated the Government in asking leave to withdraw these clauses. He had also stated the reasons which rendered it undesirable that the Committee should deal with one part of the question only. He hoped the Committee would recognize in the reasons he had given sufficient justification for the proposal the Government now made, that Clause 9 should be omitted from the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he recognized the fair and frank spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had approached this subject, and that he himself would endeavour to deal with it, so far as he could, in the same manner. He had no desire to bring any charge whatever against the Government. He would say nothing that could ruffle the equanimity of even the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) on this subject, which he should separate entirely from the question of licensing and compensation, with which it had nothing whatever to do. He wished, however, to make one remark on that part of the question. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that some difficulty might arise and some strong feeling be developed in the County Councils, owing to the difference of opinion which undoubtedly existed throughout the country with regard to the liquor traffic. But he pointed out that if the right hon. Gentleman meant the County Councils to be living Bodies they must be given some work to perform. Unless they gave the County Councils something to do in the interest of the community which they represented, they would be absolutely worthless Bodies. They would be worthless Bodies if the Government were going to confine their work to questions on which society was neutral, such as main roads and bridges. Therefore, he thought the matters to be referred to them should be such as were of interest to the community, and on which public opinion was largely divided. He regarded the County Councils as Bodies which ought to be guardians of that which concerned the health and morals of the community over which they were placed, and, therefore, he thought that questions of a local character which affected the interest of the county communities ought to be placed in their hands. He believed that this question of Sunday closing was eminently one which ought to be dealt with by the County Councils. He desired not to occupy the time of the Committee more than he could help; but he would, as briefly as possible, remind the House of what had been the history of this Sunday closing question. Many years ago, before he was in Parliament, Sunday closing had been enacted for Scotland, and since that time it had been enacted for Ireland and Wales. Sunday closing had not, therefore, been hitherto carried out by any general compulsory law; but Parliament had felt its way step by step when it had felt certain of acting in accordance with the wishes of the people with whom it had to deal. They knew that in Scotland the great majority of the people were in favour of Sunday closing, and that in Ireland, also, there was a great predominance of feeling in its favour. They had given Sunday closing to Ireland in consequence, and when they found that the same feeling existed in Wales they had given it to the Principality, and he was convinced that if they found the same feeling to exist in England, they must, to be successful, proceed on the same lines. Besides the Sunday Closing Bills which had been passed into law, Bills had been brought forward from other parts of the United Kingdom. These were Bills brought forward with respect to Durham, Cornwall, Monmouth, and other counties. He remembered a remarkable scene occurring in connection with the Durham Sunday Closing Bill. That Bill was supported by all the Members for the county, except his hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Sir George Elliot), who said that although he did not agree with the Bill he knew that his constituents were strongly in its favour, and he could not record his vote against it. He reminded the Committee that although the Durham Bill was confined to one county it went through the House of Commons and passed a second reading in the House of Lords despite the opposition of Lord Salisbury. Up to the year 1885, there was no doubt that the Conservative Party had been opposed to these measures in their various forms. He remembered that when Viscount Cross—then Sir Richard Cross—was sitting in the House he took the line that there ought to be one rule in this matter for the whole country. He (Sir William Harcourt) had never taken that view, and he thought that experience showed that what the noble Lord advocated was not a wise way of proceeding. In his view the proper principle was that each locality should judge for itself in this matter, for he believed the greatest mischief that they could do in a case of the kind was to attempt by Parliamentary enactment to impose reforms of this character upon communities which were not prepared for them, and did not wish them to be imposed. That mistake had been made a few years ago in connection with the Bill of Lord Grosvenor, and was not likely to be repeated. He had for many years contended for the principle of Local Option in this matter as against universal compulsion, because it gave the power of applying this reform to places which required it, and saved them from the danger of imposing it on places where it was not desired. He wished to define exactly what he meant by the term Local Option. He meant the right of each section of the community to determine this Sunday closing question or any other question according to its own wishes or the wishes of the public. As he had stated on a former occasion, the matter was mainly a question of areas, and he believed the smaller the areas which enjoyed Local Option the better, because the feeling of the people with whom they were dealing would be more certainly represented. He would willingly have accepted a smaller area than the county, because he conceived that one part of the county might wish this rule to be enforced, while other parts of the same county might have a different opinion, and he should have been very glad if Local Option could have been given to parishes. The difficulty which had been raised in reference to this matter, and the reason why the principle of compulsion and not Local Option had been adopted, was because there existed no Body within the county which could adequately represent the feeling in different parts of the county and determine on the matter. They had been extremely glad, and had looked forward to the Local Government Bill as a proper means of creating an authority which would be able to come to a determination on the question. He had spoken on the views which two or three years ago were taken as between different sections in reference to this question, although he gladly acknowledged that it was not now a Party question. There were undoubtedly good friends to the cause on both sides of the House. Lord Salisbury's celebrated Newport speech in 1885 contained a declaration on this subject however, which gave great satisfaction. He need not remind the House that Lord Salisbury stated that—

"Looking at it from an impartial point of view, it was impossible not to see the difficulty of a uniform system for the whole country, and if the Government were not afraid of running against some rather antiquated views and doctrines they would have adopted the simple practice of leaving each locality to do what it liked in the matter."

The noble Lord went on to say that he ventured to think that in the few words he had said the idea would rush to the minds of those who heard him that he was proposing Local Option. The noble Lord certainly was proposing Local Option, and he went on to say that he did not think Local Option was bad where it could be legitimately applied, and that they had adopted it with reference to the closing of public-houses on Sunday where it was in accordance with the views of the population, and was regarded as a legitimate action to take place; and the noble Lord said he would therefore be inclined to entrust the Local Authorities with this difficult question of Sunday closing, but always on the understanding that they should not be entrusted with the power of dealing finally with the subject. They were satisfied with that declaration, and he (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to say that when it was put into practical shape in the 9th clause of the Bill all Members considered it decidedly satisfactory. [Cries of "Certainly not!"] He was sorry to hear that; but, at all events, they had always looked forward to the Local Government Bill as the measure in which the principle should be embodied. If that was not in itself the most practical proposal, it had, at any rate, one very great recommendation, to which Lord Salisbury himself referred when he said in 1886 on the Durham Bill—

"I remember that the late Government expressed their opinion that the matter ought to be left to the judgment of the localities acting through freely-elected representative Bodies, and that that view was generally accepted on all sides of politics throughout the country."—(3 Hansard, [306] 18.)

He (Sir William Harcourt) entirely agreed with that. It was the view accepted by the leading Representatives of both Parties in the State, and, as Lord Salisbury had said, it was the view accepted on all sides of politics throughout the country. Well, if that were so, why was this clause to be withdrawn? Who opposed it? The Government did not oppose it, because it was their own clause. The Opposition supported it cordially. Why, then, was it withdrawn? It was said that it was connected with other clauses; but he ventured to say it was not connected with the clauses the right hon. Gentleman had referred to. The objection to the other clauses was with respect to the proposal of the Government for compensation, but the question of compensation had nothing whatever to do with the clause. As the clause had nothing to do with compensation, why was it to be abandoned? As regarded Clause 10, the Government were entitled to say that they regarded compensation as part of that clause; that the two clauses were inseparably united; and that they must be taken the one with the other; but with reference to this clause they could not say anything of the kind. It had never been so treated. At no period of the discussion of the Sunday closing question had the matter been so dealt with. The two questions were treated in the speech of Lord Salisbury at Newport as entirely distinct. Then, he asked, why should they abandon the clause, and why should it be withdrawn from the consideration of the Committee? The Government had admitted that they could deal with one kind of traffic without compensation. For these reasons they asked the Government seriously to consider whether there was any ground on which the clause should be withdrawn, and why they should not agree with Members on that side of the House to carry out what Lord Salisbury called a policy that had been frankly accepted by both Parties in the State? An hon. Member of the House (Mr. Cairne) had come forward to make a bitter personal attack upon him because he had requested that the clause should be retained. The hon. Member was a great classical scholar, and he seemed to have borrowed a Latin grammar in order to assist him in denouncing him as a traitor to the Liberal cause, for proposing that the policy accepted by both Parties in the State should be carried out. The hon. Member held him up as a traitor, and charged him with having invented the County Sunday Closing Bills for Durham and Cornwall. The hon. Member's assertion on that point did not happen to be true, but perhaps he did not think that material. For his (Sir William Harcourt's) own part, he had had nothing to do with inventing the Durham and Cornwall Bills. They came before the House without his knowledge, and he supported them because he thought the proposals which they contained were good; indeed, he should not wonder if they were supported by the hon. Member for Barrow himself. The hon. Member, with admirable consistency, charged him, who, he said, was the inventor of the County Sunday Closing Bills before the House for many years, with having now, for the first time, taken an interest in the temperance cause. The hon. Member said that he had taken up the 9th clause, which he (Sir William Harcourt) had contended for for years, in order to make with it a stick with which to beat the Tory Government. The hon. Member went on to charge him with having taken that course with the object of betraying the cause of Sunday closing. He confessed that he had not been very deeply wounded by these accusations, coming from such a quarter. If he were so in any degree, he had been happily supplied with a salve in the form of an application made to him to preside over a great annual meeting at Manchester of the United Kingdom Alliance. As the hon. Member for Barrow was the Vice President of that Association, he should be happy on that occasion to preside over him. But he would not go on with this subject. There were more things that he could say; but the hon. Member for Barrow knew perfectly well the reasons that withheld him from stating what he thought of his conduct on the present occasion, and from stating facts which might have justified him in pronouncing even a more severe sentence upon the hon. Member. Should he state his reasons? [Mr. CAINE: Certainly.] Then he would do so. His reason was that the hon. Member for Barrow himself advised him to take this particular course, although it was not the advice of the hon. Gentleman which he followed.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): Do I understand rightly the right hon. Gentleman to say that I advised him to take the course he is now taking with regard to this clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes.

MR. CAINE: Then I absolutely deny it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, all he could say was that he did not put that Notice upon the Paper without endeavouring to ascertain the views of hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in that matter. He went to persons whom he regarded as sincere supporters of the temperance cause and of Sunday closing, to obtain their opinions in regard to the proposal to retain the clause. He confessed he did not go to the hon. Member for Barrow. ["Hear, hear!"] No; he did not go to the hon. Member for Barrow, but the hon. Member came to him. He did not consult the hon. Member as a rule; that hon. Member came to him and offered him his advice, and he listened to it with the greatest pleasure. That advice was, that he should propose the retention of the 9th clause and acquiesce in the abandonment of the 10th clause.

MR. CAINE: I deny having done anything of the kind.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he must leave the matter there. There were others who knew that what he was stating was accurate. He must apologize to the Committee for having occupied so much time with the hon. Member for Barrow. But it was impossible for him to pass over the statement he had made without notice. He would merely state further in reference to the hon. Member for Barrow that, having offered him that advice, he went to one of those secret meetings whose proceedings were always published, and having changed his opinions he sat down without one word of communication with himself and denounced him as a traitor to the temperance cause. Now, that was the real position of this matter. What they had to consider was not what the hon. Member for Barrow had said, but what was the best thing to be done in the interest of the Sunday closing cause. Now he ventured to point out that the 9th clause stood upon its own merits apart from all other questions—that was to say, from the questions of licensing and compensation. If the Temperance Party were united they could unquestionably carry this clause, and it was only through the operation of that powerful engine of Caucusing—that piece of political machinery which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) so much advocated—that the clause was in danger. Of course, if the clause were passed the Government would not abandon their Bill. Why should they, merely because their own clause had been passed which they necessarily approved of and which the rest of the House approved of? Therefore, as they would not abandon the Bill, those who desired it would get the clause and the provisions which it contained. The question was, what was going to happen if they did not pass the clause? They had heard something of people not supporting the proposal because they were offered something else. They were offered a debate on the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. J. C. Stevenson). He wished to speak of his hon. Friend with that respect which he deserved from everybody who had the interest of temperance at heart. His hon. Friend was the veteran of Sunday closing; he had brought forward his Bill over and over again. They knew very well what was meant by all that; it meant that a certain number of hon. Members wanted to give a bogus vote; that it was highly inconvenient to them that a genuine, honest vote for the temperance cause should be given; and it was on that account that the injurious machine of the Caucus had been devised. He would now inquire what was to be substituted for the clause, which hon. Members could carry if they wished, and which if they did carry would have this effect—that Durham, Cornwall and all the counties that wanted it would have Sunday closing at once under the operation of the Bill now before the Committee? To carry the clause was to carry the Durham Bill and the Cornwall Bill. He had shown what might happen if they were earnestly endeavouring to further the temperance cause, and how easily they might forward that cause by keeping this bird in hand. But he asked what about the bird in the bush? They were going to have a debate on the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had graciously promised. His hon. Friend the Member for the Cockermouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) who was a cautious man—and it was quite right to be cautious on these occasions—had asked whether the Government were going to support that Bill? Were the Committee to understand that Her Majesty's Government were going to vote in favour of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields? They would like to have some information on this subject before they accepted the offer of the right hon. Gentleman as a substitute for this clause. Again, no one could speak with greater authority on the liquor question than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). Was the right hon. Gentleman going to support the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Yes; I am.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Very well. Would the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that the Government, whose mainstay he was, would carry that Bill through the House of Commons, and through the House of Lords? If he would say that, then he would withdraw what he had said at once. He would like to know whether the noble Lord the Member for the Rossendale Division of Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) would also go bail for the Government? This was an important case, and they had a right to two bails. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale would go bail for the Government that they would carry the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields through during the present Session, he thought they might well agree to drop the 9th clause on that understanding. But the difficulty in his own mind was that the principle of that Bill was the very thing that Lord Salisbury said he could, under no circumstances, agree to. There were various other proposals that Lord Salisbury would consent to, but he said that under no circumstances would he admit universal compulsory Sunday closing for England. That being so, he thought that the bird in the bush stood in a very uncertain position; it appeared to him that it had already flown away, and that they would be foolish beyond all comparison if they were to accept such a substitution for a proposal which, if adhered to, might be carried into law during this Session. He was entirely against the proposal for giving a bogus vote in a matter of this kind. Let the Committee have a genuine downright temperance vote on this clause, and then they would know where they stood. They had seen the ingenious device before of pretending to do one thing when it was intended to do exactly the opposite. This clause had to be voted against, because it was known that if it were carried the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields would have to be supported. The people of England, and even the Temperance Party, were not so stupid as not to see through a device of this character. They knew that it was not in the cause of temperance that the hon. Member for Barrow had written the letter he had referred to; it was for a very different object, and they thoroughly understood that he was the instrument of a very different policy. He, therefore, entreated the Government to have nothing to do with this Caucus. It was not their affair—they were entirely guiltless in respect of it. They had, he believed, proceeded in a perfectly fair manner in this matter, and they had nothing to do with this device of hocus-pocusing. What he pressed upon the Government was that they should allow this part of the Bill to stand. By doing so they would carry with them the greater part of the Temperance Party in the country; and they would give to each part of the community power to deal with a matter of great interest to itself in a manner most conducive to its interests. It might be said that there would be a law in one place different from the law in another. That would be so; but he pointed out that they had a different law in Scotland from that which obtained in Wales, and it was a very good thing that it was so, because if the clause were retained, and Cornwall, for instance, should wish for Sunday closing, it could have it, while if, on the other hand, London did not wish for Sunday closing, it need not have it. They should not attempt to impose an inflexible law of this kind upon an unwilling people, thereby destroying a principle to which a great deal of importance was attached. He hoped the clause would be supported on this occasion, and he could not conceive why the Government should object to it, because the question had not only been dealt with in the Bill, but Lord Salisbury had treated the question of Sunday closing as being entirely separate from the questions of licensing and compensation; and it was upon that footing that he ventured to suggest that this question should be dealt with. He made no other proposal; he did not desire to press the Government with reference to the subsequent clause; he admitted the fairness of the argument that its provisions were inextricably mixed up with the question of compensation. He did not raise that question; he desired to confine the matter solely to the principle of Sunday closing; and, for the reasons he had stated, he hoped the Committee would agree to his proposal to retain the 9th clause of the Bill.

MR. CAINE said, the Committee would not be surprised that he should endeavour to follow the right hon. Gentleman and give some explanation as to the charges brought against him. He had noted his own record in this matter with some care ever since he took up the agitation against these clauses. He had not the slightest recollection of ever having consulted the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Clause 9; and he must say that if every chance conversation which took place was brought forward in the House of Commons and used as a means of discrediting opponents, it seemed to him that a fresh terror had been added to the debates in that House. He could only give the right hon. Gentleman's charge the most unqualified contradiction. There had been only one occasion on which he had ever wavered in the least with respect to this particular clause, as well as the rest of the Licensing Clauses of the Bill, and that was at a meeting of the Temperance Committee of the House of Commons, at which 24 Gentlemen were present out of a Committee of 120. The Committee met a week or two ago and discussed this question. His hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) had expressed his intention to strongly oppose this clause. His own views were perfectly well known to hon. Gentlemen upon the Committee, and he had then stated that if it could be shown that there was a consensus of opinion on the part of the Temperance Party in favour of the retention of this clause he would sink his own views and support it on its own merits. That was the only occasion on which he had given a hint that he should support the clause. He did not pretend to be the equal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, either in debate or in invective; but he would like to refer to the attacks which he and other hon. Members, as well as the newspapers of the right hon. Gentleman's Party, had made upon him personally, and various Members of the Liberal Unionist Party, saying that they had made a bargain to sacrifice Sunday closing in the interest of the Government and the Party to which they belonged. The right hon. Gentleman said that the country hailed the 9th clause with satisfaction. He opposed the clause on its own merits, and, in refusing to vote for its retention in the Bill, he had consistently adhered to the position which he had originally taken up. In taking that line, he maintained that he had been fully supported by the main votes of the Temperance Party, from John O'Groat's to the Land's End. [Cries of "No!"] In March last the annual meeting of the National Temperance Federation was held, at which there were 24 delegates present, representing a total membership of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 of persons, old and young. He was President of the Body, and many Vice Presidents of the organization present to-night in the House were present at the meeting. The Annual Report had been previously circulated, and it contained a paragraph in reference to the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Shields to the effect that the organization was against relegating this question of Sunday closing to Local Bodies, inasmuch as the country was fully prepared for an Imperial measure of Sunday closing. All those present voted for the adoption of the Report, and not a single one said a word against the recommendation contained in the Report. The Central Association for stopping the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays were very glad to welcome so distinguished a recruit as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The right hon. Gentleman had not always been in favour of Sunday closing; he had been recently converted on this as upon a great many other questions; but, highly as he valued his opinion, he thought that the expressed opinion of the organization which had this particular question at heart was of much greater value. That Association had been holding meetings all over the country on this subject, and what did it say? In May, 1888, the Association passed a resolution, after the second reading of the Bill and before there had been any talk about withdrawing the clause, to the effect that it was most important that no opportunity should be lost of impressing upon Members of Parliament the fact that the country had long demanded total Sunday closing, and they protested against the delay and inconvenience which must arise from referring the question to the proposed Local Authorities. He would like to read a resolution which had been passed with regard to these clauses at every meeting throughout the crisis. It was to this effect—that it was a question which need not be referred to localities for decision as proposed in the Local Government Bill, inasmuch as public opinion was already ripe for Imperial legislation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby objected to the word "Imperial." He was not surprised at that, but the words "Imperial legislation" were in constant use as applied to Sunday closing, and signified the action of the Imperial Parliament as opposed to Local Option or the action of Local Bodies. The resolution also urged upon Her Majesty's Government—and he hoped that the Committee would note this—to give special facilities for passing the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. J. O. Stevenson), as it was in full harmony with other legislation which had been attended with beneficial results. He hoped that the hon. Member for South Shields was going to stick to this legislation and not throw it over. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby to hold him up to ridicule as a traitor to the temperance cause. He was loth to speak of himself, but he had been more active in his opposition to the Licensing Clauses of the Bill than any Member—perhaps he might say than any 10 Members in that House. He had attended 32 meetings, and in every one he had advocated the withdrawal of this 9th clause with the others, on the ground that the Licensing Clauses were a thoroughly bad Licensing Bill stuck into the middle of a good Local Government Bill, and that they ought to be withdrawn. But he had always pointed out that the Temperance Party demanded total Sunday closing by Parliament, and not the ridiculous sham of this clause. But it was now contended that the Temperance Party had changed their minds. The Temperance Party had changed their minds many times during the discussion of these clauses, and he was not surprised, because circumstances had changed, and as circumstances changed opinion changed also; but he denied that the Temperance Party were desirous of retaining the 9th clause. The Chairman of the Church of England Temperance Society — [Laughter] — hon. Members might laugh, but the Chairman of that society had rendered services to the cause of temperance second to none — the Chairman had stated that their strong support would be given to the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields, and that they had always held that Sunday closing was properly an Imperial question. He had himself presided last week over a meeting of the National Temperance Federation, at which most of the federated bodies had been represented; no one could be induced at that meeting to move a resolution in support of the clause lest it might work badly and impede the Bill which they hoped to secure. The Grand Lodge of the English Good Templars had met last Friday and declared against Clause 9, and in favour of the question being fought out on the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields, although nobody thought then that the Liberal Unionists could get facilities from Her Majesty's Government for the discussion of that measure. He would now read an extract from The Birmingham Daily Post of the 22nd of June. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was so far advanced as to be invited to the meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance for the Total Suppression of the Liquor Traffic. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman and the House upon that, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would stand firm upon that question, and not go through the same gyrations he had gone through with regard to Sunday closing. In The Birmingham Daily Post there appeared a resolution of the Birmingham branch of the United Kingdom Alliance, which was one of the most energetic in the country, and worked not only in Birmingham, but all over the Midlands. They had expressed their conviction that the provisions of the 9th clause were perfectly inadequate to meet the evils of the sale of liquor on Sunday, or to satisfy the already registered wishes of the people on this subject, and they therefore strongly urged Members of Parliament to support the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields. That resolution had been passed on the day before the Liberal Unionist meeting was held. He would like now to ask a question, to which he trusted an answer would be given. He pointed out that the agitation against the Licensing Clauses had been a purely non-Party agitation until the Government proposed to withdraw them, and now a new agitation had set in, conducted in the name of the Temperance Party, for their retention. How was it that the attempt to retain this clause had not been made by the hon. Member for South Shields, or the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker mouth Division of Cumberland, or some recognized Leader of the Temperance Party? How did it come into the hands of that political lurcher, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby? The right hon. Gentleman had lately had a passion for posing as the leader of movements he was wont to oppose. The right hon. Gentleman had given an account of a fancy conversation in the Lobby with himself. He would now come to a real conversation which took place.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked, would the hon. Gentleman say that at a meeting of his Federation he did not report as the ground of his action his conversation with him?

MR. CAINE said, he stated that he did not approve of this particular clause, and, as Chairman, he endeavoured to elicit information. He asked if any member was ready to move a resolution in support of the clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he asked whether the hon. Member reported to that meeting the conversation which he stated he had with him?

MR. CAINE said, he was endeavouring to explain, in the first place, what was his action at the meeting. If the right hon. Gentleman would not allow him to answer the question in his own way, he would not answer it at all. His action was, as President of that Association, to find out whether or not it was in favour of the 9th clause. He had expressed his own views clearly enough, and no one present could doubt what they were. He had no recollection whatever of having referred to the right hon. Gentleman's name. He did not deny that they might have discussed the subject, but he had no recollection of it. But, certainly, he had never taken the advice of the right hon. Gentleman as to what action either himself or anyone else should take. He had never consulted anybody; he had taken his own line, as he always did on political questions. He had pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman was in the habit of posing as leader of movements which he was wont to oppose. The other day he found the right hon. Gentleman heading a procession of those who were voting against Disestablishment; in fact, he was posing in his favourite character of Uncle Pumblechook. The right hon. Gentleman had the effrontery to come to him in the Lobby—who had been in favour of Disestablishment ever since he had cut his teeth—and congratulate him on having given a vote in favour of Disestablishment, and yet it was the first vote ever given in that House by the right hon. Member for Derby; and now the right hon. Gentleman threw his mantle of patronage over the Temperance Party. In June, 1880, the hon. Member for South Shields moved that in the opinion of the House it was expedient that the law which limited the hours of sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended and applied to the whole of that day. The right hon. Gentleman voted against that. On the next occasion, the 30th of May, 1883, when the County of Durham Bill was brought forward, he supported it. Now the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of Local Option, and he was also in favour of the question being referred to the new County Council which was to be elected for 20 other purposes, and which could vary and repeal their orders. As far as he was concerned, he had always stood by Imperial Sunday closing. They had it in Scotland and Wales, and they intended to get it for England. He wanted to appeal to all true friends of temperance to allow this clause to go with the others. There was no finality in it; the Council might enact it, but they might rescind it; the fight would be interminable, and at every successive election. Rightly or wrongly, he believed that they were on the verge of victory under the old flag and on the old battle-ground; the Government had pledged to meet them on that battle-ground, and he asked nothing more from them. He believed that they would carry by a good majority the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Shields. He hoped that all temperance men in the House would resist the temptation of this dubious proposal, and let it go into limbo with the rest of the Licensing Clauses of the Bill. But, before he closed his remarks, he desired to point out that if this solution of Sunday closing was accepted and universally applied, and the Bill went through on other grounds, it will result in a loss of revenue to the County Councils of £300,000, in consequence of the publicans only having to pay for a six days' licence. This would give a very strong bias to many ratepayers in the selection of their representatives for the County Councils, and he warned the Government that the proposal to transfer the licence revenue from the Imperial to the Local Exchequer would meet with the uncompromising hostility of the whole Temperance Party. He was much obliged to the Committee for the patience with which they had listened to him. He was sorry he had had to enter into a collision with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. He had given, as well as he could, the purport of the conversation which took place between them, and he had nothing more to say upon it.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) said, he would not have trespassed upon the attention of the Committee did he not feel bound to corroborate the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) in the statement he had just made. The Temperance Committee of the House of Commons, of which he (Mr. Johnston) was one of the secretaries, held a meeting in one of the Committee rooms upstairs to discuss the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill. The meeting was presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker-mouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) was also present. The discussion was as to what should be the action of the Temperance Party in the House of Commons in regard to the whole of the Licensing Clauses of the Bill, and after a lengthened discussion, a resolution was unanimously come to that the hon. Member for South Salford (Mr. Howorth) should be supported in the proposition to omit all the Licensing Clauses, including Clause 9, which was considered to be the means of carrying out the views of the Temperance Party. What other meetings had taken place, what other decisions had been come to since that meeting at which he was present, he did not know. Armed with the decision of that meeting to which he had referred, he came here to give his most cordial support to the Government in withdrawing Clause 9, as well as the other clauses of the Bill dealing with licensing. He thought it right he should ask the kind indulgence of the Committee in order that he should make this brief statement, because, as a long and consistent advocate of Sunday closing, he entirely agreed with the recollection of the hon. Member for Barrow, and with the statements he had made as to the views of the Temperance Party. None was a more consistent or stronger supporter of Sunday closing than himself; but he desired to see an Imperial measure passed in order to carry out in England the same system that prevailed in Scotland, Ireland, and in Wales, and believing that this clause would not effect that end, he heartily supported the proposition of the Government to strike out Clause 9, as well as the other Licensing Clauses in the Bill.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY (Northants, S.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had indulged in that peculiar style of argument for which he was so justly celebrated; it used in former times to be called banter, but now-a-days it was called chaff. Personally, he failed to find in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman a single grain of solid reason why this clause should be retained. This clause unquestionably dealt with licensing, and it had been determined by the Government to withdraw the whole of the Licensing Clauses. This clause, therefore, must go with the rest. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) that if Sunday closing was good, and if it was to be adopted, it ought to be adopted for the country as a whole. The divergent decisions of County Councils upon the matter could not be viewed with complacency, and it seemed to him contemptible that hon. Members should endeavour to shift the responsibility of dealing with a complicated and difficult question from themselves to the new County Councils. The main objection he had to this clause was, that it would seriously affect the constitution of the County Councils. The great object they ought to have in view was, to obtain the very best men to serve on the County Councils. There were in many counties, he believed in every county, a certain number of men specially well qualified to transact the business of County Councils. If this clause were struck out, his opinion was that in the great majority of cases these persons would be elected to the Councils. But if this clause were retained, he defied an Archangel from Heaven to bring into relations of amity the teetotallers and the licensed victuallers. Many of the best men in the counties would not offer themselves for election because of the introduction of these questions, and the counties, therefore, would lose the benefit of their valuable services.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth) said, he must ask the Committee to allow him to say a few words in regard to the proposal to withdraw this clause, and with respect to the position in which they found themselves. His right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) put the matter exceedingly clearly before the Committee. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) considered that this clause was a most valuable clause in the Local Government Bill; it was a clause to give the communities of the country an opportunity of getting rid, for one day at least, of the evils of the drink traffic, where public opinion was strongly in favour of that course. He assured the Committee that, notwithstanding the opposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), he should give the clause his most earnest, most hearty, and most strenuous support. In saying that, he hoped the Committee would understand that he did not support the clause on what was called Sabbatarian grounds. He believed the Sabbath was made for man, and not man made for the Sabbath. He did not believe the Sabbath was made for man to get drunk on. He agreed with the Bishop of Peterborough, who had said that in his opinion every day was the Lord's day, and, therefore, every day they ought to see that order and decorum was carried on. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was quite consistent in this matter. He remembered that very soon after he came into the House there was a Sunday Closing Bill introduced, and he ventured to make a speech upon it, one of the first speeches he ever made in the House. When he sat down, Sir George Grey, who was then Home Secretary, got up and opposed the Bill. Sir George Grey was good enough to say that his (Sir Wilfrid Lawson's) was one of the best speeches which had been made upon that occasion, and added that its logical conclusion was that the liquor trade ought not to be stopped on Sunday alone, but on every day. That was exactly what he wanted Sir George Grey to understand; but then it did not follow because he was right and logical that his view was carried or had been carried out. They must always remember the great maxim laid down by Mr. Disraeli, when he said—"We must remember that this country is not governed by logic, but by Parliament." He thought that to carry out the principle of saving the people from the evils of the drink traffic even for a very short time, was right and proper. He should prefer a clause allowing the trade to be stopped on Saturday, because he believed that there was more evil done to working people by drink on the Saturday, when they had money in their pocket. This clause certainly went a little way in the right direction, and he should follow the plan he had always laid down for himself in the House, and he thought it was a right plan—namely, to take what he could get. A good example of that sentiment was afforded by the case of a man who went to be married. When the man was asked, "Wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?" he said, "I am willing, but I would rather have had her sister." He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was not like the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), who would not take either; he was willing to take this clause, although he would much rather take an Imperial Act if it were possible to get it. Now, how did they stand in regard to the history of this clause? When the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) brought in his Bill on the 19th March, he found it necessary to do something in the Bill to meet the general demand which had arisen in the country—to do something in the direction of what was called temperance legislation. What was the meaning of temperance legislation? It had no other meaning except to diminish the temptation to drink; it could have no other meaning, and they had been promised something in that line for years and years past. Right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as those on the other side, had asked them to wait until the Local Government Bill was brought in, and then they would see what they would see. Right hon. Gentlemen had often said they were going to deal with the whole question; he was always suspicious of that. Whenever he heard any Statesman say he was going to deal with the whole question, he always thought he meant that he was going to delay the whole question. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had made an attempt to deal with the question—and he gave him credit for his attempt—according to his lights; they were not very good. The right hon. Gentleman brought in his Bill, and intimated that he intended to do something in the way of temperance legislation. Now, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had pointed out that temperance legislation meant diminishing the facilities for getting drink. On the 19th of March, however, the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House, and told the temperance men that he was going to do something for them; but then he said, with some show of triumph, that he intended to place the drink sellers on a more secure footing than they were at present. His (Sir Wilfrid Lawson's) friends were at once up in arms, because every temperance reformer, philanthropist, and worker among the poor had for years past been trying to put the publicans on a less secure footing. The right hon. Gentleman had very temperately stated that the country rose against his scheme, and that he found it impossible to carry it out. The agitation had settled the question of compensation, for this Parliament at any rate; but he begged the Committee to remember that the principle of compensation had never been withdrawn by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite; they were only waiting the opportunity of adopting it; at least they had never said the contrary, and, therefore, temperance men must look sharp after them. He hoped he was not travelling over ground which had been already covered; it certainly was very difficult to say anything fresh upon the matter after the exhaustive speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, but let him point out again that this clause had nothing to do with compensation. Remember that it was intended that if this Sunday Closing came into force there should be an equivalent reduction in the duty paid by licence holders. And remember, too, that this clause came in the Bill long before the Compensation Clause. This was a separate clause altogether; it did not deal with licences, but it simply said that when the County Council was appointed it should have the power to deal in a certain way with what it might consider a nuisance. He was not speaking too strongly when he called a public-house a nuisance, because The Edinburgh Review, a most respectable paper, had described the drink traffic as a nuisance, socially, morally, and politically, and the right hon. Gentleman in this clause provided the community with power, through its representatives, to abate the nuisance when they wished to do so. What he had to ask the Government was this. If they considered the County Councils competent to take upon themselves the abatement of nuisances on the 19th of March, what had happened since that they should come here and say they were not now competent to abate nuisances? He thought there was more reason now than there was on the 19th March why the County Council should have this power. Everything had been taken out of the Bill; now it was only a skeleton

Bill, and everybody was wondering what the County Councils would have to do when they were elected. It had got to be a laughing stock; the House devoured a bit of the Bill every day. He had been exercised in his mind to find out why the Government had changed their views upon this matter, and he had come to the conclusion—he did not think it was possible to come to any other conclusion—that they felt obliged to do it because they thought that if they left this clause in the Bill it would tend to the injury of the great drink interest. In order to retain the support of the great drink interest, the Government said—“We will abandon the provision which three months ago we said to be wise and just.” He thought that the public were openly in the face of day sacrificed for the publicans. In order that the Government might retain the support of the publicans this Committee was called upon to reject the prayer of the working classes. The Government were about to abandon their own offspring, and refuse the petition of almost all the temperance bodies of the country. Now, his hon. Friend the Member for Barrow quoted some resolutions passed by different bodies. He (Sir Wilfred Lawson) desired to show that even what were called the least extreme temperance bodies were in favour of retaining this clause. For instance, this was what the legislative sub-committee of the Church of England Temperance Society passed some days ago—

“That this meeting of the legislative sub-committee of the Church of England Temperance Society approves the retention of Clause 9 of the Local Government Bill.”

Now, he would read a sentence which came afterwards, for the benefit of his hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston). This was the sentence which appeared in The Church of England Temperance Chronicle—

“In any case it was understood that Members of Parliament could not be bound by any resolution of the sub-committee.”

What a splendid resolution was it not? They virtually said—“Let us go to war, only let us take care that no soldiers fight. No one else may fight except the people who have no opportunity of doing any good.” He had with him a quotation from a speech of Lord Salisbury, but he would not waste the time of the Committee by reading it, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby had read it at length. It was quite clear, however, that Lord Salisbury laid down the very principle of this clause in the celebrated Newport speech, in which he expounded the policy of the Conservative Party. He supposed that, in spite of all this, hon. Gentlemen opposite would very naturally follow their Leaders. The rank and file of the Tory Party had determined to throw out this clause; they would follow their Leaders, and the Leaders were acting according to the bidding of their masters. This was what happened a few days ago. There was an aggregate meeting of the trade held in St. James's Hall. Lord Burton was in the chair, and this resolution was passed—

"That this meeting earnestly protests against the Amendment placed on the Paper of the House of Commons by Sir William Harcourt asking for the retention of Clause 9, which introduces the principle of Local Option in respect to Sunday Closing."

He had no doubt that no sooner was that resolution passed than it was sent off post haste to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), and that then he got his marching orders and gave orders to the rank and file as to what they were to do. What Lord Burton and his friends substantially said, was—"Look here, we have assembled 3,000 drink sellers. Does not that compare grandly with all the thousands of rag-tag and bob-tail who assembled in Hyde Park the other day?" The Government agreed, and they said—"We will go for the Besses, and not for the masses." Now, he had done with hon. Members on the opposite side of the House, to whom he gave every credit for their motives, but there were other people in the House beside Tories. He had seen it stated, he believed correctly, that there were in the House 57 Liberal Unionists and Tories who had supported in some shape or other Sunday closing, and among them were his hon. Friend the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) and his hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). He would not say anything about the hon. Member for South Tyrone, because he was not present; he was down in the Isle of Thanet supporting Mr. James Lowther in the interests of true temperance. He wondered his hon. Friend the Member for Barrow did not go with the hon. Gentleman; he thought that if they had both gone the Gladstonians would have won the election for a certainty. But what was the fight in the Isle of Thanet? Why, it was the old fight, the old issue, the National Church and the national beverage against national justice and national morality. If the hon. Member for South Tyrone was as successful as he wished to be with his promising temperance candidate, next week he would return, bringing his sheaves with him, and rejoicing the hearts of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and of the Bishops and of the Besses, and of the rest of them. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow had not gone down to Thanet; but he had stayed at home to write letters. The hon. Gentleman said, in his letter to The Times—

"If this clause becomes law, it will undoubtedly be considered a final settlement of the Sunday Closing controversy, so far as Parliament is concerned, until it has had a fair trial throughout the country."

Who were going to consider it a final settlement? Not he; that was not his policy; he believed in no final settlement until justice was done. His policy was the policy of the old Scotch Member, who said to his son, when he asked what he was to do when he got into the House—"Tak a' ye can, and be aye complainin' ye canna get mair." Then in this wonderful and historical letter, the hon. Member went on—

"If the Government will give an honest and workable opportunity to Mr. Stevenson to take a Division on the second reading of that Bill, by which the Temperance Party has always stood, that Party will act wisely in its own interests to let this dubious 9th clause go by, and endeavour to get such a majority on Mr. Stevenson's Bill as will secure its passing into law next Session."

Next Session! Where did the hon. Gentleman expect to be next Session? [Mr. CAINE: Here.] Then, again, he went on—

"We are asked by Sir William Harcourt to abandon those proposals for Imperial Sunday Closing."

Nothing of the kind. They might be asked, but they would not accept it; they simply would accept this as an instalment. There was a great difference between a compromise and an instalment, and he thanked the Government very heartily for this instalment. Further, the hon. Member said—

“For myself, I intend to stand by Imperial Sunday Closing, and let the whole of the Government proposals in regard to licensing go into limbo together.”

And then, having exhausted his English, the hon. Member turned to Latin. He quoted two Latin sentences; one he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not understand; the other one he did, because it was one of the oldest established quotations. It was, “Ti-meo—or Tim-eo”—

[Laughter.] He was quite prepared to admit that although he could read the sentence, he could not pronounce it. He believed the translation was—[Cries of “Read.”] Well, he would try again—Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes.” It was, at any rate, a very good quotation, and very applicable in many cases. He knew very little Latin; but he knew two words, and, after reading the letter, he was disposed to say, with reference to the hon. Member for Barrow, “Cave canem”—beware of him indeed! What did all this mean? What did all this talk about taking a vote on the second reading of the Sunday Closing Bill mean? There was no pledge to carry that Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was a wily man. He was not to be drawn by him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) the other night. The right hon. Gentleman said—“I must wait and see what I shall see.” He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) knew perfectly well what he should see. The hon. Member for Barrow was reckoning without his host when he talked about getting the Bill through the House; there was another Body to be reckoned with—the irremovables. His hon. Friend the Member for Barrow knew as well as he did that it was part of the very religion of “another place” to provide drinking facilities for the people on Sunday. The hon. Gentleman had given up a certainty—it would have been a certainty if the hon. Member and his Friends had voted for the clause—for a shadowy promise of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). Now, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) looked upon this night as a great night in the history of the temperance movement. For the first time in the history of that movement they had one of the leading men of the real Liberal Party getting up at that Bench, and in an able speech making a movement in the direction of real temperance. When he heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, he remembered what his right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan) said many years ago at a meeting he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) attended. He had never forgotten it. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“It is written, and the writing cannot be effaced, that the Liberal Party must become the Temperance Party,” and to-day they saw, for the first time, a promise of the fulfilment of that prophecy. If—because right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench did not go so far as he could wish them to go—he were to upbraid them because they were not up to his mark, he could not conceive a course more silly, more senseless, or more suicidal. Did not his hon. Friend know the maxim in the House, never lose a stage, because if you lose a stage of a Bill the chances are that you will never see it again. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that a clause in the hand was worth any number of Bills in the bush. If he could believe that this proceeding, this piece of tactics on the part of hon. Gentlemen, was taken with the desire, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby hinted, that they might have an opportunity of seeming to be voting for temperance while they were really taking care it was not carried, he should think the manœuvre was clumsy and contemptible. But he did not make such a charge against them, because he knew the Unionist Party were pre-eminently men of honour. He never read their speeches without thinking that they were honourable men above all honourable men who had ever lived, and that they were going through a species of martyrdom in defence of principle, because these high-minded men sat here night after night, surrounded by Radicals and assassins, which they could only do because they were prompted by the highest sense of duty. That being the case, he was sure that they were taking a most honourable course; and all he said was, that their innocence of the ways of the world and their ignorance of the habits and proceedings of this House was perfectly appalling. He asked them, even now, to take a wiser, and more considerate, and more patriotic course; he asked them to listen to the entreaties of their fellow-countrymen that something should be done to mitigate the great curse of drink. He asked them to listen more to those entreaties than to the ukase of Lord Burton at St. James's Hall. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain)—he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would enlighten them in this debate—spoke noble words at a great meeting held at a time when the right hon. Gentleman and he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) tried to do right together. The right hon. Gentleman said—

[Tenth Night.]

“It is the right of the community to have absolute control over a trade which directly affects their moral, social, and physical interests.”

Was the right hon. Gentleman going to say now that these County Councils should not have even the limited power of control which was proposed in this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman also said in that speech—

“A priest-ridden nation is a nation very much to be pitied, but a publican-ridden nation is a nation very much to be despised.”

If he might give the right hon. Gentleman a little bit of advice, he would say that if a statesman despised a publican-ridden nation, it was just possible that the nation might despise a publican-ridden statesman. He thanked the Committee for having heard him so patiently, and he had only to say, in conclusion, that he believed that they would be only taking a wise and moderate and prudent step, if they retained this clause in the Bill, and thus entrusted the English communities with that power of getting rid on the “best of days of the worst of trades,” a power which was now enjoyed by the people of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.) said, he should not have risen to take part in the debate if it had not been for the reference the hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had just made to the resolution which was passed by the legislative sub-committee of the Church of England Temperance Society. He understood the hon. Baronet to state that there was a large number of Members of Parliament present at the meeting at which that resolution was passed. As a matter of fact, there were only seven persons present, of those only three were Members of Parliament; the resolution, too, was only passed by a majority of one, four voting for it and three against it. That, he thought, completely answered the argument of the hon. Baronet founded upon that resolution. He was quite free to admit that the Church of England Temperance Society, if it was consulted as a body, would probably be divided upon the desirability of retaining this clause as compared with the desirability of supporting the general measure introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson). But, as a matter of fact, he might state that that Society had never hesitated in supporting the general measure for Sunday closing, in opposition to any measure of Local Option, or any measure leaving the question to the Local Authorities to decide. In the opinion of that Society, a general measure was very preferable to any measure which would act within a small area. He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) to state that, in his opinion, the better area would be even such a small area as the parish. That was his opinion, but it never had been the opinion of the Church of England Temperance Society, for they believed that as they limited the area for Sunday closing they would increase the difficulties which would arise in the carrying out of the Act, and they would increase the number of scandals against the Temperance cause on the borders of that limited area. Frequent references had been made in the House to the scandals which occurred on the Sunday upon the border line between England and Wales. In Scotland, of course, there was no difficulty, because the border line there was a very small one, and the whole Kingdom of Scotland was under one law. There Sunday closing had acted well, and produced most favourable results. He regretted very much that the opportunity which had been presented to the House by the Government for dealing with Sunday closing in any fashion, and more especially in connection with the other valuable clauses of the Bill dealing with the Licensing Question, should be lost. He would not analyze the various causes which had contributed to that result, but, as one good reason was quite as good as 50, he thought that the want of time—the great amount of time which would have been occupied in discussing the Licensing Clauses to the detriment of the other parts of the Bill—was quite a sufficient reason for the Government withdrawing these clauses altogether. He did not wish to stand in the way of the Division, but he felt it his duty to state the exact position of matters with regard to the resolution of the Church of England Temperance Society. If, however, there had been an opportunity, he should have liked to have made some other remarks upon various other points bearing on the question.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk) said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cockermouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), in his very able and interesting speech, asked a question which was at least deserving of an answer. The hon. Baronet asked what had happened to make the Government change their mind as to the competency of the County Councils to deal with the question of Local Option? Something had happened. It was well known that the Government had been urged to and had withdrawn the whole of the Licensing Clauses. That was the reason why the County Councils were incompetent to deal with the question of Local Option. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) was in the habit of astonishing the House by his observations; but he doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman had ever given the House more cause for astonishment than to-day, when he said that the 9th clause was not a Licensing clause. Why, Sunday closing involved the reduction of a seven days' licence to a six days' licence, and therefore, whatever might be said as to the merit or demerit of Sunday closing, it could not be said that a clause dealing with the subject was not a licensing clause. The hon. Baronet would not dispute the fact that he and those with whom he acted, had very strongly urged the Government to withdraw the Licensing Clauses. Of course the opposition of hon. Gentlemen was mainly directed against the Compensation Clauses.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked that he might be allowed to put the hon. Gentleman right. If the hon. Gentleman referred to the speech he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) made on the second reading of the Bill, he would find that he distinctly stated that if the Compensation Clauses were left out he should not be able to find fault with the Licensing Clauses.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR said, that what the hon. Baronet had said did not affect the point that it was urged that the Licensing Clauses, as a whole, should go. Clause 9 being one of the Licensing Clauses, it must go also. It had been stated in the Press that the House had already dealt with licensing in Clause 4; that they had already transferred certain licensing powers to the County Council. Although the word "licence" did occur in the 4th Clause, it merely had reference to the licensing of theatres respecting plays; it did not, in any degree, touch the question whether for the same buildings licences should be granted for refreshments. He had only one other observation to make, and it had reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that those hon. Members who were prepared to vote against the 9th clause being retained, and to vote for the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. J. C. Stevenson), were going to give a bogus vote. Speaking for himself and all those with whom he acted, he boldly stated that they meant to vote in the way stated because they thought it was the most effective vote they could give in favour of Sunday closing. They maintained that the analogy of legislation in the past was distinctly in favour of general as opposed to piecemeal legislation. Already Sunday Closing Acts had been passed for Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. It was true that in Ireland certain towns were exempted from the operation of the Act; but those were statutory exemptions, and if it was necessary to have statutory exemptions in England, there could be no difficulty in having such introduced into the Act. He trusted that the present proposal of the Government would be accepted, and that the question of Sunday closing would be dealt with upon the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields.

MR. T. FRY (Darlington) said, that as he took some interest during the last two Parliaments in the Bill for closing public-houses in the county of Durham on Sundays, he would like to say a few words upon this clause. In the first place, let him say he did not consider the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) had any more right to speak in the House for the Temperance Party than any other Member of the Party who supported temperance legislation. He denied altogether the hon. Gentleman's assertion that the temperance associations throughout the country were in favour of the withdrawal of this clause from the Local Government Bill. The last two speakers seemed to think that this clause must be withdrawn because other clauses were to be withdrawn; but after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) they saw that that was an entire mistake. The question of Sunday closing was entirely and totally distinct from licensing and the question of compensation. The hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. W. P. Sinclair) made a great mistake in supposing that the Temperance Party had even as a Body asked that the power of licensing should not be transferred to the new County Councils. All that temperance reformers had asked was that the Compensation Clauses should be abandoned. The conduct of the Government in reference to this question was extraordinary in the last degree. When he first read these clauses he never expected they would pass; they were far too good to come from a Tory Government. He thought that nothing so good could possibly come out of the Tory camp. The change in the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) was very extraordinary. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government did not shrink from the position which it had taken up, and yet it was shrinking as far as it could. The right hon. Gentleman professed to be very much afraid of the excitement which the introduction of the question of Sunday closing into the elections for the County Councils would cause. It was strange he did not think of that before he brought in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board must bear in mind that, even if this clause were withdrawn, the question of Sunday closing would enter into the elections, because the people would feel sure that some day or other the County Councils would be called upon to deal with it. It seemed to him that by this Bill an endeavour was made to give the country hopes which could not be realized. He was reminded that this Government passed an Act for the relief of agricultural tenants, and then they gave power to the parties to contract themselves out of the Act. It was as well that certain Supporters of Her Majesty's Government should be reminded of the part they had taken with reference to the question of Sunday closing. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool (Mr. W. F. Lawrence), speaking on the 24th of March, 1886, upon the question of Sunday closing, expressed a strong opinion in favour of committing this question to the County Councils. The hon. Member for the Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot) also spoke very strongly in the same direction. In reference to the County of Durham Sunday Closing Bill, the hon. Gentleman asked indignantly, what was to be done for the other counties? He said—"In the name of common sense let us have a comprehensive measure, one relating to the whole country." But now, when a comprehensive measure was introduced, no doubt the hon. Gentleman would be found voting against it. He (Mr. T. Fry) was especially interested in this clause because he had put down one or two Amendments to it. One of his Amendments provided for an earlier closing of public-houses on Saturday nights. There were several Members of the House who had spoken very strongly in favour of the early closing of public-houses on Saturday nights, and no one had done so more strongly than the hon. Gentleman the present Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley). Speaking on the 2nd of April, 1884, upon the question of Sunday closing, he said he thought it would be far better if their efforts were directed to earlier closing on Saturday when working men had their wages burning in their pockets.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to discuss his Amendment to the clause at this stage.

MR. T. FRY said, he was only alluding to it as a reason why the clause should be retained in the Bill.

The Committee would remember that measures had been introduced for the adoption of Sunday closing in three Northern counties possessing a population of 4,000,000. There could be no doubt that those counties were as much entitled to those Bills as Monmouth and Cornwall, and he was sorry that Her Majesty's Government had been restrained by the slightest shriek of opposition from doing the good proposed in the clause. He believed, as the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker-mouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had said, that it was fear of the publican party which had inspired in the Government a desire to take this clause out of the Bill. The newspaper sometimes termed the "leading journal," that was to say, The Times, some days ago had made the monstrous statement that the clause had been inserted in the Bill "for the sole purpose of injuring the publican." He (Mr. Fry) contradicted that altogether. None of them wished to injure the publican per se. No doubt the publicans were an honourable class of men, as honourable as other classes, and there could be no desire on the part of anyone to inflict an unnecessary injury upon them. The fact was, in this controversy they did not take any notice of the publican, their desire being to ameliorate the social condition of the people, and to obtain for a large number of persons—something like 300,000—who were now engaged throughout the country in the sale of drink on Sunday, their lawful rest on the Sabbath day. They were acting in this matter from a far nobler and higher motive than a mere desire to do harm to the publican per se.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, he should not treat the deliberate intentions of the Government with such disrespect as to assume that they were not worthy of the consideration of the Committee. The Government doubtless had put this clause in regard to Sunday closing, and the four subsequent clauses having reference to licensing, into the Bill with the intention if possible of carrying them through both Houses of Parliament. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had to-night stated, in his explanation of the withdrawal of the 9th Clause and the subsequent clauses, that the Government had a real substantial desire, which they still held to and which they wished to see realized at some more favourable moment, to transfer the licensing powers from the present irresponsible magistrates to the responsible Body, the County Council. If that were so, hon. Members had occasion to ask what could have induced the Government to run away in that extraordinary fashion from their own proposals? He thought the Government had somewhat misunderstood and exaggerated the meaning of the opposition which had sprung up out-of-doors. The whole crux of the matter was this,—he believed that there would have been no opposition whatever on the part of the Temperance Societies throughout the country to the present clause, which he did not regard as a licensing clause, or to the four following clauses, if it had not been for the introduction of the vexed subject of compensation. Now let him (Mr. Illingworth) ask whether it was necessary for the Government to abandon all these clauses? Could they not have made up their minds to abandon the proposal in regard to compensation simply? That was surely a reasonable question to put to the Government; for how did the matter stand as to compensation? It had been urged—at that moment it was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that the question as to compensation was sub judice—that recently decisions had been given by the Courts adverse to the claims of the publicans to compensation in the event of the closing of a public-house, but the right hon. Gentleman had gone on to say that it was likely that the decision would be made the subject of appeal, and for that reason he objected to the discussion of the question. Well, but surely in a Bill of this magnitude they were entitled to ask whether it was necessary for the Government to introduce so vexed a proposal as this with reference to compensation? If, as the law stood, the Government had confidence that the publican had every security he desired for compensation, and that had been the position taken up by the hon. and learned Solicitor General — [The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Edward Clarke) (Plymouth): No, no!]—if the Government thought the publican had security at present, why did they not leave him in his present safe position? Why should the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in a Bill of this nature have introduced a proposal which would give the publican a new and increased security? If it did not give additional security, it was more mysterious still why the Government should have introduced this question of compensation, which was so embarrassing to the Bill. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board declared on the second reading, and stated it broadly as a comfort to the publican interest, that the intention of the Government in drafting the compensation provisions was to give new and increased security to the publican interest.

MR. RITOHIE: That statement has been often repeated during the debate, but has only a certain amount of foundation. The way it is put leads to an altogether wrong inference. What I said was that it had been stated that the effect of the proposals of the Government would be to give additional security—not that it was the intention of the Government to give additional security to the publican, but that it had been stated that such would be the effect. Subsequently I stated in answer to a question put to me in the House, that in the opinion of the Government there was foundation for that statement, because it would protect the publican from the local veto which is proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker-mouth Division of Cumberland without compensation. In that sense, no doubt, the position of the publican would be better.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, there could be no doubt whatever that it was very possible to put a wrong construction upon the statement of a Minister in charge of a Bill, but still he must hold the right hon. Gentleman to this—that being a man of common sense and of some experience, and knowing the difficulties they were about to grapple with in the measure, he had held out to the publican interest a superior security as emanating from this Bill to that which it possessed before. He (Mr. Illingworth) again asked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board this question, if the publican had a security under the existing law, why should the right hon. Gentleman have complicated the Bill by placing these clauses in it? He sincerely believed that the right hon. Gentleman's desire was to see brought about a mitigation of the abuses of the liquor law in this country. The Government had been obliged to abandon some cherished clauses of their own. They on that (the Opposition) side of the House, he said, appreciated many of the clauses of the Bill, and would have liked to see them carried out without this unfortunate bar of gold driven into these unfortunate clauses. He would even at the eleventh hour make another appeal to the Government, and would ask them especially as to this 9th clause—and he would press a similar appeal upon them as to the other clauses it was proposed to abandon if opportunity presented itself—to take into consideration the possibility of again setting this clause on its legs. He did not hesitate to say that the Government would meet with such acquiescence on that (the Opposition) side of the House as would render it easy to do as he suggested, if there were a concurrence on the other side of the House, and undoubtedly there would be such concurrence, that the Government would never have brought forward a proposal of this kind without being first assured of the support of the main body of Gentlemen on their side of the House. He might say that there would be absolute unanimity on this question, with the exception perhaps of a few Gentlemen whose intellect he was bound to say was clouded at that moment, and whose conscience he was also bound to say was somewhat seared. He believed, however, that the Government would find this clause received as generously by their supporters in general as the other provisions of the Bill. Even if this clause were now omitted, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board must be perfectly well aware that the whole matter would have to be fought out again, and that the time of Parliament would have to be devoted on some future occasion to the threshing out of the matter. Therefore, there was very good reason why the right hon. Gentleman should adhere to his original proposal, and with the support of both sides of the House carry this clause through. There would be no protracted discussion upon it. They could, at any rate, give the right hon. Gentleman that assurance. But the right hon. Gentleman had stated a further objection. He had said that it would be an unfortunate thing that the new County Councils, as soon as appointed, should have put before them such a vexed and heated question as this of Sunday closing. Well, if the Government had left the Bill in its original form, he (Mr. Illingworth) could imagine the right hon. Gentleman saying that the County Councils would have had plenty of other subjects to occupy their attention; but as the Bill now stood, with the prospect of its being further lightened, he could not imagine for a moment how the right hon. Gentleman could expect men of business and men who valued their time, and objected to sacrifice it unnecessarily, to come forward and connect themselves with these local Councils at all. He was bound to say this—that if these Councils were to be of any value whatever, they must take up those burning questions that interested the constituencies by whom they were returned on the Councils. What were they for otherwise? It was said that that House had its hands burdened and overburdened, and no doubt that was the case; but they had to take up the question, and they would have in the future to discuss it on its merits, in order that some progress might be made with this Sunday closing question. He thought there was every reason in the world why the right hon. Gentleman should re-consider this point, and if the interval of the dinner hour induced him to say, “Very well, in view of the general concurrence of Members on both sides in favour of the retention of this clause, the clause should not be omitted,” he (Mr. Illingworth) was sure that general satisfaction would be felt by all parties. As to the question of compensation, which was unfortunately such a difficult one in connection with this and subsequent clauses, he believed the question stood thus—a sort of bribe to gentlemen who were interested in the cause of temperance to bring about their acquiescence in the provisions which followed. Well, no doubt the great majority of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House were sincerely desirous of putting an end to the evils that arose out of Sunday trading; but the delusion that so many had fallen into in assenting to the proposal of the Government to strike out this 9th clause was that they were to have a discussion upon this question of Sunday closing generally on a Sunday Closing Bill. Well, he desired to know whether the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) had any security from the Government that they would give any facility whatever for the discussion of that Bill or any support to a Bill dealing with the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had said that it was his intention to support that Bill. Yes; but something more than that was necessary. If Gentlemen who were anxious on this Sunday closing question were to have any substantial comfort, and the question was to be at all advanced, they should have some undertaking from the Government that both in this House and in “another place” they would give the measure all the support in their power. He (Mr. Illingworth) was afraid they could not reckon very much on the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because that right hon. Gentleman was in an unfortunate position. He had made it clear that he would not further curtail the rights and privileges of the publican interest without compensation being given to them. Well, if he were to vote for this Sunday Closing Bill, and the Bill became law, it was clear that one-seventh of the publicans profits would go. It was quite true the right hon. Gentleman did not act in that matter on Sabbatarian grounds, because he did not hold Sabbatarian views; but he was opposed to Sunday trading, because he knew that more drinking went on on the Sunday and that the evils of intemperance were more prevalent on that day. If Sunday closing were passed with the right hon. Gentleman’s support, on the ground that the evils of drinking were greater upon a certain day, would he be prepared subsequently to adopt that argument as to another day in the week; because unquestionably there would be similar ground for such argument. The right hon. Gentleman was evidently in a difficulty in this matter, because while he did not wish to interfere with the publicans’ rights and privileges in that way, their privileges would be whittled away by degrees. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow had given Notice of opposition to all the Licensing Clauses, but had not given Notice of any opposition to that clause. Reference had been made by the hon. Member for Barrow to the meeting of the Members connected with the Temperance Party upstairs, and as the subject had been touched upon in a candid spirit, and no reluctance had been displayed in dealing with it, he might mention the course the hon. Member himself took when the question of these clauses was considered at that meeting. It was evident from the outset that the hon. Gentleman was about to take a very peculiar course, and while some Members were urging that they ought to press the Government to stand by this clause, the hon. Member pointed out that the Government would put the closure on if it was attempted to discuss these clauses. Well, he (Mr. Illingworth) had far more faith in the sound sense of the Government than he had in that of his hon. Friend, and he declared at the time that he did not believe they would run very much risk in the matter—that the Government had given Notice of their intention to withdraw the clause, and, that being so, they were bound to allow the House of Commons to express its opinion on the subject of that withdrawal—and he was glad to be able to add that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in moving the withdrawal of this clause, had left an opening for the fair and reasonable consideration of the proposal. He (Mr. Illingworth) could only add, in conclusion, that if the Government, weakly as he considered it, abandoned the clause at that moment, they would add to the embarrassment of Parliament in the future. Nobody expected that the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) would be carried this Session. It was to be relegated to next Session. The Government had been very careful not to overburden itself with obligations for this Session. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and his Colleagues would not deny that next Session had in prospect for them an increased and greater variety of work than they had undertaken this Session. It was impossible that they could stave off many other important questions. What, then, would be the prospect of this Sunday Closing Bill in the hands of a private Member? Was it possible for the Government to take it up and treat it from an Imperial standpoint? He had no such anticipations, and, therefore, it was that he would urge the Government to stand by this clause, and to let them have a bird in the hand rather than a bird in the bush which would have so many opportunities of eluding their fingering in the future. It was a matter for serious consideration on the part of the Government whether they would follow the wiser and better and more rational course on this matter of keeping in the clause, or whether they would yield to the clamour of the publicans' interest and strike it out. That was the difficulty of the Government. They had a large majority in the House of Commons ready to support them if they went forward with the clause, and he sincerely hoped that, in the interest of the well-being of the country, they would not allow it to be dropped.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, he had had an opportunity of attending the temperance meeting of hon. Members to which the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) and the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Illingworth) had referred, and perhaps he might be allowed to explain where the hon. Member for Barrow was wrong in the position he had taken up. No doubt, if there were a prospect of getting a Sunday Closing Bill entire, the temperance advocates in the House would be in favour of it; but there was not a very clear prospect of such a Bill being passed, and the hon. Member had no right to say that the Temperance Party were opposed to the present clause. They supported it as it stood, though, no doubt if they could get public-houses shut up everywhere on Sundays, the majority would be in favour of it. The hon. Member for Barrow had put down Notice of opposition to everyone of the Licensing Clauses except this, therefore, the hon. Gentleman must be taken as holding that this clause was one which should not be got rid of. Unlike the hon. Member, he (Mr. Cossam) could not vote against the clause, which would go very far in the direction he desired to proceed. He admitted that the clause did not go so far as he should like, but it went in his direction, and he believed that the effect of its being passed would be to reduce very largely the evils of the liquor traffic on Sundays. He certainly did not understand how anyone, with the interest of temperance at heart, could go against the clause. He could understand the argument, that in voting for the clause some injury might be done to the Government; but that argument would have no weight with him, as he valued the clause far more than the Government. He was certainly grateful to them for having proposed it, but that gratitude was considerably tempered, seeing that they now proposed to abandon it. He was very sorry they had come to that determination. He did not think there was a question which had made so much progress in this country as Sunday closing, and whether the Government abandoned the clause or not, he was sure that in this country we were getting within reach of Sunday closing. He supported the clause, not only on the ground of Sabbatarianism, but because he thought if they prevented all other forms of trade on Sunday, they ought certainly to put a stop to that particular form which was most dangerous. Surely the sale of liquor was not more necessary than the sale of food and clothes, and yet the sale of food and clothes was prohibited, while the sale of intoxicating liquor was not. If they made an exception at all in this case, it should not be in favour of a traffic which was dangerous to the public safety. He desired to see the clause passed, because he recognized the great principle which the noble Lord at the head of the Government had recommended to the country. He could not understand how the Government could abandon a clause which its own Head had put before the country distinctly as a separate question. He should have thought it an insult to the Head of the Conservative Party to withdraw this clause from the Bill, seeing that the noble Lord had advocated this principle on more than one occasion. He (Mr. Cosham) advocated the cause, not because he desired to see a Party triumph secured, but he advocated it on its own merits, because he believed it would work a vast amount of good. He desired to add his appeal to that of the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) to the Government to reconsider the position. He could assure them that if they would give the country this clause, they would lay the whole community under a great obligation to them. They would be putting a check upon the tendency of the present licensing arrangements to demoralize the people, and the people would be proportionately grateful. Let them, in connection with this Local Government Bill, by all means retain one of its most important sections—namely, the clause which would put power into the hands of the people to control this drink traffic on Sundays. He should like to see it go farther, and give them not only Sunday closing, but closing on election days, and even the day after elections, if possible, as he believed in that way the interests of the public would be served and elections would be rendered much purer than at present. He appealed to the Government not to withdraw the clause.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) (who rose amidst cries of "Divide! Divide!") said, that when he read a telegram which he had received from one of his political opponents, hon. Gentlemen who cried "Divide!" would see he had some reason for desiring to speak. This was the telegram to which he had referred, and which he had cherished so closely that it had come to pieces. It was from a gentleman connected with the Cornwall Sunday Closing Association, and it was in these words—

"The Cornwall Sunday Closing Association Executive Committee. At a meeting now being held, urge your utmost efforts to get the 9th clause retained."

Now, that mandate, which was only a few days old—not two years old, like that of the Government and the Unionists—had come to him, as he had said, from one of his political opponents in the division he had the honour to represent. That telegram, in conjunction with the fact that all his supporters were heartily with him on this question, entitled him, he thought, to say that his constituents were unanimous in favour of the retention of this clause, and he should be as false to his duty as those hon. Gentlemen who called themselves Liberal Unionists, but whom he called dissentients and violators of their principles, who now supported the Government in their proposal to abandon the clause, if he did not lift up his voice in support of an opposite course. He had noticed that throughout the passage of this measure the Government had been whittling away everything that was good in it, and that as there was very little of that commodity at the commencement, there was now very little left except what was bad. He would, with the permission of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, answer the interruption which had occurred a short time ago, and ask him whether he still adhered, in the face of the quotations which he (Mr. Conybeare) would make from his speech, to what he had said just now? When the right hon. Gentleman had heard these quotations, he (Mr. Conybeare) would not trouble himself to refer further to the right hon. Gentleman's speeches, and he would, therefore, be at liberty to go to his dinner with a clear conscience. It was true, as the right hon. Gentleman had said just now in answer to an hon. Member, that he had used this argument—

"It might be said, with some justice, that the publicans would undoubtedly be under a portion of the clause in a much more secure and favourable position than they occupied at present."

The right hon. Gentleman asked them to believe that he was merely dealing with this argument, and that he did not in express terms admit that he was putting the publicans in a more secure position.

MR. RITCHIE said, he begged pardon. He had said that the publicans would be placed in a better position.

MR. CONYBEARE said, then he did not see the object of the right hon. Gentleman's previous interruption. It had been laid to the charge of the right hon. Gentleman that he was confessedly placing the publicans in a better position, and that he knew it, and he understood the right hon. Gentleman's previous interruption to mean that he disputed that assertion. He had gone on to say, after he had put an argument as he supposed others would put it—

"We say to the trade we recognize your claim to compensation, and we give you practically a vested interest by the Bill." The hon. and learned Solicitor General would perhaps no longer adhere to the opinion that publicans had a vested interest in their business. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had said, "We give you practically a vested interest by the Bill, and we think that in consideration of placing you on so much more secure a footing than you at present occupy, we may fairly ask you to pay something more than you do at present for your licence." That appeared to him (Mr. Conybeare) a sentiment so straightforward, ingenious, and positive that he could not understand the right hon. Gentleman making any attempt now to explain it away. As he had said before, he (Mr. Conybeare) had understood, and he believed other hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House understood the right hon. Gentleman's interruption to mean that he did not express that sentiment in, at any rate, so positive a manner. But there was only one interpretation to be put upon that sentence. However, he (Mr. Conybeare) would not press that point further. He was more interested for the moment in dealing with some of those statements made by the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), who seemed, with all his taunting of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), to be taking everybody and everybody else's interests under his own special patronage, and to think that no one had a right to speak on the Temperance Question but himself. The hon. Gentleman seemed to assume in the most patronising way imaginable the presidency and leadership of every Local Option organization and Temperance society, federation, or association in the country. He came down to the House, and in a most grandiloquent way, surveying the Empire from China to Peru, assured the House that he only was entitled to speak on behalf of the Temperance cause, when, as a matter of fact, whether they looked at Land's End in the South, or went North to John o' Groat's House, there was no Temperance association in the country which had not expressed itself in favour of the retention of this Sunday closing clause. If the hon. Member for Barrow supposed that the people of Cornwall were not in favour of the retention of the clause, he knew as much about their opinion as he did, when, some time ago, he went down to try to get a Dissident Liberal returned in the county. There were some Members of the House who were black sheep in the Cornish fold. There was the hon. Member for the Truro Division (Mr.

W. B. Smith), who possessed few friends, either among Tories or Liberals, and he challenged the hon. Gentleman to say whether he proposed, either by his voice or his vote, to try the sentiments of his constituents, or to support his allies on those Benches in their attempt further to emasculate the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman ventured to vote for the exclusion of the clause, it would, he thought, take a great deal more than his eloquence to persuade his constituents to return him at the next election. Then there was the hon. Member for the Western Division of the county (Mr. Bolitho), who had declared himself very strongly against the Compensation Clauses. What he had said in particular with reference to the 9th clause he did not recollect; but he trusted he would state in the name of his Cornish constituents whether they wished the clause to be retained or not. He ventured to think the hon. Member would, to use a Cornish phrase, find himself in a very tight place if he did not speak in favour of the clause. One would have thought on an occasion like the present that the Tory Member representing one of the most temperate and sober counties in the country, and being specially commended—the Members for Penrhyn (Mr. C. W. G. Cavendish Bentinck) and Plymouth (Sir Edward Clarke and Sir Edward Bates)—would have taken sufficient interest in this important clause, which was regarded in Cornwall as more important than all the rest of the Bill together, to come down and see that the interests of their several constituencies were safeguarded by the retention of the clause. The Cornwall Sunday Closing Bill had been before the House before and since he had the honour of a seat in it, and it had only been prevented from becoming law by systematic obstruction. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North-East Manchester (Sir James Fergusson) had spoken on this matter, and had explained that the want of time amply justified the Government in throwing over the Licensing Clauses. That was a fallacious argument; want of time might have justified them in that particular, but this clause had nothing whatever to do with the licensing scheme of the Government. Moreover, it was ridiculous for the Government to take up that position, because they had entered into a contract with Members on that side of the House that if they would support them they should have a whole day for the discussion of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson)—that was to say, they allotted a day of the Session to be used on a Bill which they had not the slightest intention of pressing forward. When the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was asked the other day whether the Government intended to allow the Imperial Sunday Closure measure to go beyond the second reading, he said that he did not intend to do anything of the kind. They knew then that the whole thing was one of those little comedies which the Government were in the habit of getting up for the entertainment of light-minded people throughout the country, and that they had no intention of assisting the progress of the Bill if it was read the second time, or of advising their Friends in the Upper House to have anything to do with it. The hon. Member for Barrow, in the most candid manner, had said that the Bill was to be passed with his assistance; but he and his hon. Friends were not content with that—they intended to fight for the clause, and for the Imperial measure as well. They were not going to give up their first line of defence, and fall back on their second, until they were compelled to do so. If it were true that the Temperance Societies throughout the country had expressed themselves, as a whole, ready to give up the clause, he could only say that every one of them had been false to their principles. He would ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for North-East Manchester what the Church of England Temperance Society was going to do in this matter? They professed, as an association, to be in favour of Temperance principles; but when an election came, what did they do? How many parsons in the Isle of Thanet were going to vote for Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, and how many of them were allied with the publican interest? If the right hon. Baronet were sincere and his Friends were the same, they would not merely support the Temperance Party on every occasion at the polls, but they would make use of the pulpits open to them to declaim and preach more than they did against the evils of intemperance. The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) was, at any rate, honest in his convictions and the manner in which he carried them out; and upon this matter of temperance he (Mr. Conybeare) always listened to him with the greatest respect. He had told the Committee that he was going to give his hearty support to the Government; but he would ask the hon. Member if he were prepared, in consideration of giving that support, to do what his Temperance principles should insist upon his doing—namely, to urge upon his Leader to carry forward the Imperial measure for Sunday closing which was to come from that side of the House? That, he thought, was the least the hon. Member could do under the circumstances. Then the hon. Baronet the Member for South Northampton (Sir Rainald Knightley) had advanced the argument that it would be cowardly to shift the burden of this question on the new County Councils. He (Mr. Conybeare) confessed that it had been his opinion that the County Councils should do something for the benefit of the people, and they were now told that they were to do nothing of the sort; but he would point out to the hon. Baronet that there was nothing cowardly at all about the proposal. The hon. Baronet was an advocate of the principle of Local Option, which meant that the locality should have the responsibility of deciding for themselves on the question, and it meant, consequently, that the County Councils should have the question to decide however difficult and thorny it might be. The Committee were now discussing a clause which provided that the elected representatives of the people should have the decision of these matters, and he was content that it should rest there; he was quite content that the County Councils should, in the first place, have the power of Sunday closing, and have afterwards the power of putting in force the general veto or disestablishment of public-houses in whatever form or by whatever methods they might choose to adopt. He would like to put forward a very pertinent argument. In one part of the Metropolis—and, he believed, in other parts of the country—as he had evidence to show, poor children were sent on Sundays to public-houses to get liquor for their parents, and paid or rewarded by the publicans with sweetmeats and other presents for bringing custom to their doors. That was a most scandalous state of things, and he advanced it as a strong argument for striking a blow at once at this nefarious system, which was so disgraceful that it ought to induce every honest man to vote for the retention of the clause. If the clause was passed, there was nothing whatever to prevent hon. Members on that side passing into law the measure which was to be discussed at a later day as the Government desired. They were so honest in their efforts to stay the corruption and demoralization of the people through drinking habits, that they were anxious to pass a double measure of security—that was to say, to pass the clause, and follow it by something more general or universal. Some hon. Members had pointed out what was not quite accurate—namely, that the clause was part and parcel of the whole scheme of licensing; but he had shown that that was not so. If the clause were so essentially a part of the whole Government licensing scheme which included the question of compensation, he asked the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) if he was going to introduce into the measure of the hon. Member for South Shields a clause giving compensation to publicans? Again, how was it, on the same principle, that the clause had not been introduced into the Irish, Welsh, and Scotch Sunday Closing Acts? Looking either to the past or the future, it would be ridiculous to suppose, on the one hand, that the hon. Member's Bill could pass with any Compensation Clause; and, on the other hand, experience had shown that there was no foundation whatever for considering the Compensation Clause in any way part and parcel of a Bill connected with Sunday closing. The only other argument they had heard against the clause was that excitement which the question of Sunday closing would cause at the poll. The Government were always asserting their trust in the people; but directly they were asked to put the settlement of this matter into the hands of Bodies elected by the people, they said it would produce too much turmoil at the elections. That seemed to prove that the supporters of the Government, the country squires, did not expect much success if they had to run against the popular vote on the County Councils. His excuse for detaining the Committee at such length was that all the Members for his county had disappeared from the Committee, and he had been obliged to roll all their speeches into one. He could not be accused of wasting time. It was the Government who were doing that—the Government which set up that ancient image of respectable mediocrity, who always found it his duty to save every precious second of the time of the House. It was the Conservative Party which wasted more time than hon. Members on that side ever took up in discussing the question. It was the bungling method of conducting their Business on the part of the Government which had necessitated their speaking at some length that night on this important question; it was their fault that he and his hon. Friends had to travel over the same ground, whenever the time came for the Government to carry out its contracts with their Dissident allies in that House; and on those two grounds he hoped he should not be unfairly treated by being accused of unduly taking up the time of the Committee.

CAPTAIN EDWARDS-HEATHCOTE (Staffordshire, N.W.) said, that as on this occasion he was unable to support those with whom he usually voted, he desired shortly to state the reasons why he was unable to do so. He quite admitted the difficulties of the Government and the shortness of the time at their disposal for disposing of such a measure of Local Government reform as the present; but he did not think they had fairly made out their case for treating this clause and Clause 10 as Siamese twins, the death of one of whom involved the death of the other. It seemed to him that there was no reasonable connection between Sunday closing and what were commonly called the Compensation Clauses. Sunday closing in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland had been carried out without any recognition of the principle of compensation, and he was not surprised that there should have been no such recognition, because it would surely be as absurd to compensate a publican for shutting up his house on Sundays as it would be to compensate a butcher who was compelled to shut up his shop on Sundays. It would be indeed difficult to maintain that, although it might be beneficial to the health and morals of the people that they should be able to buy beer on Sunday, it would certainly be most injurious that they should buy beef on that day. He wished to see real Local Option; but hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to be in favour of giving Local Option in all localities where they were certain that the majority was in favour of Sunday closing and trust to Imperial Sunday closing to shut up public-houses in localities which were opposed to it. He wanted the option to be real—that was to say, he wanted the localities to be enabled to decide whether or not the public-houses should be closed on Sundays. He also wanted the County Councils to be able to change their minds, and have absolute freedom to reverse the decision at which they might arrive in the event of it being found unsuited to the wants of the localities. He thought that Imperial Sunday closing all round would be very objectionable; because it would treat all places alike. The circumstances, wants, and wishes of the inhabitants of localities differed very widely, and it was a very different thing to shut up a small public-house in the moorlands, where a Sunday customer was almost a phenomenon, and to shut up one in a village close to a town which might be considered as the Sunday lungs for a town population. In one case, he would consider the application of the principle desirable, and in the other very undesirable. These were not new views. He had been somewhat freely criticized for having, in his election address in 1885, stated that he was in favour of the establishment of County Boards, to which the interests of the different localities might safely be entrusted, including all matters relating to Sunday closing, Local Option, and the sale of intoxicating liquors. He was sorry that the whole of this was not in the clause under discussion; but he accepted it as at least a large instalment; and, therefore, although he regretted not to find himself in accord with those with whom he usually acted, he should, without the slightest hesitation, vote with the right hon. Gentleman for the retention of Clause 9.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, the remarkable phenomenon in this debate was that if the clause were lost, it would be through the action of those professing to be Temperance Reformers. It.

would be a most extraordinary thing, and one which the country would undoubtedly take note of. There had been since the introduction of the Bill delay after delay in order that the proposals of the Government to abandon their own suggestions might be discussed. There had been four important occasions on which the Government had marshalled all their Supporters for the purpose of voting for clauses, and they were afterwards told that they must vote for these clauses being expunged; and that was the position they were in that evening with respect to the Sunday Closing Clause, which he presumed was brought in after consideration, and after the Government had discussed it with their friends. It was one of the things which made hon. Members on that side look at the Bill with some amount of respect and esteem, and they thought that the County Councils were the proper Bodies to deal with the question. It was a clause of the Government which they had asked their Supporters to support, and now they were striking it out of the Bill. The hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) had talked about Imperial Sunday closing; but he must be aware that that was a very different thing to adopt as compared with Sunday closing by County Councils. The County Councils, it should be remembered, dealt with different classes of opinion. Having had the privilege of sitting for London, he could say that it would be perfectly impossible to vote for Sunday closing for London, because it would be contrary to the habits and wishes of the vast majority of the people. But it would be quite a different thing to have Sunday closing for Cornwall and Durham. Men who told them they had devoted their lives to the promotion of temperance were about to adopt the proposals of the Government, and to give up the clause which they admitted they could pass, so that the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. J. C. Stevenson) might be discussed. Did anyone suppose that the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) would support that Bill? No. When the clause was struck out, and the Bill came forward, the Government would simply put it on the floor of the House and trample upon it. Then he said that the loss of the clause, which meant the loss of Sunday closing through the life of the present Parliament, would be due to Temperance men entirely, and they would have to square that matter with their constituents. The position of those who were in favour of the clause was that they had to stand up night after night to defend some excellent proposal of the Government, and the result of whose action would be that, in the end, there would be nothing left in the Bill worth defence. At present, there was something in it to strive for; but the Government were taking it away bit by bit, and putting Members on that side in a most anomalous position; they had come down to support the clause, but the time might come when they would be obliged to kick out the Bill itself. They had defended the Government proposal as well as they could, and yet the clause was to be struck out. But it was necessary that the country should understand that the men responsible for this were those who had suggested to the country that they were in some way interested in the promotion of temperance.

Mr. HOWORTH (Salford) said, he would endeavour to limit the remarks he had to make to a rather narrow issue, and one which he thought was rather more germane to the discussion than a great deal of what they had heard in the House that night. They were not there to discuss whether Sunday closing was a good thing or a bad thing. That was a very large question, about which most of them had formed an opinion. They were there to discuss a very much narrower issue—namely, whether it be wise or unwise to load the first elections for these County Councils, which would be the most important and most critical experiment that had ever been made in revolutionizing local England, and its institutions, with a polemic which was sure to imperil the existence, the status, and the future of these Councils. It seemed that that was the question which was at issue that night, and he thought an example of the rancour and bitterness which this polemic would raise was afforded in the discussion only a few moments ago. If they could, with a light heart, take that as an example of what they would like to see imported into every hamlet and every village in England, before they sent these new County Councils on their way, he conceived that they must have a very fertile hope if they expected very much from the new Councils. It was contended that the Government had conceded the fact that it was wise and right that the County Councils should deal with the question of Sunday closing by inserting this clause in the Bill. The answer seemed to him to be both plain and clear. The Government, when they had to face the reorganization of these local County institutions, had, no doubt, before them the problem of trying to solve, if possible, by some rational and fair means, this great drink question which had been a terror to all hon. Members upon every platform and had pursued them in every election. [Opposition ironical cheers.] The hon. Members might cheer; but the shoe had not only pinched hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, but had also pinched hon. Members on the other side of the House. In private conversations he had not met with one responsible man in the House who did not express the great hope and wish that this interminable question, which was a perpetual torment to them, should be solved by a measure which should have an element of finality about it. The Government did introduce in their Bill a number of clauses which they hoped would have been accepted as more or less a final and complete settlement of the question. Instead of being accepted as a final and complete settlement of the question those clauses had been repudiated as a settlement of it by one of the great Parties to the issue. Now, that being the case, the conditions were entirely altered. So long as the Clauses were accepted as a solution, it was pretty fair and rational that they should entrust the Local Bodies with the mere administrative duty of carrying them out, because the polemic would have come to an end. But so long as the question remained an open question they were merely acting a cowardly part in removing it from this floor, where they had a wide public opinion, and where they could have the question debated on a wide platform, to the small bodies which were under influences which were anything but generous and wide, and the election of which would be the occasion of quarrelling. They, who represented the larger towns in the North of England, and had had some experience of municipal institutions, had been told sometimes that it was not their place to take an interest in the discussion of this Bill, which provided for the application of the same municipal institutions to rural England. It was because they had seen these institutions working in the way they had seen them working in the communities in the North, where they had a great deal of active and a great deal of commonable public life, that they did not want to see the experiment, when it was tried in the counties, wrecked by what they knew and felt from their experiences would inevitably wreck them—namely, the importation into them of discussions upon questions which would inevitably degrade them. As it was they had at the present time the greatest difficulty in finding men who would contest the municipalities, and whom they felt to be men of judgment and men of capacity and men of position. Such men found the position exceedingly irksome—increasingly irksome—on account of the introduction of political questions which had little to do with real local life. And yet when they were going to introduce an experiment into an entirely unknown country and going to begin anew, as it were, with our country life, it was proposed by some hon. Members to tie round the necks of the new institutions a most perilous load which they could not possibly bear. There was no question which divided people so much in a great many of the northern counties as the question of drink, and he felt, speaking as an urban Member, the greatest possible dread that in many of our towns where the Corporations had not been composed always of the very best men, such as they liked to see on Corporations, the representative Bodies would be still further degraded, and perhaps there would be still further difficulty in finding suitable men to take office if these questions were entrusted to them. But if this was so in towns it would be still more so in country districts. Surely all hon. Members were wishful, that if possible, the best men in the country should take their seats on these County Councils. They wanted, if possible, to have men with the greatest stake and the greatest experience and the greatest knowledge of affairs to take their seats on these County Councils. But many of these men, who were old men, who were men who had plenty of money and occupation elsewhere, would not be tempted to enter the arena, if that arena were made the place where fights were to take place, not upon local affairs, not as to the way to manage roads and prisons, or as to the way to do a great deal of the work which was now done by the Local Government Board, but upon the question of the drink traffic. This was the reason why he ventured to put down Amendments, the effect of which would be that the whole of the Licensing Clauses would be struck out en bloc. The more he thought of this question the more he thought that these considerations ought to have very great weight indeed with the Committee when it determined whether or not the drink question should be made one of the test questions at all the elections for the County Councils. He thanked the Committee for the patience with which they had listened to him. He felt that in stating what he had stated he had tried to bring the Committee back from those questions which were a long way from the issues before them. The real issue was whether the new County Councils should have the duty of deciding whether there should be Sunday Closing or not. Personally, he thought they would do the County Councils very great injury indeed if they imported into the elections of those bodies, not only an irrelevant, but a pernicious polemic.

MR LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) had stated that they were not there to discuss Sunday closing. He (Mr. Labouchere) perfectly understood that hon. Gentlemen on the other side were exceedingly anxious not to discuss Sunday closing; but they, on the Opposition Benches, were there to discuss Sunday closing. They were anxious there should be Sunday closing, and they thought they found it in this clause. For that reason they were in favour of the clause. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Howorth) had trotted out the old Tory argument of a complete settlement of the question. They had heard that argument usque ad nauseam. Hon. Gentlemen opposite professed to be anxious for reform; but if the measure was a small one, they said they would not vote for it because it was small; but if it was large, they said they would not vote for it because it was not small. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford said he was anxious that the County Councils should not be degraded by discussions on the liquor question. Mr. Howorth: Hear, hear! The hon. Member cried "Hear, hear!" but when were the questions to be discussed? Were they to be discussed in the House of Commons? Was the House of Commons to be degraded? [An hon. GENTLEMAN: Hear, hear!] Oh, it was. He confessed that if there was to be a degradation, if a subject must be discussed, and the discussion would degrade the Assembly, he should prefer that the County Councils, with all respect to the County Councils, should be degraded, rather than that the Imperial Parliament should be degraded. The hon. Member said they wished the best men to find their way into the County Councils. No; they did not. They wanted the best men in the House of Commons, and, therefore, if they had to choose between a course which would prevent good men coming to one or the other, let them take care that they come to the House of Commons. Now, let them look at the position of affairs at present. He thought it was very desirable that this discussion should not be too short, because hon. Members opposite were so exceedingly fond of puffing themselves on all occasions throughout the country, that it was well that, when they had them in the House, they should take the liberty of pointing out to them, and to the country, their short-comings, which were certainly very numerous. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board brought in this Bill in a very able speech, and with a great flourish of trumpets. It was a perfect Bill. It was a Bill which was to treat with everything, and if the right hon. Gentleman was proud of one particular thing in his Bill, he was proud of the liquor clauses which it contained. The Bill was read a second time; and on that occasion, if he remembered aright, the right hon. Gentleman made a very able speech, and again boasted of his liquor clauses. Withdraw them, not he. They would stand or fall by the liquor clauses. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, he would certainly have fallen if he had stood by them. The House agreed to read the Bill a second time with the liquor clauses in it. They were now asked to say that the liquor clauses were so bad that they ought to be withdrawn, and by whom were they asked to do that? By the modest right hon. Gentleman himself. He perfectly understood that the right hon. Gentleman's Followers would accept what he said; they seemed quite ready, at the bidding of any Member of the Government, to vote on one day that black was white, and to vote on another day that white was black. But hon. Members on the Opposition Benches had some respect for the dignity of the House, and they did not approve of agreeing to a proposition one day and then voting against it the next day at the bidding or requisition of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman gave several reasons for withdrawing these clauses. He might have saved himself that trouble, for there was one reason which obliged him to withdraw his Compensation Clause upon which he dwelt so much. It was an excellent reason; it was that he could not pass it. The country had had time to understand what the clause was, and Her Majesty's Government ran away because they feared defeat. If the right hon. Gentleman had told them that, he might have saved them the rest of the reasons. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that the clause must follow the rest of the Licensing Clauses, but this clause had absolutely nothing to do with the others. If it had been proposed that compensation was to be given in cases of Sunday closing, one clause possibly would have hung upon the other; but the Sunday closing was to take place without any compensation. Compensation was only to be given in the event of a public-house being deprived of its licence entirely. The two clauses were absolutely separate. He quite understood that the right hon. Gentleman did not accept that view. In the view of the right hon. Gentleman the one clause was a sort of quid pro quo for the other. The right hon. Gentleman wished to give the licensed victuallers a huge bribe. Licensed victuallers had at present a one year's licence; but the right hon. Gentleman wanted to give them a vested perpetual interest in their licences, and then to present them, at the expense of the ratepayers, with something like £200,000,000 or £300,000,000 for taking away what was given to them. [Cries of "No, no!"] The figures had been supplied by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine). This might be a good argument, or it might be a bad argument; but it was one the right hon. Gentleman himself would hardly use, because his assertion always was that he gave the licensed victuallers nothing, but left them, so far as the law was concerned, precisely as they were at present. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman could not plead that he could not agree to Sunday closing, because the licensed victuallers were not to have a quid pro quo. It had been asserted by the hon. Member for Barrow that the Temperance people objected to this clause because they wanted Imperial closure. They objected to the clause in the sense that they would rather have Imperial closure, but they did not know that they could get it, and therefore they were willing to accept this clause. The hon. Gentleman set himself up as a Temperance leader, but the hon. Gentleman would excuse him (Mr. Labouchere) if he expressed the belief that the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker-mouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) represented far better the views of the Temperance people than the hon. Gentleman did. They had it from the hon. Baronet that the Temperance people wished that this clause should pass. [Sir WILFRID LAWSON: I did not say all.] Well, the majority of them. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine) professed to have great influence over the Temperance people. The hon. Member for Barrow had been deluding them; he had been telling them that a Bill for general Sunday closing would pass. Well, if they were told that, as the people were in favour of Sunday closing all over the country, they would prefer that that Bill should pass, but the hon. Gentleman had been an entirely false guide to the people, and they must therefore take in at one ear and let out at the other whatever the hon. Gentleman said. The hon. Member for Barrow had quoted as one instance of the feeling of the temperance people what the Church of England Temperance Society thought upon the matter. He (Mr. Labouchere) thought he was right in saying that according to the hon. Gentleman the Church of England Temperance Society was against this clause. Well, when the hon. Gentleman had mentioned the Church of England Temperance Society he (Mr. Labouchere) was one of those Members who raised the hon. Member's indignation by crying "Oh, oh!" That was an Oh, oh! of depreciation of this Church of England Temperance Society, because it appeared to him that they were people who were ready to say anything about different things at any moment. He held in his hand a Bill which had been extensively posted up in Ramsgate and Margate, signed by two clergymen of Ramsgate, who were members of this Society. These gentlemen seemed to disagree entirely with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow, for what did they say? They were entirely in favour of this clause, and what was more they were in favour of compensation—this remarkable Temperance Society. These two rev. gentlemen said—

"The only comprehensive scheme for effectually dealing with the temperance question has been that proposed by the present Government in the licensing clauses of their Local Government Bill which Mr. Chamberlain described as a generous measure of reform which ought to be welcomed by the Temperance Party."

It seemed to him (Mr. Labouchere) that though the right hon. Gentleman might have described the measure in that way to the Temperance Party, it had met with the usual fate of these measures which the right hon. Gentleman has described as generous and good measures. The Temperance Society that the hon. Member for Barrow had quoted went on to say in this poster, to which he referred—

"After a careful inquiry we have satisfied ourselves that the views of"— who did the House think?—

"The Right Hon. Mr. James Lowther were in hearty accord with the provisions of that Bill as modified by the suggestions of the most thoughtful of the Temperance Leaders."

They went on to say—and he must allude to this to show how this Church of England Temperance Society perverted and distorted the truth—

"Should Mr. Gladstone return to power, the Irish Question will occupy the field; and, even if this were not so, the Parnellites would never allow him to introduce temperance legislation."

["Hear, hear!"] "Hear, hear!" said hon. Gentlemen. Well, he must point out this—that the majority of the Irish Parnellite Party—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must say I am afraid the hon. Member is straying very far from the subject before the Committee.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he would only add that it would be seen by the Votes whether or not the Parnellite Party were against temperance legislation; and he would now leave those two rev. gentlemen alone, having shown the Committee, he thought, that this remarkable society that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow had taken under his protection, as representative of temperance people, was not to be believed, when their leading authorities—rev. gentlemen of the Church of England—made assertions such as those he had quoted. The fact was that, in this matter, the Government wanted to give a great reward to the publicans. No doubt they did, and in a certain sense they were right in doing so. The publicans supported them, and they naturally supported the publicans. But now they wanted to persuade the House, though in giving this reward they were giving a bona fide reward, that they were giving them nothing. But they were detected, and they now desired to give a similar reward, saying—"We will save you from the chance of being deprived of the right of selling liquor on a Sunday." The Committee had a right to know what was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board as to whether there ought to be an Imperial Bill, or whether there ought to be a local measure dealing with the question of Sunday closing. He had come forward originally in favour of a local measure, but he now withdrew it, and one of the conditions of the withdrawal was that the Government would give a day for discussing an Imperial measure. Was the right hon. Gentleman of the same opinion as his chief, Lord Salisbury? Was the right hon. Gentleman opposed to this Imperial Bill? If he was, he did not give up his own views for the purpose of supporting what was opposed to them. They might fairly suppose that he simply gave a day in order to have the power and opportunity of voting against the Imperial Sunday Closing Bill. Was that the case, or was it not? He (Mr. Labouchere) was very particular in using

Mr. Labouchere

Parliamentary phrases, and he did not know whether the word "tricky" was Parliamentary; and, therefore, he would not use it in conjunction with this transaction. The great supporters of the Tory Party were the parsons and the pot-house keepers. The Tories were always afraid of doing anything against them when either the parsons alone, or the pot-house keepers alone, put down their foot. When these sections of the community put down their foot, right hon. Gentlemen opposite did not do anything—they were afraid to move, knowing perfectly well that if they did, they would lose their elections. It was all very well to talk of the policy and statesmanship of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Ministerial Bench, when, as a matter of fact, their policy and their statesmanship were merely electioneering tactics. He did not blame them—people, after all, did look after votes in this world—but it was a melancholy and discreditable thing that they should have a Government ready to turn round and round at the bidding of parsons and pot-house keepers. What was the equivalent the Government told them they were to expect? Why, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had pointed out that it was absolutely nothing. To tell them that they were to be given in lieu of this clause the possibility of discussing the second reading of a Bill in August was to offer them nothing. The right hon. Gentleman did not even tell them whether facilities would be afforded for the passing of the promised Bill next Session. They did not expect it to be a Government measure, but if there was to be any fair quid pro quo, and the simplicity of the hon. Member for Barrow was not being played with by the Government, the Government ought to give him an assurance that this year, or, at any rate, next year, they would give an opportunity for the carrying through in all its stages of this Sunday Closing Bill for the whole country. This equivalent was all the more suspicious seeing the circumstances under which it was offered. There was a meeting of Liberal Unionists the other day, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), as he (Mr. Labouchere) gathered from the newspapers—in that report which had come out after the noble Marquess had told his Followers that it would be disgraceful and shameful for anyone to say anything as to what happened—it was said that the noble Marquess called upon them all to vote against this clause; to rally to the Government as part and parcel of their duties and obligations of honour. Then some of these Unionist Gentlemen got up, and what did they want? They were quite ready to obey the noble Lord, but they wanted some sort of salve for what they were pleased to call their consciences. They had easy consciences, and were satisfied with this very easy and absurd salve administered to them. Did the hon. Member for Barrow hope to deceive the Committee? He did not believe that the hon. Member had deceived himself, nor had the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), who had gone down to Ramsgate in the hopes of finding some further electors to be humbugged, although he had not been humbugged himself. His (Mr. Labouchere's) right hon. Friend the Member for Derby had said that a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush. Well, so far as he (Mr. Labouchere) was concerned, he did not see two or even one bird in the bush. They had this good, fat temperance bird, they had caught the bird, they had cooked the bird, all they had to do was to carve it and eat, and they were asked to give it up for this will o' the wisp in the wood. Why, they would be most foolish to do it, and, so far as their votes were concerned, they did not intend to do it. Like all apostates, the Member for Barrow went even farther than the Government. He told them that these clauses would be positively injurious to temperance. The publicans, however, do not think so, and Mr. James Lowther did not think so. The publicans were perfectly ready to accept the compensation, and would have stomachied this clause in consideration of it; but now that compensation was struck out, and they were asked to agree to this clause, they joined the hon. Member for Barrow and the hon. Member for South Tyrone in their opposition to it. He should like to ask the hon. Member for Barrow and the Liberal Unionists who acted with him in this matter, one or two questions. Were they in favour of Local Option? They had said again and again that they were; yet if they were logical they would say, "We will not vote for Local Option, because if we did it might be that public-houses would exist in some parts of the country, and most assuredly if the Bill passed there would be no possibility of ending public-houses." The hon. Member for Barrow actually stated, as one reason for voting against the clause, that he could not entrust County Councils with the working of it, because they would not be a fair representation of the county, there being selected members on them. Well, was the hon. Member going to vote against selected members? Were the Liberal Unionists going to be ordered by the noble Marquess not to vote for selected members? Not a bit of it. The hon. Member for Barrow said that he considered the Bill a good Bill, and yet he would vote for the omission of this clause, because it would throw into the hands of the County Councils certain duties which he said they were too bad to perform. Then how was it that the hon. Member had voted for the Sunday closing Bills for Cornwall and Durham? If he entertained the views he seemed to hold now, he ought to have voted against them, for the reason that the more of these Bills that were passed the more difficult it would be to pass a Bill providing for Sunday closing over the whole country. The real fact of the matter was this, these hon. Gentlemen had only discovered that this clause was opposed to the cause of temperance after the Government had found it expedient to throw it over. It was not because they thought that it was against the cause of temperance that they voted against it, but because they were bound not to vote against it. The hon. Member for Barrow should have been more candid. He ought to have admitted that he must necessarily from his position be a hewer of Tory wood and a drawer of Tory water. He had not an independent soul, and he should understand that it was not possible to be at one and the same time an honest Liberal representative and a mere Tory hack. No doubt the hon. Gentleman was at liberty to enjoy his opinion, even if that opinion was that it was better to have a drunken England than a free Ireland. Holding that opinion, the hon. Member was perfectly at liberty to vote as he liked, but when he did that, he was very silly to tell them that he was acting in favour of the temperance cause. He (Mr. Labou-chere) had looked through the numerous Amendments of the hon. Gentleman to the liquor clauses, and he noticed that every other clause was covered with Amendments, there being at the end of each a proposal to eliminate the whole section, and yet the hon. Member, who was so strong against this clause, has not put down a single Amendment to it, nor had he made any proposal to strike it out altogether. Well, he (Mr. Labouchere) did not complain of the hon. Gentleman's views; but what he complained of was the wretched hypocrisy which led Gentlemen to sit on the Liberal side of the House, which led them to talk Liberalism and to swagger about it, and yet which led them to vote in favour of their Friends opposite being in power, and so preventing the Liberals from coming in. It was impossible to be a Liberal and support a Conservative Government, as it was impossible to hunt with the publican hare and run with the Liberal hounds. [Laughter.] Well, they could put it which way they liked; he always wished to oblige hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would recommend these Gentlemen, these temperance Liberal Unionists, to take example by their publican friends, who were far more honest, and who, when they kept a gin palace, did not call it a hall of temperance, and who did not call themselves priests of the temperance cause. He would ask them to take example by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). That right hon. Gentleman understood thoroughly the logic of his position. He (Mr. Labouchere) was glad this discussion had taken place, as it would place clearly before the country on which side the Government were in this controversy. He had no doubt the Government would get a great deal of the publican vote—they had always got it—but he very much doubted whether, with the exception of the hon. Member for Barrow, and these two remarkable Church of England temperance clergymen to whom he had referred, throughout the length and breadth of the land they would get one single vote from any person who was really in favour of temperance. He (Mr. Labouchere) held that this Sunday closing question was essentially a local question—it must in the nature of things be a local question—and he therefore greatly preferred the clause they were now discussing to a general Bill. Hon. Gentlemen knew that there was hardly a London Member who was in favour of Sunday closing—at any rate, if there was one who was prepared to vote for the closing of public-houses on Sunday in London and all over the country, let him come forward and state his opinion. He defied hon. Gentlemen opposite to find one single London Member who was ready to do this. They knew well that in passing this clause they would be passing Sunday closing according to the requirements of each locality, and that in proposing to put before the House a general Bill on the question they were proposing that which the House would never pass. He did hope that the Liberal Party on this occasion would have, he did not say a majority on the Division about to take place, for they never seemed to get majorities now, but he did hope that they would have a sufficient number of persons on their side protesting against the course the Government were pursuing, and he was perfectly convinced that the Division, whatever the result would be, would show the country that the Liberal Party was truly and solidly in favour of temperance, and that the Government and their Allies were as thoroughly opposed to it as the Liberals were in favour of it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth) said, the Committee seemed desirous of closing the discussion, which had now lasted for a very considerable time, and perhaps before the Division took place a few words from that, the Front Ministerial Bench, with regard to the course the debate had taken, might not be inappropriate. It had been a matter of much interest, on the side of the House on which he sat, to note the differences which seemed to exist amongst the ardent temperance reformers who sat in different parts of the Benches opposite. The hon. Member who had just spoken—and who was so anxious for the dignity of the House and the sacred cause of temperance—had denounced the hon. Member for Barrow, and looked down upon him from his own great height of virtue as not being really interested in the temperance cause; and he had also slightly referred to the Church of England Temperance Society, about which he had not taken much trouble to inquire until he had received the poster which he read from Ramsgate. It had been suggested that the Government were anxious to withdraw the clause by way of compensation or by way of bribe to the publican interest, and that, the other clauses having been withdrawn, there was no reason why this also should be withdrawn, except that the Government desired to do something to please the publicans. The fact was, that this clause was put in as one of a number of clauses dealing with a particular subject, and as connected with the other Licensing Clauses, and, naturally, when the others were struck out there ceased to be a reason for retaining this. He was not going to enter into a discussion of the Licensing Clauses. They had practically disappeared, and for one reason he was rather sorry for it. He had looked forward to an opportunity of defending, in discussion, observations which he had made elsewhere, and he should have been tempted to say something about them because he believed the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) had said the other day that he (Sir Edward Clarke) had buried his political reputation in the grave of the Licensing Clauses. He was naturally the person most interested in the dear departed, and would have liked to attend the funeral and make a few valedictory observations on the clauses; but at this moment they were dealing with one clause, and only one. As to this section, there was no sort of agreement between the representatives of the temperance cause as to whether this clause would do good or not. Some of them said it would, holding the opinion that it was desirable to remit the question of Sunday Closing to the Local Bodies appointed to deal with local affairs. He could understand that—he thought there was a great deal in that contention. The circumstances of different localities differed so greatly that the Government had been anxious to give the powers contained in these Licensing Clauses, referring to the liquor traffic, to the Local Bodies, including the settlement of the Sunday Closing question, but that could not be done after the speech of the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), and after the quotations which had been made from the resolutions passed in different parts of the country on this matter. There could be no doubt that a great many temperance organizations believed that if the matter were relegated to Local Bodies there would cease to be any reason or excuse for Parliament addressing itself to the solution of the question. In some parts of the country, no doubt, there would be Sunday closing, but it was equally certain that in other parts of the country there would never be any chance of getting Sunday closing at all. Therefore, it was argued by some temperance reformers and advocates of Sunday closing that it would be better for the cause they had at heart that they should endeavour to get a general Bill passed applicable to the whole country, instead of leaving the matter to be dealt with in separate sections of the country. He was not going to express a definite opinion as to which policy was right, and for the reason that he was himself against entire Sunday closing. He had always said that there was very good reason for curtailing and limiting the hours during which public-houses should be allowed to remain open on Sundays; but he had always protested against the measure for closing public-houses altogether on that day. The question which policy was right was not one in which he took much interest himself; but there was this point to be remembered, and it was an important one. If they had been able to transfer from the floor of the House to the Local Bodies the discussion of the whole question of the conduct of the liquor traffic, and if they had been able to do it with such provisions as to compensation as would have prevented any strong antagonism with regard to the subject, and any great monetary interests being involved in the decisions of the Local Bodies, then it might have been a good thing to do. Parliament would have been relieved of a difficulty which would have been relegated to the Local Bodies; but what would be the case if they were to retain this clause, while striking out all the other Licensing Clauses? Why, the Local Bodies would have a harassing question thrust upon them, and the matter would not be removed from the consideration of Parliament, because they were told by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cocker-mouth Division (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that he desired to retain this clause in order to give the Local Bodies power to close the public-houses on Sunday where the people were in favour of Sunday closing, and that then he and his Friends would come back to the House of Commons asking it to enforce Sunday closing elsewhere. So that the House of Commons would not get rid of the question altogether, and they would find the retention of the clause influencing all local elections. This question would be one of the leading ones as affecting election contests, as at each election a temperance campaign would be carried on, and on the one side there would be a candidate described as a temperance candidate, and on the other they would have a candidate described as a publican's candidate, and the result would be that a large number of men whom it would be desirable to have upon the County Councils would decline to enter into contests which would involve their being ticketed either as a temperance man or as a publican's man. If there had been any prospect of their being able to carry all the Government clauses, it would have been worth while sacrificing time and encountering difficulties of this kind; but as the other clauses were withdrawn, it was not worth while exposing the Councils to all these difficulties for the sake of this one clause. He believed that in years to come the advocates of the temperance cause would have good reason to regret the action they had taken during the last few months in having lost an opportunity of dealing reasonably and fully with this question. Having, however, refused to accept the clauses the Government proposed, and having caused the withdrawal of the greater part of the Local Government scheme as to licensing, there was nothing left but to withdraw the whole of it. As the Local Councils were not to be allowed to have the management of the whole question, at all events it was only right not to trouble them with the difficulties and disadvantages which would arise from burdening them with the carrying out of the powers of this particular clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they had had a very interesting lecture on the policy of the Temperance Party from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, who told them that he was opposed to Sunday closing altogether.

Sir Edward Clarke

SIR EDWARD CLARKE: I gave no opinion upon that policy.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, the hon. and learned Gentleman had given no opinion upon it; he had given opinions enough one would think. The hon. and learned Gentleman had learned a lesson on the subject of giving opinions, and the Committee knew what his opinions were worth. If any person was responsible for having wrecked the provisions of this Bill affecting the temperance question, it was the hon. and learned Solicitor General who had just undertaken to lecture the Committee on the subject. But he (Sir William Harcourt) did not rise to speak again at any length upon this question. He only rose to say that he thought after the very interesting discussion they had had it would be well that they should now come to a decision upon it. There was only one thing he wished to say with reference to the opinion of the Temperance Bodies. He had received a great many communications from them on this subject. Something had been said to-night on the view of the National Temperance Federation of which the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) had said he was the president. Well, after the hon. Member had spoken of that Temperance Federation he (Sir William Harcourt) had received from them a letter, which was meant to be made public, and was dated from 168, Edmund Street, Birmingham, and signed by Joseph Malms for the secretary, representing the views of the federation, and recommending "that we should not press for the withdrawal of Clause 10," but not saying one word on the subject of the withdrawal of Clause 9. Now, as that was the federation of which the hon. Member for Barrow had spoken to-night, and of which he was chairman, and acting entirely in accordance with the opinion so expressed, the hon. Member had put down Notices of Motions to omit from the Bill every one of the other clauses relating to licensing; this Clause 9 was the one clause, and the one clause only, bearing upon the subject upon which he had not put down such a Motion. Now, he (Sir William Harcourt) left the Committee to draw its own conclusion on the matter. In his opinion there was no doubt there was a large proportion of Temperance Bodies who would far rather see a universal compulsory Sunday Closing Bill. That was a proposal which he, in common with others, thought would be a very good thing if they could get it. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, if the opinion of the country was such as to justify it, as it had been in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. He did not believe that the opinion of this country would justify or support such a measure at the present moment. Therefore, he did not think it wise to propose such a measure. That was why he was glad to see the proposal made which would give that power to all parts of the country that were prepared to accept it. That was what Clause 9 proposed to do. He was sorry that this should be regarded as a Party question. He hoped they would not regard it as such, but that each would vote on the Motion as he thought best for the interests of the cause he had at heart.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 213; Noes 275: Majority 62.—(Div. List, No. 180.)

Clause 10 (Transfer to county council of licensing powers as respects intoxicating liquors).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, that the discussion on Clause 9 had been necessarily limited to a very small portion of the whole question, and it had been impossible for the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Mr. Ritchie) to go into the whole case. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had been disposed to rise just before the vote on the last clause was taken, but had been prevented by a mechanical motion on his right. If they had not had from the right hon. Gentleman a speech which he had made in the early part of the evening, the Committee would have been left in doubt as to what was the present mind of the Government as to value and policy of the Licensing Clauses; but the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Government had not changed its opinion as to the value of the transfer from the magistracy to the County Council of the control of the licensing system. As he (Mr. Illingworth) understood the right hon.

Gentleman the substantial reason that he gave was that such feeling and indignation had been raised throughout the country as to produce an effect upon the House which obliged the Government to consent to the withdrawal of the clauses. Well, he (Mr. Illingworth) had already stated that he believed the Government to be under a misapprehension with regard to Clause 9. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House were, he believed, entitled to speak on behalf of the majority of the temperance organizations in the country, and they could say that those organizations did not object to the transfer of the licensing power from the magistrates to the new County Councils. Well, if that were so, the right hon. Gentleman was really in a position to set these clauses upon their feet again. Undoubtedly, if the authority of the Government were exercised upon this point, if they were to declare in the face of the Committee and the country that they had not changed their opinion, but had been mistaken in their interpretation of the opposition to these clauses, and if they were to stand by the clauses, no doubt hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House would rally to their support, and the result would be that the clauses would be carried probably by a larger majority than any other arrangement or provision of the Bill. He would appeal to the Government, and especially to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, not to throw away this opportunity they had of advancing towards a final settlement of this question of licensing throughout the entire country. He did not suppose that, in the contests for the County Councils, this question would give rise to any permanent difficulty. No doubt it would have to be fought out. It had been argued, in objection to the course he was suggesting, that any candidate who presented himself for election upon the County Council would be ticketed either as a temperance supporter or as a supporter of the publicans. Well, he saw nothing to object to, even supposing this difficulty should arise. There were very few Members of the House who were not obliged to go through the same ordeal at every election. They were interviewed by persons connected with temperance associations, and by persons representing the publican interest. They were all ticketed, they were all recognized as favourable to either one side or the other. Well, if that was the experience of a Member of Parliament, he should like to know what objection there was to candidates to the County Councils being asked to undergo the same process? He did not anticipate that the discussion of the question would last any length of time; but he was satisfied that those who wished to see this measure of real substantial benefit to the country, were doing the best thing possible in asking the Government to re-consider their decision as to the withdrawal of those clauses. All they asked was that the Government should stand by their own project, and should not turn their backs upon themselves, and they might rest assured that if they dared to throw over the publican interest, they would find upon their side an overwhelming majority both in the House and in the country. He did not wish to delay the Committee. [Ironical cheers.] If he had originated the proposal which appeared to be delaying the Bill, he could understand those cheers; but when he was supporting a proposal which the Government had deliberately and from the outset set up as an essential part of the Bill, he did not think he was open to the charge hon. Gentlemen wished to convey by their cheers, that he was unduly interfering with the progress of the measure. What he complained of was that the Government was turning its back upon its own proposal, and that they should do this at a moment when the President of the Local Government Board declared that he was of the same opinion as to the value of this proposal as he was at the beginning. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to stand by the Bill as it was introduced.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the hon. Gentleman wanted him to enter upon a discussion of the Licensing Clauses. The Government had announced their intention of asking the Committee to negative those clauses, and he thought it would be unwise, as well as unnecessary, for the Committee to enter upon a discussion which, if it were a full discussion, would certainly belong and might be acrimonious. He had no desire, on the part of the Government, however much he might feel inclined, to enter into a defence of a position which he thought was most indefensible. He would rather, looking to the large and important questions which they had still to discuss, and looking to the position the Government had taken up with reference to these clauses, submit to have these clauses negatived without that full defence which, if circumstances permitted, he would have been glad to lay before the Committee. Many of the points involved in the Licensing Clauses—for example, that of compensation, and others—had been discussed on Clause 9, and, therefore, he felt satisfied he would be acting in accordance with the wish of the Committee if he did not invite them to enter upon a long and acrimonious discussion. Having regard to the large number of important issues which still remained to be discussed, he hoped the Committee would support the Government when they asked that these clauses should be disposed of without the discussion to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bradford invited them.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) said, he rose for the purpose in the main of supporting the appeal which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman. It was, to some extent, a sacrifice on his part to do so, because he should certainly have been favourable to the transfer of the jurisdiction from the magistrates to the County Councils, even supposing they had been able to do nothing else. He should like, in conformity with the principle laid down by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cookermouth Division of Cumberland (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) earlier in the evening, to make progress by means of that transfer. But as that could not be done, he did not wish to waste the time of the Committee by discussing the matter. He was bound to say he had looked forward to this occasion with considerable anxiety. He had looked forward to this occasion as a means of putting an end to the most needless, yet perhaps not inexplicable, correspondence with which he had been persecuted ever since the Bill was introduced, a correspondence all based on a quotation from a speech of his in 1880, when he said he should have been better pleased with the wide and general proposal of his hon. Friend if it had not contained some reference to the idea of equitable compensation. He really desired to put forward in every way the success of the Bill, and he would sacrifice what he had promised in that innumerable correspondence—namely, when a legitimate opportunity presented itself, to make a full statement of his opinions on this question. He would forego the opportunity. He would simply say that his opinions on licensing were not exactly in accordance with those of any of the great Parties in the country, but, such as they were, they had never changed in any way. This question was carefully examined about 1853—35 years ago—and the compensation which he had always looked to was to be understood from the measures he had at various times supported. The Liverpool Bill, about the year 1863, and the plan of Lord Aberdeen, about the year 1871, contained the idea of compensation such as he (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) conceived it. He need not say that that was totally and absolutely different from the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Ritchie's) idea of compensation. He felt, however, that he should be best forwarding the business of the Committee if he limited himself to that statement and forebore to go further into the question. They had all got in view a great public object; they were desirous of securing the affirmation of the principles which they thought of great value, and which were contained in the framework of the present Bill, although, undoubtedly, they could have desired that those principles had been much more fully and comprehensively applied. Under the circumstances, he did not think he would be satisfying the demands of public duty were he to do anything more than to say he thought, all things considered, the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman was a fair appeal. The manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had conducted himself at the various stages of the Bill gave him every title to all the assistance they could fairly give him. He desired to give the right hon. Gentleman assistance, and the best form in which he could render it was to at once resume his seat.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, that perhaps he ought to apologize to the Committee for interposing in the debate, because hitherto he had not been able to take any great part in the consideration of the Bill. When the measure was introduced he was compelled by sickness to be away from the country; he only returned in the month of May. He read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) when he was lying on his back between 2,000 and 3,000 miles from here. He must say he was not astonished at the tone and purport of the speech, coming, as it did, from the right hon. Gentleman; but coming from him as a Member of a Conservative Government, he was rather astonished at it. He accepted with the most implicit confidence the Liberal sentiments which the right hon. Gentleman there expressed, and he thought himself blessed that at last he had met with or heard of a Conservative Minister, an important Conservative Minister, who, on behalf of a Conservative Government, could propose a measure so Liberal, so Radical, so democratic in tone and substance. He determined to support the Bill. He was free to confess that when he came home and read the Bill he was not quite so satisfied with it as he was with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But, still, on the only occasion on which he had interfered in the debates on the Bill, he took the opportunity of rather earning the condemnation of some of his political Friends, and the plaudits, the gratifying plaudits, of hon. Gentlemen opposite, by supporting the proposal of the Government and opposing the ideas of Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House. Now, he did not intend to intervene at any length in the debate that night; but he wished to put to right hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, whom, generally, he was happy to follow, the suggestion that, though they had been beaten on Clause 9, they should not without some protest, the strongest they could make in the House, lose the opportunity of asserting that, in their judgment, whatever might be the newest judgment of the Government, the power of licensing ought no longer to be in the hands of the magistrates, but placed in the hands of the elected representatives of the people. Now, if that involved any large change, or any question of compensation, he should most certainly decline to walk into the Lobby against the Government, and he would tell the Government why. He quite admitted that if any large question of compensation was to be discussed, if any important change was to be made, it ought to be discussed in a Bill as a whole and not as a clause of a Bill. But might he point out to the right hon. Gentleman, who he remembered when he sat on that side of the House developed Liberal tendencies that were rather extraordinary in a Conservative, with which Liberal tendencies he had in some degree succeeded in inoculating his Colleagues—might he point out to him that in Clause 10 no great change was proposed. He wished Gentlemen on that side to look at Clause 10 in itself, without reference to Clauses 11, 12, or the following clauses. Clause 10 in itself proposed a change which the right hon. Gentleman himself thought just and fair, or he would never have proposed it, and a change which they, on the Opposition side of the House, if they were true to their principles, must support. The clause proposed that—

“ All such powers, duties, and liabilities with respect to licensing within the meaning of this Act, &c., &c., which now rest with the justices, shall, in future, be in the possession of the elected council.”

Mark the words, Mr. Chairman, “all such powers.” He saw the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) in his place, and he knew he should have in him a willing adherent to his view, and he hoped a follower into the Lobby. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman held that the justices had at present no unlimited power of refusing licences. No unlimited power? Their power was limited. Well, all Clause 10 proposed, was that the limited powers which according to the hon. and learned Solicitor General now belonged to the Justices, should in future belong to the elected representatives of the people. He did not pretend to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. He thought the powers were unlimited, but he would accept, for the moment, the hon. and learned Solicitor General's proposition. If the hon. and learned Gentleman held that the powers of the Justices were limited, what valid reason could he give why the limited powers the Justices had should not be transferred to the County Councils? He hoped the Committee, in fact, he knew the whole Committee had studied Clause 10 much more than he had, but perhaps they had not done so from the point of view of its relation to the other clauses. He asserted, and he wished the President of the Local Government Board to deny it if he could, that Clause 10 without reference to Clause 11, 12, and the following clauses, amounted to this, and this alone, that all such powers as the magistrates legally had should in future be powers possessed by the elected Council. How could they say for a moment, how could a democratic Conservative Government say for a moment, that that proposition was not a just proposition? He could appeal personally, if he had the opportunity, to half-a-dozen Members of the Front Government Bench, whom he had heard assert these things again and again. He maintained that they believed, as much as he believed, that these powers ought to rest with the elected Councils. If there had been anything extra proposed, if there had been any proposal to extend these powers, he should not have got up to express the opinion that Clause 10 ought to be retained in the Bill; but he held distinctly there was no extra proposal in the clause; that, on the contrary, the clause was limited to conferring upon the County Councils the powers now vested in the magistrates. He stated at the beginning, and he repeated, he advocated no large change, but he should consider himself false to his constituents, and false to the principles upon which he was sent there, if he did not assert upon every occasion and certainly upon an occasion offered to him by a Conservative Government, that a proposal to transfer powers now held by unelected persons to elected persons was a proposal which ought to command the assent of every Liberal and Radical, every Liberal Unionist, and not a small section of Gentlemen opposite, who got into Parliament at the last Election, by proclaiming they were Tory secondly and democratic firstly. If, therefore, his hon. Friend the Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) divided the Committee upon the retention of Clause 10, he should be very glad to follow him into the Lobby.

Clause 11 (Powers of Licensing Committee of County Council as to refusal of renewal of licences).

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Clause 12 (Compulsory refusal of renewal of licence in consequence of report from Justices).

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Clause 13 (Discretionary refusal of renewal of licence subject to compensation).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, this was the clause that provided for the granting of compensation to publicans whose licences were taken away from them, and the Government would find that, at all events on the Opposition side of the House, there was an absolute unanimity of opinion that the clause should be buried. He believed it would be buried never to have a resurrection, and his only object in rising was to pronounce a sort of funeral oration over a proposal to improve the position of an interest which an overwhelming majority of the moral and progressive people of the country thought ought to be weakened rather than strengthened. It must be remembered that the abandonment of the whole of the Licensing Clauses of the Bill was entirely due to the attempt of the Government to give huge compensation to the publicans of this country. The country could look with satisfaction upon the step which the Government had been obliged to take. [Interruption.] If he was not allowed to proceed with the few remarks he had to make, he should have no alternative but to move that Progress be reported. It could not be unfitting that a proposal which had forced the Government to make an entire change in the policy of the Bill should receive some notice at the hands of the Committee. The country would be gratified to know that the agitation against that proposal had been so completely successful. The abandonment of the clause would make the task of dealing with the Licensing Question infinitely easier in the future. The Liberal Party had the satisfaction of knowing that the attempt of the Government to hand over to the publican interest huge sums of money, belonging to all classes of the people, had been completely thwarted. The Government had been obliged to acknowledge itself thoroughly beaten. The minority in that House had come out triumphant. [Ironical Ministerial Cheers.]

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Mr. Courtney, I wish very respectfully, on a point of Order, to call your attention to the continual interruptions of hon. Members opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. ILLINGWORTH to proceed.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he should be very sorry to move to report Progress. It really would conduce to the progress of the Bill to allow him to make a few observations. He was about to say, that whenever the time came for making the measure complete in its character—and it would probably fall to the lot of the Liberal Party to make it worth something to the country—the task would be a comparatively easy one, now that this clause had been abandoned. The Government was afraid to proceed with the clause, and, in consequence, had had to withdraw from the Bill one of its main provisions.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 14 (Power to purchase licence instead of paying compensation).

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Clause 15 (Entire maintenance of main roads by County Council).

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich), in moving an Amendment, in line 7, to insert, after "1878," the words, "including any public footpath by the side of such road," said, that to those who travelled on foot, the highways were as valuable as they were to those who owned vehicles. It had been a matter of great astonishment to him, ever since he had been a Member of a Highway Authority, that those who had the care of the highways had no right to spend any of the public money upon the footpaths. It seemed to him that foot passengers had just as much right to be considered as those who drove, and he thought he should have the sympathy of hon. Members on both sides of the Committee when he asked the Committee to assent to his Amendment, which imposed on the Highway Authority the duty of providing for the footpaths on the sides of the highways.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 7, after "1878," to insert the words, "including any public footpath by the side of such road."—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the Government could not assent to the Amendment, which would throw an enormous additional burden on the County Authorities. The Amendment would apply not only to ordinary footpaths alongside country roads, but also to paved footpaths on either side of main roads in towns. It was perfectly evident that the traffic on such paved footpaths was a local traffic. They were maintained at a much heavier expense than ordinary country roads, and the result of accepting the Amendment would be to throw an enormous additional burden on the county for the maintenance of footpaths with which the county had little concern.

Mr. Brunner said, he would be willing to amend the Amendment, in order to provide for the difficulty which the right hon. Gentleman had referred to.

Mr. Storey (Sunderland) said, he knew of footpaths which were outside the hedges and yet ran parallel with the roadway. Such cases would come within the Amendment. Surely his hon. Friend never intended that footpaths of that kind should be kept up out of the county rate. If he did, he (Mr. Storey) should certainly vote against him. The objection urged against the Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) was a very strong one. He knew a town in the county of Durham which got nothing out of the county rate at the present time for roads, but paid £700 a-year to it, and of another town in the same county which got £700 a-year out of the county rate and did not pay anything like as much. Under the Amendment of his hon. Friend, all the flagged footpaths in both these towns would be paid for out of the county rate.

Colonel Hambro (Dorset, S.) asked the President of the Local Government Board what was to happen in the case of those footpaths which were on the sides of bridges?

Mr. Ritchie replied that those footpaths which were at present maintained by the Highway Authority would still be maintained by them under the Bill.

Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had been quite right in pointing out that the effect of the Amendment would be out of all proportion to what its Mover intended, as it would throw upon the county rates the cost of maintaining all the footpaths alongside main roads in towns. Those footpaths were very properly paid for out of the rates of the towns. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Question put, and negatived.

Sir John Dorington (Gloucester, Tewkesbury), in moving an Amendment, the object of which was to postpone the taking over of the management of main roads by the County Councils until the 1st of April, 1890, said that the County Council could not be elected until after the 14th of January, and could not meet until the 2nd Thursday after the day of election. It had then to select its county aldermen, and it would hardly be able to meet for business until somewhere about the middle of February. Yet on April 1st, it would, under the Bill, have to take over the control of the roads. The time given to the Council to prepare for taking charge of the highways seemed to him to be far too short. It would be necessary to select the proper persons to fill the office of county surveyors; because those at present existing did no more than inspect the roads, and, even if they were entirely in the employment of the county, they had other duties to perform. Certainly, special arrangements would have to be made when they came to manage the whole of the main roads. He understood the view of the Government to be that, under the operation of an Amendment to be moved subsequently by the hon. and gallant Member for the North-West Division of Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), the County Councils would have power to contract with the existing Highway Authorities for the management of the roads. But, even if that were so, the time given them for making the necessary arrangements was far too limited. Much correspondence and negotiation was bound to take place, and he thought that further time ought to be allowed. If the Government would assent to the principle of the Amendment, no doubt some earlier date than he proposed would meet the object he had in view.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 7, after the word "shall," to insert the words "after the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety."—(Sir John Dorington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he was sure that everyone would admit that everything that fell from the hon. Member who had just spoken on the subject of local administration deserved the attention of the Committee. At the same time, he hoped his hon. Friend would allow him to point out that if the Government accepted the Amendment they would be agreeing to a very serious postponement of the exercise of some very considerable powers conferred by the Bill on the County Councils. He really thought his hon. Friend somewhat exaggerated the difficulty which the County Councils would meet with in making the necessary arrangements for the maintenance of the highways. It was the intention of the Government to accept the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), under which power would be conferred on County Councils and District Councils to enter into contracts for the maintenance of main roads. At the present time, the Quarter Sessions had county surveyors, who, although they were not called upon to maintain the roads, were called upon to survey them; and it was only upon the issue of their certificates that the Courts of Quarter Sessions were able to pay the money required for maintenance. The only difference under the present Bill would be that the County Councils would have to make arrangement with the District Councils for the maintenance of the roads, and the surveyors would have power to point out where the local surveyors were in the wrong, and to demand that they should improve the roads in any direction the County Surveyors thought right. The Government were unable to accept the Amendment.

COLONEL HAMBRO said, he should certainly support the Amendment. If the Government would not allow the roads to be managed by the present Highway Authorities, he thought they ought to grant an extension of time.

MR. RITCHIE said, there was one matter which rendered it extremely difficult to accept the Amendment, and that was in connection with the question of finance. At present the Government provided one-fourth of the cost of maintaining highways, and the County Authorities provided one-half. The Government grant was now to be discontinued, and the County Authority was to be placed in such a position that it would bear the whole cost of the maintenance of the roads. It would be extremely difficult to arrange the financial details of the changes proposed by the Bill, if the finance were to come into the hands of the County Authorities in the spring, whilst the roads were not to be taken over until some time afterwards. The Government had no reason to suppose that the time between the election of the Council and the date fixed for taking over the new powers was not sufficient to enable it to make all necessary arrangements.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he thought it would be a wise thing to allow the maintenance of the roads to remain in the hands of those who were at present repairing them, until they could be properly transferred to the County Councils.

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government did not intend to transfer compulsorily the repair of the main roads from the County to the District Councils, but merely to allow the County Councils so to transfer them if they thought fit.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) said, it would be very inconvenient for the County Councils to take upon themselves the management of all the roads within their areas; but the acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would enable them to depute the work to the District Councils, which would be a very convenient method of dealing with the matter. It was obvious, however, that this could not be done at once, if this clause came into operation before the District Councils were elected.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that at present the parish overseers maintained the roads under the supervision of the surveyor, and he wished to know whether it would be in the power of the County Councils to continue that arrangement until the District Councils were elected? If not, he thought it would be found that, in winter, when the roads were worst, there would be no one looking after them.

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government would accept an alteration in the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for the North-West Division of Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), providing that until the District Councils were set up the County Councils might call on the Highway Authorities to maintain the roads.

MR. HALSEY (Herts, Watford) said, he hoped the Government would grant some extension of time.

It being now 12 o'clock, Progress was reported.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES BILL [Lords].—[BILL 290.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick) said, before a day was fixed for the Bill, he wished to make an appeal on behalf of the shipping interest in Glasgow, Liverpool, and other large ports, that an opportunity should be given for giving the Bill a full discussion. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would recognize that the measure was of a character the principle of which could not be fairly allowed to pass sub silentio. It might be good or it might be bad in principle, on that he was not prepared to offer an opinion; but he asked that the Bill might be taken at such a time when full discussion could take place.

Mr. Ritchie

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.) said, when the Bill came on, a few days ago, he said, or attempted to say, to the hon. Member who offered opposition, that if the Bill were allowed to pass its second reading he would undertake that the opportunity should be given for fully discussing it in Committee. The hon. Member would be aware that at that time of the Session, and with the pressing claims of other Business, it was almost impossible to find time in the early hours of a Sitting for the discussion of such a Bill. All he could do now was to propose the Bill be pro forma set down for to-morrow at 2.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) thought the excuse offered was very inadequate. For a long time past the Government had had command of nearly all the time of the House, and they proposed to ask the House for the whole time. If, with such opportunities, they found it impossible to offer fair discussion of a Bill of this important character, it was only another evidence of their incompetence in the management of Business. The principle of the Bill had received no attention, and it would be altogether irregular to attempt a discussion of principle in Committee. He hoped the Government would see their way to accede to the proposal of the Liberal Unionist Whip.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LIFE LEASES CONVERSION BILL.

(Sir Edmund Lechmere, Mr. Hastings, Sir John Puleston, Mr Radcliffe Cooke.)

[BILL 99.] SECOND READING.

SIR EDWARD LECHMERE (Worcestershire, Bewdley) said, his wish had been to pass the second reading of the Bill, but only in order that it might be referred to the Town Holdings Committee. In face, however, of the persistent opposition offered, he saw no prospect of that. The Bill would have been of great benefit to a large number of industrious people, but, with the greatest reluctance, he felt compelled to withdraw it.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Jackson.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, it would be greatly for the convenience of many Members who took a deep interest in the subject to know exactly when Committee on the Criminal Evidence Bill would be resumed. It had been postponed till Monday, but he should be glad to have an assurance as to whether it was really proposed to take it on that day?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) could only say that he was afraid it would not be possible to take the Bill on that day.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD NORTON, in rising to call attention to the urgent necessity of consolidating and amending the enactments relating to reformatory and industrial schools, and to present a Bill, said, that lately, in answer to his noble Friend (Lord Aberdare), the Government promised a Bill before long, embodying the Report of the Royal Commission on Reformatory and Industrial Schools issued four years ago, and that it should be introduced in time to correspond with any treatment of the subject in the Local Government Bill. There was a Bill just now brought up from the other House dealing partially with the subject. He asked for a first reading of the Bill which he introduced in their Lordships' House soon after the Report, which there had been no opportunity of pressing forward. He was anxious that the three Bills should be considered together. The Bill he now introduced claimed to be a consolidation of all existing Acts, which he maintained was most desirable. But it also involved amendments in the law which, to his mind, were quite as desirable. Principally it proposed to place such schools and their teachers and their special inspectorate under the School Department, taking them from the control of the Home Office, and making the punishment of juvenile convicts distinct from their education, which, while under police and magisterial treatment, kept up a criminal character in the children, and hindered their getting the employment they were trained for. Youths convicted of crime should be appropriately and adequately punished, and afterwards disconnected from all criminal associations and educated in reformatory schools as schools. The neglected children who were sent to industrial schools should certainly have no penal or police character connected with their education at all. That was a mischievous folly, and greatly frustrated the object of the State, in loco parentis, sending such children to school. The language of the Acts showed that this was not fully recognized when they were passed, as it was in the Commission's Report. The schooling was made part of the penal sentence, and the assigned term of education which was in the nature of an apprenticeship to a trade was called "a detention in custody." There was really no possible distinction of actual treatment in these schools from that in other national schools, excepting that they were boarding schools and gave an industrial training. But they were damaged by their police character. His Bill enabled any interval between punishment and sending to school to be spent in proper care, and provided that children should never be sent to common gaols. It also facilitated the recovery of payments from parents, and adjusted the at present wasteful Treasury contributions. At the same time, it encouraged philanthropic management and private subscriptions. He hoped that their Lordships would give the Bill a first reading in order that it might be considered with the other Bills.

Lord Norton

Bill to consolidate and amend the enactments relating to Reformatory and Industrial Schools in England and Wales.—Presented (The Lord Norton).

EARL BROWNLOW said, that on the part of the Government he should not offer any opposition to the first reading of the Bill, but at a later stage it would be his duty to point out the great difficulty that would arise in carrying out the idea of the noble Lord of transferring the management of these schools from the Home Office to the Education Department. Of the very strong Commission which was appointed to inquire into the subject, the majority held different views from those of the noble Lord. He understood the noble Lord to propose that the Bill should be read a first time and printed and allowed to lie upon the Table in order that it might be taken with the other Bills dealing with the subject. That being so, he had no wish to oppose the introduction of the Bill.

LORD ABERDARE said, that any opinions of his noble Friend on this subject were, of course, worthy of attention and respect, but he was bound to say that his recommendations were entirely opposed to the views of the other Members of the Commission. His noble Friend entered upon the Royal Commission with his opinions made up, and he did his utmost during the course of a very long inquiry to induce his Colleagues to adopt them—but at the end of the discussion, in spite of the respect they all entertained for his noble Friend, not one single Member of that Commission was, he believed, won over to his side. There was a Bill now before the House dealing with a small fraction of this question, and he hoped that the House would have an opportunity of considering the several Bills together.

LORD NORTON appealed to the noble Lord, as Chairman of the Commission, to say whether the Commission did not recommend that these schools, so far as education was concerned, should be placed under the Education Department; that their separation was of the greatest disadvantage to the teachers; and that, at all events, day industrial schools were wrongly placed in the Home Department.

LORD ABERDARE said, it was quite true that the Commission recommended that the appointment of the masters and the direction of the education should be placed in the hands of the Education Department, but not the general management.

EARL STANHOPE said, that as Chairman of the County Industrial Schools in Kent, he should like to see the recommendation of the Commission carried out as to the Education Department being given the control of education, while discipline and general management were left with the Home Office. It was likely that they would have to establish a sort of special department of the Education Office to deal with industrial schools, as the education given there was of an inferior kind, the children being drawn from the least educated classes.

Bill read 1^a. (No. 194.)

IMPERIAL DEFENCE—ORGANIZATION OF OUR NAVAL AND MILITARY SYSTEM—POSSIBILITY OF INVASION.
RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in rising to move—

“That, having regard to the recent statements of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, of the Adjutant General, and of high naval authorities, as to our defective armaments, and having also regard to the increased armaments of foreign nations on sea and land, this House welcomes the proposal of Her Majesty's Government for an increase of our defensive means, and confidently looks to their forthwith taking such further measures as will give ample security to our Empire and just confidence to the country,” said, pace the Lord Mayor, and—since he made that remarkable speech last Wednesday on the Channel Tunnel—pace our late Protean Premier, he was not ashamed to proclaim himself an alarmist, and to frankly confess that he had been an alarmist for 40 years. For nearly 30 years he had been connected with the Volunteer Force, and what were the Volunteers if they were not alarmists? There were 200,000 of these serving at the present time, and over 1,000,000 who had passed through the ranks, and they had served because the state of the defences of this country was not such as it ought to be. This was because Government after Government had not the courage—and he did not believe would have the courage—to enforce the existing law of compulsory service for home defence, which was the existing law of England in the ballot for the Militia. The existence of the Volunteer Force, however, gave rise to a false sense of security, for the inefficient organization of the Volunteers rendered them a force which could not be trusted alone with the defence of this country. There had been alarmists before now. The first alarmist was the great captain of the age, the Duke of Wellington, and it was he who, in that celebrated letter to General Burgoyne, raised the first note of alarm. Lord Palmerston was the next, and he raised £10,000,000 to put our fortresses and Dockyards into a condition of safety. Who were the alarmists now? Among them there was the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General. Recent speeches delivered by the Illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) and the noble and gallant Viscount (Viscount Wolseley) must be in the recollection of their Lordships. Much was said in disparagement of alarmists and scares, but he was prepared to assert that it was only owing to the scares which periodically occurred that anything was really done in the way of improving our armaments and the defences of this country. The first scare was, no doubt, that caused by the Duke of Wellington's letter in 1847. There was then no Militia and no Volunteers, and only a very small Army. In 1852 the Militia Bill was introduced, which led to the re-establishment and revival of the Militia, and this was undoubtedly due to the letter of the Duke of Wellington a few years before. In 1859 there was the Franco-Italian War, which led to the establishment of the Volunteers. In 1862 there was the Trent affair, which led to the increase of the Army by 35,000 men. In 1870 occurred the Franco-German War, and as the possibility occurred that we might have to maintain the integrity of Belgium, the Government proposed to Parliament to increase the Army by 20,000 men, wherewith to drive out of Belgium whichever of the contending hosts ventured to cross its frontier, and of these 20,000 it took six months to raise 10,000. Following upon this scare, Mr. Cardwell, in 1871, introduced his Army Reform scheme, which was to have put an end for ever to the recurrence of panics. He would not enter into a discussion of that scheme, and would only say that it had certainly not had this effect. In 1878 there was the Russo-Turkish War, which led to an increase in our Army of 50,000 men. In 1882 the war in Egypt led to an increase of 6,700 men to the Army. In 1884-5 we had the question with regard to the Russian frontier of India, when the First Lord of the Admiralty, who brought forward the Estimates, came down to Parliament and asked for £5,000,000 as a supplemental grant for the Navy. In 1886, 9,300 men were added to the Army in India. He did not know whether it would be quite accurate to say that there was a scare just now. Before the speeches of the Illustrious Duke, of the noble Viscount the Adjutant General, and of other distinguished men, the Government, he knew, had been working to improve the military organization, and had done a great deal, but still he hoped that by the force of public opinion they might be induced to do a great deal more. Burke said—

“Early and provident fear is the mother of safety; for in that state of things the mind is firm and collected and the judgment unembarrassed; but when fear and the thing feared come on together and press upon us at once, even deliberation, which at other times saves, becomes our ruin, because it delays decision; and when the peril is instant the decision should be instant too.”

These words ought to be written up over the doors of the War Office and Admiralty. The state of the Navy was now the question of the hour. So many statements and counter-statements were made upon the subject that it was no easy matter for anyone who was not a naval man to arrive at any very definite conclusions. He had, therefore, taken the pains to obtain as good a naval opinion as could be got—the opinion of Sir Spencer Robinson, some time Comptroller of the Navy—and after submitting that opinion to other naval officers he had drawn up a summary of the views expressed by them and Sir Spencer Robinson, and that summary he would lay before their Lordships. First as to our naval administration. On several occasions our system of naval administration had been shown to be a failure. It was shown to be a failure when Lord Northbrook asked for £5,000,000 extra in 1884-5, and when recently £6,000,000 were asked for to provide guns and ammunition and £4,000,000 granted. It was shown to be a failure now when ships which were ready had to wait for their guns till the Spring of 1889, and when guns having come to grief afloat, others were taken from forts already insufficiently armed to supply their places. He sincerely hoped that the Committee of the Cabinet would mend our system of administration both in regard to the Army and Navy. Now he came to consider the Fleet. What was its duty? Not to defend arsenals, fortresses, and commercial ports, but to blockade an enemy's fleets, capture or sink them at sea, protect our commerce, and secure our food supply in war. What were our means of fulfilling this duty as compared with the means possessed by France? Sir Spencer Robinson said—

“No blockade will hermetically seal the ports of such a maritime power as France, but a blockade may be largely effective if carried out by a superior force. In addition to an unmistakable superiority outside there will be required a force in reserve somewhere in the Channel equal to the blockaded fleet should it or a sufficient part of it get to sea; while to maintain the coal and other supplies necessary to the blockaders, their numbers must exceed that of the blockaded fleet—say, by 33 per cent, so as to allow for a certain number of ships replenishing their stores in turn. To do this effectively we should require nearly the full number we possess available in 1890—of which four or five will be on foreign stations, leaving none to watch Russian ports or in reserve. To accompany the Fleets necessary for blockade 30 or 35 cruisers over 15 knots would be required (the eyes of the Fleet). We have only 42 or 43 in all, leaving seven to 12 cruisers to watch the 40 French cruisers of the same speed or the greater number of them not with their own iron-clads in port.”

Now, what was the comparative strength of the two Navies in iron battle ships? In 1890 England would have 42, France 38, not all of either Power being fit for all services, but all being fit for defence. It should be observed here that the French boilers were supposed always to be in a better state than ours. Of commerce protecting and destroying cruisers we possessed 121, while the French, including gunboats, had 126. In cruisers, speed was everything; therefore it was important to compare the relative speeds of the cruisers of the two countries. Of cruisers exceeding 14 knots in speed England had 52, and, including 12 armoured cruisers, 64. But of these 12 seven had their armour below water. That was very much as if a man were to order a chest protector and wear it upon his stomach. In addition, six cruisers of the Barracouta class were being built of 16 knots, but these were practically obsolete ab ovo. France had 63 cruisers, including four armoured ones, and the speed of some of these was 20 knots and upwards. In England only two had this speed, but 21 more of 22 knots were being built. In France nine of 20 knots and upwards were being built, and one of them would have a speed of 25 knots. Of subsidized merchantmen, England had 20, of which two were of 19 knots, and all of considerable coal endurance. From France there were no statistics relating to this class of vessel. Estimating the comparative protection afforded by the two countries in proportion to the number of their merchantsteamers, he found that whereas the relative protection afforded by Great Britain to her merchant steamers was as 1 to 90, in France the protection afforded was as 1 to 10. In the early part of the century the protection afforded by the navy to our mercantile marine was 6 per cent; it is now 1 per cent. Some people would say that our commerce would always be safe under the system of neutral flag protection. Not a very noble way for the Mistress of the Seas to protect our trade in war time. But the system must result in severe loss, as was proved by American statistics. In 1860, before the Civil War, the tonnage cleared in American ports was 12,087,000 in her own ships—nearly equal to our 13,914,000 cleared in British ports from our own ships. In 1870, the United States tonnage was under 7,000,000, while ours was over 25,000,000, and at present the United States tonnage was still lower, while ours stood at 47,000,000. Sir Spencer Robinson said that "if he had to fix our force in proportion to our wants he would say that six additional battle-ships were imperatively required, 60 first-class swift cruisers of 22 knots, a host of lighters, barges, and vessels to be used for rapid coaling, and an extension of electric cables to many important points now without them, or not in our hands." We further wanted a definite policy and programme; and as to this he had hope in the Committee of the Cabinet. A question had arisen as to the tonnage required for the invasion of this country. The First Lord of the Admiralty spoke of 480,000 tons, but there were experts who said that only 150,000 or 160,000 tons would be necessary; while at Havre alone there were 75,000 tons of shipping and five miles of quays. The Army was admitted to be low in numbers; the illustrious Duke wished to add 11,000 men, and others still more. Whenever we were called upon to send a portion of the Army into the field we had invariably to call for Reserves, for no regiment was kept up to the full strength with men of proper age. Our Army was still unarmed with repeaters, while other Armies had them; and there were many other things that were wanted. One great defect of the Militia was that it was generally somewhat under its nominal strength, and if troops were called out the Army "Militia Reserve" went back to the Army. The idea of General Peel in forming the Militia Reserve was that for every man enrolled in the Reserve another should be put on the strength of the regiment, and that the Militia Reserve should be supernumerary. As regarded the Yeomanry, the idea was that it should be converted into Rifle Cavalry, and made the Cavalry Force of the Reserve Forces, carrying a long rifle. The Volunteers had long been without the organization they ought to have, and there was no reason why they should not have had it any time during the last 25 years, or ever since they had a bond fide existence. Nothing had been done; they had had no transport and no Artillery; but since the present Government had been in Office artillery was being supplied and arrangements were being made for the supply of transport. The Government, to their credit, had also brought in a Defence Bill. He would not say that the Volunteers were treated harshly in the Bill, but what they dreaded was being sent to serve a long way from their homes. Explanations had been given which would do away with alarm, but it would be well that words should be introduced into the Bill to provide that, except in great emergency, the service should be so arranged by a system of reliefs that it should not press unduly upon professional men and expose those in situations to the loss of their employment, and further, that, as far as practicable, they should be called upon to serve in their own localities. He congratulated the Government upon their having done so much in the right direction. Still formulating what was said by the "man in the street," he should say that we wanted most a small permanent augmentation to the Army, say 20,000 men, so as to have all our garrisons abroad kept always at an efficient strength, and that we should send no more boys to hot countries to die like flies. When the reservoir of men at home ran low we had to send boys abroad instead—an inhuman and very costly proceeding. Secondly, we wanted the stores and equipments for two Army Corps for foreign service and for one corps besides on a reduced scale for home defence. That was, we should have three Army Corps of regulars for home work, out of which two would always be available for foreign service when required. These seemed to be our imperative requirements in the opinion of those most competent to judge. Whatever was necessary to be done ought to be done quickly, with the decision manifested by Lord Palmerston when he asked for £10,000,000. His Motion was not brought forward in a hostile sense; indeed, it was almost a Vote of Confidence in the Government. It was certainly not brought forward in a Party sense, for this question was above all Party considerations. It was the most vital question that could be submitted to Parliament, involving the security of our Empire and the defence of our homes and the strength of England, which was in itself a security for the peace of the world. In reply to the suggestion that the defence of the country had been sacrificed to Party interests, the Prime Minister had earnestly protested against the idea that for the purpose of making a good Budget any Party would consciously risk the interests of the Empire. But the noble Lord whose speech was thus protested against only said what civilians and military experts were saying. Mr. E. Stanhope and Mr. W. H. Smith were examined before Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Commission in 1887. Mr. E. Stanhope said—

"Within recent years Secretaries of State have allowed their stores to be reduced to the vanishing point, with the result of positive danger to the country."

The Earl of Wemyss

Mr. W. H. Smith described the way in which his Estimates were dealt with by his Cabinet. He said—

"His Colleagues when he presented his Estimates said to him 'You must take off half a million' and this was effected by doing without guns, reducing the number of men, and diminishing stores, &c."

Our ships were now waiting for these guns and our fortresses were unarmed. Lord Wolseley before the same Commission said—

"We are not in the position, military speaking, we ought to be in, nor do I believe we are in the position we should be in if the English people were told the whole truth."

This scare or panic, call it what they pleased, and the speeches of the Illustrious Duke and his noble Friend behind him (Viscount Wolseley) and other experts in the Navy and Army, would open the eyes of the Nation to the true state of things. He might define panic as the temporary waking up of the nation from that deep, chronic sleep into which it was thrown and kept by the mesmeric passes of Ministerial manipulation. He ventured to think that upon such a question as this the opinion of experts and of men belonging to the professional classes should receive attention, and he was certain that his noble Friend at the head of the Cabinet trusted in the patriotism of the nation—of the nation as a whole composed of all classes—and not as narrowed by Mr. Gladstone, who excluded from the nation what he called society—professional men—literature and science; and so, trusting the nation, he hoped he would show that, whatever may have been previously the case, it should now be said that under his administration loyalty to Party Budgets was little short of treason to the State. He, therefore, trusted that the Government, backed by public opinion, which he believed was thoroughly with them, would take such steps as would once and for all give to the nation with regard to its armament ample security for the safety of the country. In conclusion, he moved the Resolution which stood in his name.

Moved to resolve,

"That having regard to the recent statements of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, of the Adjutant General, and of high naval authorities, as to our defective armaments, and having also regard to the increase of armaments of foreign nations on sea and land, this House welcomes the proposals of Her Majesty's Government for an increase of our defensive means, and confidently looks to their forthwith taking such further measures as will give ample security to our Empire and just confidence to the country."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: My Lords, I do not intend to follow the noble Earl by discussing all the very interesting topics which he has raised, but I may be permitted to make a few observations upon one point to which reference has been made in the public Press of late, and which, in my opinion, is one of very great importance—namely, the liability of this country to invasion, and more especially the size of the fleet which would be necessary to bring across our short Channel a small army, which, it is believed, could be landed easily on our shores with the intention of a rapid march on London. This subject of invasion can be discussed with advantage and without giving offence to even the most tender susceptibility on the part of any nation. I should be sorry to discuss this subject if I thought it would give the least offence to Foreign Powers with whom we have been so long on the most amicable terms. The reason I bring this subject before your Lordships is that on a recent occasion when I spoke in this House, I quoted evidence which I gave a year before with regard to what I believe to be a well-known fact, and one which has been brought forward by men of the greatest eminence in this country—namely, that this country is at all times liable to invasion. The question of invasion has been studied most deeply by all the greatest soldiers and sailors of the century, and notably by the great Napoleon, by the Duke of Wellington, and by the distinguished Admirals and Generals who have succeeded since the Duke of Wellington's death. The question has been so frequently considered that it would require courage amounting almost to temerity on the part of anyone to stand up either in this House or in any other public assembly and express views contrary to those held by men of the eminence of those to whom I have referred. In the speech to which I referred, it may be remembered that I mentioned the possibility of 100,000 men being landed on our shores in a very short time from across the Channel for the purpose of capturing London. A short time after I made that statement, the First Lord of Admiralty, in "another place," on the 4th of June, made a statement, I suppose with the very best possible intentions, which elicited a good deal of criticism in the Press. The noble Lord wished to show the absurdity of the men who impressed on the nation the imminence and possibility of this invasion, and he stated, in the clearest terms possible, as Minister at the head of the Board of Admiralty, that it would be necessary, in order to transport this army, to have a navy of 480,000 tons gross burden. This is a point to which every General and Admiral has given a great deal of attention, and I am justified in saying that none have given it more attention than myself. I can most positively assert that when the noble Lord stated that a Fleet of 480,000 tons would be required, he exactly multiplied by three the amount which would be actually necessary for the purpose described. I was so astonished in reading that statement, that my first impression was that either he or the reporters had made a mistake. I thought he meant to say 180,000 tons. I waited for a couple of days to see whether a contradiction would be made, but none appeared. Meanwhile the newspapers very commonly—especially those that consider it very desirable and wise to always expect fair weather and to anticipate no danger—dilated very strongly on the absurdity of men like myself venturing to talk of invasion when no invading army could come unless provided with an enormous amount of tonnage. I then gave the most unqualified contradiction to what I thought to be the most erroneous and most misleading statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. I stated that a fleet of from 150,000 to 170,000 tons would be able to bring over an army of 100,000 men intended for the capture of London. I thought that that statement would have been generally received, and that the noble Lord would have consulted his distinguished Colleagues and expert advisers upon the point. I knew that if he had done so he would have obtained from them a full statement that he was entirely wrong and that I was correct. Instead of doing so, within a very short time afterwards he seems, by means of a friendly question addressed to him in the House of Commons, to have availed himself of his position to reiterate the fallacious figures he had previously given. Nothing is further from my intention than to impute to the noble Lord the wish to mislead the English people by false calculations. I am quite certain that nothing is further from his mind. But I cannot help thinking that it was a very serious thing if, as I believed was the case, he made the statement without having duly consulted those provided for him by the nation to advise him on these important points. I wish now to repeat that an army of 100,000 men intended for the invasion of this country and the capture of London could be transported across the Channel with the greatest possible ease in a fleet the size of which was 150,000 or 170,000 gross tonnage. I wish to emphasize that statement by saying that there is now, at this moment and every day of the year, in the ports of France ample shipping and tonnage to bring that army across the Channel. What is more—and this bears very directly on the point of the possibility of invasion—remembering that the permanent peace establishment of the French Army is nearly 500,000 men, I contend that it would be the very easiest possible operation for the French Authorities, if they wished to do so, to collect 100,000 men, with an Artillery consisting of 300 guns, in the ports bordering on the Channel in one night, without even informing the men who were to be embarked as to their destination; and your Lordships are well aware how short a time it would take to cross the Channel. The noble Lord who represents the War Office, when he answers the remarks made by the noble Earl in front of me, will, I hope, afford us some information as to whether this serious question has been considered by Her Majesty's Government; whether it has been put to the experts of the Army and Navy to say whether they think those statements that I have given as to the tonnage required for such an army of invasion as I have referred to are correct; or whether the statement of the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty is correct. The question is too important not to receive an answer; and I think it is due to your Lordships' House that we should have a statement made here and that we should be told whether the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty is correct in the statement which he made in "another place" or whether the statement I have ventured to make this evening is true or not. My Lords, I regret very much to have had to make these remarks at all, and I regret still more that an official of Her Majesty's Government, a Cabinet Minister holding the position which the First Lord of the Admiralty occupies, should on his own motion or initiative, without consulting the experts whose place it is to advise him in such matters, have made—although not willingly, I am sure, on his part—a wild and extravagant and a misleading statement on a subject of the most vital importance to the country.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS) said, that with regard to the point raised by the noble and gallant Viscount, it was one which had far better be dealt with by a Cabinet Minister; but as his Lordship had put a direct Question to them—namely, whether the question of the possibility of transporting or as to what was necessary for transporting an army of 100,000 men from the Continent to England had been referred to the Military Authorities for their opinion—he answered unhesitatingly that it had.

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: Perhaps the noble Lord will kindly state what was the result of that inquiry or reference to the Military Authorities.

LORD HARRIS said, that that was a point which had better be dealt with by a Cabinet Minister; it was not one with which he was acquainted. The noble Earl who had moved that Resolution was always prepared cap-à-pie on those occasions and came down with Horse, Foot, and Artillery, but he never remembered his having previously added Marines to his force. He thought, however, that the Government had no reason to be dissatisfied with either the form of the Resolution, the quarter from which it came, or the time at which it was made. He construed that Resolution as one of rational criticism, combined at the same time with confidence in Her Majesty's present Government as regarded what they had done and also a belief that they would do their best in future to make the Army efficient. Now he thought they might hope that the first spasm and premonitory symptoms of panic had passed away, and that they now were all, whether they were pressing for expenditure or were on the side of the economists, ready to look at questions affecting the protection of the country in the future in a calmer frame of mind. The noble and gallant Viscount had already in that House expressed very much the same sentiment of confidence in the present Government as the noble Earl now did, and considering the tone that had been assumed in the public Press in respect to the military administration of the country, he thought he was justified in quoting the expressions used some weeks ago by the noble and gallant Viscount in that House. The noble and gallant Viscount then said—

“But even if I were (i.e., a politician), I could not with any honesty attack Her Majesty's Government for neglecting to attend to the interests of the Army and Navy. From the position which I occupy in the administration of the Army, no man is more thoroughly aware than I am of all that the present Secretary of State for War has done and is doing in order to render the naval and military forces of the Crown efficient in every way and worthy of the nation.”—(3 Hansard, [326] 94.)

And again—

“I know how sincerely and deeply the Secretary of State for War desires to make the Army efficient. I have already alluded to what he has done in the short time he has been in office to improve not only the efficiency and organization, but also the discipline of the Military Forces.”—(Ibid. 97.)

And again—

“Since Lord Cardwell introduced the great reform of the Army, and changed the basis of our military organization, no Administration has done so much as the present Administration for the Army, or has introduced so many beneficial changes in the short time they have been in power.”—(Ibid. 96.)

The noble Earl had opened his speech by confessing that he had been an alarmist. Now, he trusted that he should not be accused of official optimism. He thought there was a happy mean between the two, and that the Government were justified in resisting unreasoning pressure for extravagant and ill-considered expenditure, with the right object of taking care that what money was voted should be properly spent. Money voted in a hurry was usually spent in a hurry, and in all probability those who so spent it would have to repent at considerable leisure. The noble Earl had acknowledged that one step taken by the Government was not the result of what he had called the panic of the other day. The Secretary of State for War had laid before Parliament at the commencement of the year a Memorandum in which he clearly pointed out that during last year a Committee had been sitting which took into careful consideration what was necessary to complete at once the armament and the works of our coaling stations, also what was necessary for the works and armaments of our Imperial ports, and what the Committee thought it was advisable should be spent on our commercial harbours. That Memorandum went into detailed statement, and said clearly that it was the intention of the Government to ask for a considerable sum outside the Estimates and for a loan in order that those works should be proceeded with as soon as possible. That document was laid before their Lordships and the other House certainly two months ago or more, and many of the articles recently published in the Press read as if no idea of that Memorandum had been before the writers at the time they wrote. The sum for which the Government had asked under the Imperial Defence Bill was no small one—it was £2,600,000. The Secretary of State in his Memorandum did not pretend that that was all that was necessary. He acknowledged that it was not, but said distinctly that he asked for that sum because from the opinions of his expert advisers and of those who appeared before the Committee last year, he believed that was as much as could be spent within the time. That, he hoped, was a well-considered scheme of expenditure, not a hasty and extravagant one. And, if he might say so with deference to the noble and gallant Viscount, he would observe that when he made his speech in the House, in which he did ample justice to the Government, he thought that justice was done somewhat tardily, and the noble and gallant Viscount had until then omitted in his speeches in different parts of the country to notice that the Government were asking from the nation very large sums to complete its defences. The noble Earl had alluded to the question of guns having been removed from men-of-war owing to the necessity of relining or owing to some failure of the lining and to their having been replaced through the land service. That had been done to his knowledge in two recent cases. He did not attempt to defend it, but he had only to say that in both of those cases the guns were taken from the second land line of defence, and that it had been the invariable policy of the War Office to give way in everything to the Navy, recognizing to the full that it was the first line. Then the question arose, what was the condition of this country at present with respect to the provision of armament? That undoubtedly was a most important question, touching, as it did, both Services. Undoubtedly there had been recent failures in guns, which had been brought before Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Commission and had been reported in the newspapers, and that might lead those who studied the question to have very grave fear whether this country would be able to keep up its title to be a great manufacturing country. Many of the statements on the subject, however, had been greatly exaggerated. If a crack was reported in the lining of a gun, it did not necessarily follow that if the ship were on service the particular gun would become inefficient. It was a fact that many rounds had been fired from guns after the lining had been cracked, and that the shooting of the guns had not been spoilt. But it was absolutely necessary that the manufacturers of this country should, by study and experiment, produce guns as little liable to those accidents as possible. He doubted, however, if they could evolve, without experience, any better system than at present existed in this country for studying the science of gun-making. They had on the Ordnance Committee now sitting not only two officers of the Navy and a distinguished engineer, but within the last five years what were called specially associated members had been added—a member from the Armstrong firm, a member from the Whitworth firm, General Maitland, the head of the Ordnance Factory, and Lord Armstrong himself. They sat first of all on the question of ordnance construction in 1883; they were called together after the failure of the Collingwood guns in 1885; and they were now sitting on two important questions connected with the rifling and lining of guns. The Government were occasionally pressed from outside that if they could not get good enough guns in this country they should go abroad. But what security was there that the Krupp guns would be better than our own, or would be supplied more quickly? That was a question which had been looked into at the War Office, and it was his decided opinion that if you went abroad you would not get guns any quicker or any better. From the evidence taken by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Commission there was no doubt that there had been failures in Krupp guns as well as in ours; but in the case of foreign nations there was not the same publicity given to such matters as in this country. He wished their Lordships distinctly to understand that the Military Authorities—those in a political position—had recognized as clearly as possible the absolute necessity of advancing as rapidly as possible in the manufacture of perfect guns, and they believed they were doing what was best for the country and for the efficiency of the two Services at this moment. The noble Earl alluded to the fact that in every regiment of the 1st and 2nd Army Corps there was a certain number of young recruits, and if the regiments were sent on foreign service those young recruits would have to go out or to be replaced by older men from other regiments. As long as we kept up our present system of recruiting, we must have a number of men under age whom we should not wish to send to India. But if you wished to send on foreign service only those who were not above 20 years you would have to increase your Army. That was a question which it was not possible for him to discuss. It was only those in the position of Cabinet Ministers who could consider the whole matter from the financial and other points of view. You could not separate responsibility for the size of the Army and the efficiency of your military arrangements from financial responsibility. The Cabinet had most distinct responsibility to the nation, and it would be impossible to withdraw that responsibility or any other responsibility which rested on it. The noble Earl referred to the fact that we had not a magazine rifle at present in the British Army. Now he was under the impression that there was no Army on the Continent completely armed with the magazine rifle.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Completely.

Lord Harris

LORD HARRIS said, he believed there was one Army with a good number of those rifles; but he had it on the authority of a gentleman recently on the East Coast of Africa that he had an opportunity of trying the Martini-Henry carbine against the repeating carbine, and the Martini-Henry beat it in every respect. In the matter of rifles, he trusted the country would not press the Government. It was said, no doubt, that they had been studying this matter a great number of years, but that was not actually the case. It was only in the summer of last year that the calibre of the rifle was adopted. That was an important change, and it resulted that they had not been able to perfect the magazine rifle, which was now about to be tried, in all respects, as quickly as they originally supposed. He did not believe we had lost anything by that. They had gained, as other nations had bought a dear experience owing to being in a hurry. He was happy to be able to say that rifles for trial had now been issued to troops in England; some were being sent to Egypt this week, and he hoped a further assignment would be sent to India and to Halifax next week. Their Lordships must remember that the British Army had to fight in every climate in the world, and that every arm and every kind of ammunition must be tried in every climate, and that it required time for proof. The noble Earl referred to the Militia Reserve. At the time when the Militia Reserve was started, it appeared, from the noble Lord's own speech, that the country had not that magnificent force of Volunteers which it had now. That must distinctly affect the question of our Home Army; and in the presence of the Military Authorities he challenged the assertion that the Militia Reserve would be withdrawn from the Militia if an attempt at invasion was made. Under those circumstances he believed the Militia Reserve would stay with their Battalions. At this moment we were not able to recruit the Militia up to its full strength, and, therefore, the idea that for every Militiaman who joined the Reserve an additional man should be added to the Militia would be difficult to carry out. Owing to the greater demand in the labour market or to the greater attraction of the Volunteers, they had not been so successful in getting men for the Militia last year as in the two or three preceding years. Personally, he was entirely with the noble Earl in his view that the Yeomanry should become mounted rifles, but that was a change which required trial. If the regiments expressed a desire to try a long rifle, no objections would be taken to such a course at headquarters. The noble Earl said that the Volunteers had no organization and no artillery. In the last two years, however, the Government had done everything in their power to improve the organization of the Volunteers and to supply them with artillery. The whole of the 84 guns promised to the Volunteer Corps had been issued and were now in their possession; and with regard to 16 and 20-pounders the Department was now in communication with officers of the artillery Corps as to their willingness to accept them, but those officers had to look for a place to store them in. The noble Earl referred at some length to the Defence Bill. About that he would say nothing, as it was now before the other House, and when it came up to their Lordships' House the noble Earl would have an opportunity of moving any Amendment he thought proper. The noble Earl also brought forward his old friend, "the man in the street." He did not know whether the noble Earl expected the Government to accept the figures as really reliable. The Government would not be satisfied with the expression of opinion of "the man in the street;" but, as they had done in the case of the armaments and the works for our coaling stations and for the Imperial ports and commercial harbours, they would insist upon a careful examination of the figures, so that when they put their figures before the House of Commons and the country they could say that they had carefully looked into them and could guarantee their accuracy. The present Government had done their best to make some changes which would benefit the Army, and he had brought forward the hon. and gallant Viscount's evidence of that fact. They had been working under an abnormal pressure. There had been sitting Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's Commission, the Estimates Committee of the House of Commons, Sir Matthew White Ridley's Commission on the Civil Services, and the Committee on the question of the Defence of Imperial Ports and Coaling Stations. There had also been tremendous pressure put on the War Office in elaborating the mobilization scheme. In all these circumstances, he thought it would have been excusable if the Government had been unable to take up any great changes as regarded the Army. As regarded the Volunteers and Auxiliary forces, they had been enabled to introduce beneficial changes, and as regarded the organization of the Services, although it could not be laid down as a matter of fact that the changes they had introduced were beneficial, at least they could say that they believed them to be so. It was impossible to say in the moment whether a change in organization would in the course of six or seven years prove to be beneficial. It must, however, be acknowledged that the principle the present Government had introduced, that weapons, stores, and equipments for the Army should be examined, proved, and tested in a department different from that which purchased or supplied them, was a right principle. As regarded the changes at the War Office and in the Army, the Government were entirely responsible, and they were responsible for the changes introduced in consequence of the inquiry into the system in vogue at the War Office, and he believed they had no reason to fear what the finding would be whenever a verdict was passed upon them.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, although I am in no way personally responsible in the matter now before your Lordships, yet as I gave evidence before a Committee, and as I feel that a certain amount of responsibility rests upon my shoulders, I hope in these circumstances your Lordships will allow me to offer a few words on the question before the House. My noble Friend who brought forward the Motion has named me in that Motion, and rather implied that a scare was produced by what I said and by what the noble and gallant Viscount behind me has said. I can assure your Lordships that I had not the slightest intention in anything I have said of producing a scare, because I consider scares to be the most dangerous and objectionable things that can possibly be imagined. The whole subject arose in this way. I was called before a Committee of the other House to answer certain questions referring to the Army, and, of course, I answered those questions to the best of my ability and conscience. I did not frame those questions; they were framed by the Members who sat around. My business was to answer them. Among other questions I was asked whether I considered that at the present moment the Army was in such a condition that a certain proportion of one Army Corps could be immediately withdrawn from Aldershot or elsewhere and embarked for foreign service? My answer was, "No." "What do you want?" was one of the questions. I said that I believed that about 11,000 additional men would, upon our present system, carry out the object the question implied. I was asked what I meant. My meaning was exactly what has been stated in this debate—that under the present condition of enlistment and service, you are obliged to engage a very large proportion of very young men; and that, as there had been laid down a rule as regards hard foreign service in the field, that a man under 20 years of age ought not to be employed, if you have a large body of recruits in every regiment, unless you have some means of leaving a portion of them behind, you cannot embark the number of men you want. The 11,000 men to which I alluded was simply to give a margin, so as to leave behind, not useless men, but men who for the moment cannot be made available, and by that means to fill up what I consider the vacancies created by the system. That is the meaning of what I said about the 11,000 men. I hope, however, it will not be understood that those are my views as to all that is wanted. I believe that more is wanted; but that was the ground on which these remarks have been made. No doubt, the subject has been very largely ventilated; and I then ventured to think, and I think so still, that it is very desirable that the country should understand exactly the position in which it is placed with regard to these questions. Hitherto the country has been asleep. I do not think the subject has hitherto attracted the attention of the people, and I believe that the cause of that has been that there has always been a great difficulty connected with it—namely, the financial difficulty. But now it has been brought prominently before the country, and, that being so, I consider, without reference to any attack upon the present or any other Government, that it is the duty of any man who is in a position to know how the matter stands and what ought to be done to state frankly what he thinks; and if he does not do so, I do not think he is doing his duty to himself, and much less so to his country or his Sovereign. There has, my Lords, been some talk about danger, and it is said that I used that word. I did use the word "danger," I believe; but I did not use it in the way which has been implied. The word "danger" can be taken in two senses. There is, first, imminent danger. There is, I believe, no imminent danger, and I do not consider there is any danger in that sense. But there is danger in this sense—that the country ought to be efficiently protected, and in a condition to hold its own with reference to other nations. In that respect, in my humble opinion, there is decidedly danger unless you have your Services in a condition to be able to perform the duties which may be required of them. I believe Her Majesty's present Government have done everything they could to accomplish that object. It cannot be done in so many days, or perhaps in so many years; but the object to be attained is to ascertain what is really wanted. We have never fully ascertained that. We have lived from hand to mouth, and if danger arises everybody immediately cries out for the Services to be prepared for anything that can be required. Sometimes it is a small scare, sometimes a very considerable one; and the result is that we are never really prepared either for a small or a considerable one. Now, I think Her Majesty's Government ought to lay down absolutely what they consider to be the object and duty both of the Navy and the Army—and not only that, but also the relative duty of each; because there is a great deal in the connection between the Army and the Navy. The Navy is, of course, the first line of defence; but the Navy requires the assistance of the Army, and unless the Army is in a position to assist the Navy, we cannot expect to hold our own with other countries. I am told that this country is not a military one, and that it does not want to vie with other nations in that respect. I entirely agree; but what is the real condition of things? Every other European country at this present time has been arming to the teeth; and what have we done? Comparatively nothing. [The Marquess of SALISBURY dissented.] I see my noble Friend the Prime Minister shakes his head; but for the last few years we have certainly not done what we ought to have done relatively to what other countries have done. If we are not in as good a position, relatively, to what they are, we must be in a disadvantageous position; and all that we have asked for, and all that we have put forward, all that I personally have put forward, whether in public or private, has always been this—that we should relatively hold the same position to other countries now as was the case before these vast armaments were introduced. I, for one, deplore these armaments. I think it is a most unhappy thing for the world, and I wish it did not take place. But it is not for me to say whether these armaments are necessary or not, however much I regret to see them. Every country judges for itself, and we must judge for ourselves relatively to what other countries do. I believe that Her Majesty's present Government have done an immense deal to meet the requirements of the country; but I do not think the subject has ever been treated in former years in that spirit, and the result is that we have had this scare. I believe that if we have our Services in such a condition—not extravagant, by any means—that they can really carry out whatever is really laid down as the principle on which every Government should act, we should be in a much better position than we are now. When he dissented from what I said, the noble Marquess seemed to overlook the fact that in many respects changes have taken place. Take, for instance, the arming of the coaling stations. That is a question which was never thought of until within the last year or two. If you have coaling stations, which are necessary, they must entail an additional number of men, because the Fleet could not take charge of them alone. There must be troops to defend them, and without troops they would be worse than useless. At the same time, what I would like to see, and what every soldier would like to see, is that some fixed principle should be laid down which would define better than has hitherto been the case the relative duty of the Army and the Navy, and also the relative requirements as to the strength of the two Services. That would be an immense point, and I am rejoiced that we have a Cabinet Committee sitting on the matter; for I cannot but think that that Committee will produce some good result in that direction. If something sudden comes upon us, you may depend upon it you have not got the Services in that position that you would wish and that the country requires. I am most anxious to assure your Lordships that I have no desire to see any extravagance in the Army. My object has been to let the Government feel I am supporting them to the best of my ability; and in making these observations I have endeavoured to support what I believe to be the right thing in the interests of the State. I hope that this explanation will be satisfactory to your Lordships, and will show that what I have said on the subject has certainly not been with the object of producing a scare, but merely to make the country feel what was required to be done.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he agreed with the illustrious Duke as to the inadvisability of sending young soldiers under 20 years of age out to India to reinforce regiments. It might have been better, in the interest of the Army in India and also at home, if the increase in the number of the British troops in India which was made a few years ago had not been made, for it would be preferable to have the Reserve at home rather than in India, where it was exposed to a worse climate, and where its maintenance was also more costly. He had, however, risen to make a few observations on account of the references that had been made to the strength of the Navy. He could not accept some of the figures that had been used by the noble Earl who introduced this Motion; and as the present strength of the Navy was due, not to the action of the present Board of Admiralty, but rather to the action of previous Boards, he felt bound to point out the inaccuracy into which the noble Earl had been led. The figures quoted by the noble Earl had been supplied to him by Sir Spencer Robinson and others; but he (the Earl of Northbrook) ventured to think that the statements of responsible experts on the question of the relative condition of the British and other Navies were of more value than those of experts who had no responsibility, such as Sir Spencer Robinson. The noble Earl had stated that from the figures submitted to him he was in a position to state that in 1890 the number of battle ships would be English 42, French 39, giving us a preponderance of only three. These figures gave a very erroneous impression. In 1884, when at the Admiralty, he had a careful examination made as to the respective strength of the English and French Navies. The Naval Members of the Board went carefully into the matter, and upon their authority he in that year was able to inform the House that the number of armour-plated ships was English 46, French 31. From that time to the present we had been building armour-plated ships at twice the rate of the French. Upon the authority of the present Senior Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Arthur Hood, who was an expert with responsibility, he was able to state that the number of such ships added to the two Navies by 1890 would be, since 1884, English 22, French 10. The figures, therefore, stood as follows with regard to armour-plated ships of all classes. In 1884, English 46, French 31; in June, 1888, English 54, French 35; in 1890, English 68, French 41. His noble Friend would see that these figures, given by a responsible expert, Sir Arthur Hood, entirely differed from the figures given to him by Sir Spencer Robinson. He was corroborated in these figures by the authority of a noble and gallant Friend, Lord Charles Beresford, who, he regretted, had left the Admiralty, and who could not be regarded as a particularly favourable critic of the present Board of Admiralty. Speaking to his constituents in November last, Lord Charles Beresford said that in 1890 we should have 38 ships of the first-class against 31 of two combined Powers, of which France was one. In 1879 the present First Lord of the Treasury, who was then at the Board of Admiralty, added to the number of ships laid down, but fortunately did nothing of the kind recommended now by Sir Spencer Robinson. If the right hon. Gentleman had decided to build 60 ships all at once they would have been obsolete by this time. But the right hon. Gentleman began to make good the want that existed, and the Board of Admiralty over which he himself presided followed in the same direction, with the result that in the years beginning with 1880 twice as many ships of the first-class were being built in England as in France. The public failing to understand what was going on, there was a scare in the Autumn of 1884, and Mr. Gladstone's Government, thinking it right to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded, proposed an addition of £3,000,000 to the Shipbuilding Estimates of the Navy. The result had been most satisfactory, and at no time since the introduction of the screw in ships of war and of armoured plate had the Navy of this country been in a superior position than it was in now as compared with foreign nations. In fact, it had never been in so good a state. The noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) had especially referred to fast cruisers, and stated that the French possessed 63 vessels of this class, many of them over 20-knot speed.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Some 25-knot.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he thought there must be some error on the part of the noble Earl; he knew of no such fast-going cruisers in the French or any other Navy, and when he was at the Board of Admiralty the French had none, and had none building. The present condition of the two Navies, as far as these cruisers were concerned, was this on the authority of Sir Arthur Hood—we had 21 unarmoured cruisers of 16 knots and upwards, while the French only possessed six cruisers of that great speed. Our superiority, therefore, over the French in unarmoured cruisers of high speed was very considerable indeed. It was true that in the last year or two the French had begun to build a substantial number of fast cruisers; but he believed the present Board of Admiralty were taking the wise and proper steps to meet that increase by a relative increase on our side. The Admiralty had begun to build a large number of these vessels, of which no less than five would, he understood, have a speed of 20 knots. Eighteen or 20 were being built which would have a speed of more than 16 knots. He dissented altogether from the view of the irresponsible expert quoted by the noble Earl that we ought to build 60 fast cruisers and four more line-of-battle ships. Our number of battle ships, as compared with the French, was sufficient for the present; and it would, in his opinion, be an unwise and extravagant policy to build at once an enormous number of ships of any class. The cost of Sir Spencer Robinson's scheme would be no less than £12,000,000. Those who wished to precipitate the country into such expenditure would do well to recollect what occurred in 1859. The question was then raised whether we had as many screw line-of-battle ships as the French, and many old sailing ships were at once converted into screw line-of-battle ships. But a very short time afterwards the era of iron-clads began, and these vessels were either converted into indifferent iron-plated ships or were now rotting in the harbours of the country. That showed the danger of any large, sudden, simultaneous operation in shipbuilding. The speed of our ships launched and completed during the last four or five years he considered very satisfactory, notwithstanding the adverse criticisms of a portion of the Press. Most of our recent iron-clad vessels had a speed of 16 knots, and some of our armoured cruisers had considerably surpassed the speed contemplated by their designers. He believed that the Orlando, in her trial trip to Gibraltar, had made a faster passage than had ever been achieved by any commercial steamer. He was prepared to rest his defence of our naval administration on the present position of the Fleet. He believed the Board of Admiralty was now engaged in making fit for sea a very considerable squadron in order to show what the position and organization of the Navy were. There never was a greater mistake than to suppose that the Board of Admiralty was not prepared to meet any difficulty, or to do any work which it had to do in respect of sending ships to any part of the world, manning them quickly, and fitting them out properly. On these points evidence was furnished by the two Expeditions to Egypt, and he was not aware that they were attended by any failure as to transport, organization, or equipment. And their Lordships could appeal for testimony to the noble and gallant Lord who commanded the Naval Forces (Lord Alcester), and who afterwards joined the Admiralty, and presided over a Committee which had worked out the whole organization for manning our ships. He believed it would now be found that 22 armoured battle ships, 18 cruisers, besides torpedo boats and gunboats, could be in a short time manned, equipped, and made quite ready for service without taking a man from the Reserves. It was impossible to over-estimate the importance of protecting our commercial marine in time of war; but to discuss the best mode of effecting this would be to take up more time than he would venture to occupy on the present occasion. He would, therefore, only observe that he was aware that the Board of Admiralty were paying particular attention to the subject. As to invasion, he was not going to discuss how many men per ton could be put on board ship and brought across the Channel, because that did not go to the root of the matter, which was that the command of the Channel should remain with our Fleet, so that there should be no possibility of sending a hostile expedition across it. The idea of invasion was preposterous so long as we had command of the Channel, and of this we had absolute certainty in the present condition of the Navy, and should continue to have it whatever Government had the responsibility of its administration.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that during that debate they had heard some very important, very interesting, and very startling statements, and it must be generally satisfactory to their Lordships to have heard a speech of a reassuring character. He would not prolong the conversation; he desired to obtain some information on a matter of detail, but an important detail; he wished to know what was the policy of the Government with regard to Dover Harbour? [A laugh.] The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) laughed; but the unanimous result of past discussions and inquiries was that the enlargement of Dover Harbour was an essential element in the defence of this country, and expenditure had been incurred with the object of carrying out the work by means of convict labour. It now appeared as if the project that had been formerly approved by the highest authorities had been abandoned; and it certainly did seem to be inconsistent to display so much concern about the defence of the Empire while neglecting an essential part of our home defences.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I have to apologize to the noble Earl if I seem to think too lightly of the grave subject which he has brought forward. But I have heard him bring it forward so frequently in this House, and at such long distances of time, that it impresses me very much as a favourite Motion of Mr. Smith in the House of Commons on the question of foreshores. There is something in the frequent repetition of an argument which comes to no practical effect which, I am afraid, diminishes the solemnity of the occasion. But I still think that the noble Earl's speech must be looked upon rather in the light of a confession than a complaint, because the story, as I understand it, is this—that about the year 1873 Mr. Gladstone's then Government, with the assistance of Mr. Cardwell and the noble Lord, had come to the absolute conclusion that Dover Harbour must be enlarged. A change of Government took place in 1874, and no doubt that very grave feeling of the Government was not continued. In June 1880, the noble Earl came into Office again and remained for five years, and yet, though staggering under the conviction that this was an absolute necessity, not a single stone towards the improvement of the harbour was laid. It evidently was necessary that the Government of which the noble Earl was a Member should consider the question for five years. We have only considered it for two years. With that answer to the noble Earl, I confess that I am not competent to deal with the matter from a strategic point of view; but if he will give me Notice I will tell him what our experts think of its relative importance to the numerous claims on the Exchequer for the purposes of defence. There is so much to do, that the postponement of works does not mean that you disregard or disbelieve in the value of the work, but simply that you think there are other works which are of more importance. I was anxious to say a few words with reference to the speech of the noble and gallant Viscount (Viscount Wolseley) who spoke early this evening, and of the charges he made against my noble Friend Lord George Hamilton. I must say I regret that he should, in his position, have made charges of that kind without having taken some trouble to ascertain that they were correct. He charged my noble Friend, if I did not mistake his words, with having given an opinion on a very important matter of naval and military strategy simply from his own lights and without instructing himself by the advice and knowledge of his proper Departmental officers. The statement is entirely without foundation. My noble Friend, before he made the statement that he did, consulted the proper authority in his Department—namely, the Transport Department—and it was on their authority that the statement he made was put before the world. Whether it is right or wrong I will not undertake to say; but there is absolutely no ground whatever for the blame which the noble and gallant Viscount has thrown upon my noble Friend.

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: I did not refer to Departmental officers, but I said I was under the impression, so utterly erroneous was the statement made by the First Lord, that it was not possible he could have consulted the able Admirals who were his Colleagues on the Board of Admiralty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I confess I do not see what more he could have done. He consulted the able Admiral or Captain whose duty it is to consider the question of transport, because that was the question which was under discussion. There was one other remark made by the noble and gallant Viscount of which I also desire to take notice. He intimated, in the form of a question, his belief that we had not consulted the authorities of the War Office, or of the Navy, with respect to the danger of an invasion on which he had insisted so strongly. That danger the noble and gallant Viscount has re-stated in fuller terms to-night. If I understood him rightly, he stated the danger to be that 100,000 men might be collected in a single night at the French ports of the Channel, placed on board the shipping that would be found there, and transported that night to the shores of England as a surprise. I can say that the matter has been under the anxious consideration of the Government in communication with the authorities of the War Office and the Admiralty. Stating the problem as the noble and gallant Viscount has stated it, I can safely say that we have received from no authority any indication that a danger such as he states it exists. I have heard of authorities, not of the War Office or the Admiralty, who have thought that a small force could be carried across in the way the noble and gallant Viscount suggests, as a matter of surprise. I have also heard—and I think it is the belief of the authorities of the War Office—that if we lost the command of the Channel by a great naval disaster, then such an invasion as the noble and gallant Viscount suggests might be possible.

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: I never suggested that 100,000 men could be embarked on board any fleet in one night. I certainly had no intention of suggesting that.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That sets the matter right at once. It certainly startled me very much. But the difference, I believe, between the Admiralty and the War Office is really a question of definition. What is a surprise? Such a surprise as that we were talking of just now, a surprise in a single night, is a thing against which no naval pre-eminence could contest if such a surprise were possible. A surprise of that kind I believe to be simply impossible; and I venture to form the opinion, even against any indication of military opinion—because it is not a military matter—that it would be perfectly impossible that any such movement could be organized in France and that we should not know of it. After all, there is the telegraph. If the wires are cut we know there is something wrong; if they are not touched the news must come over them. Such a force could only be concentrated at the ports of the Channel by means of the railways. In order to concentrate forces of that kind by railway you must seize and use a vast quantity of rolling stock. The companies do not keep that rolling stock idle; it must be withdrawn from the ordinary commercial traffic of the country. Do you suppose you can withdraw rolling stock to carry 100,000 men without calling attention to the fact that you are doing it? You would paralyze think it would be making of such a possibility of such a surprise involved in its being done in the night. If you had not that surprise there was any notice or any possibility of bringing up any naval force to meet any expedition of that kind, the expedition must necessarily be destroyed. The truth is that there has been a good deal of misconception caused by that phrase—losing the command of the Channel. What is meant by losing the command of the Channel? It is that our Fleet should be defeated, a contingency which we hope is impossible, but which it is yet right that we should take into consideration. But that we should so lose command of the Channel that every port should be sealed up, and no ship of any kind should be able to creep out to interfere with such an invading force as the noble and gallant Viscount portrays—I do not believe that it is within the compass of possibility or the gloomiest fears that England would ever be reduced so low as that. I think it is taking into consideration contingencies which cannot possibly occur. May I hope that, now we have threshed out what the meaning of the two Departments is, this duel will end? I do not think it is desirable that we should discuss in all its details for the benefit of our neighbours the precise mode in which we expect them to attack us, and in which we intend to defend ourselves; and I should be very grateful if the noble and gallant Viscount would use his official position to guide us than stand it.

1873 Mr. Gladstone with the assistance of the noble Lord, has apprehended a conclusion that But, no enlarged. Ach the noble Lord in 1874, right. Express feeling of than people continued. I and you have come into a committee of this for five years opposite sides and under the opinion which is an absolute necessity I object to having the impression laid at my head in this. It is agreed upon matters of the Government. —I do not say upon matters of a Member are all agreed about spending money—but if they were agreed upon what they know the case would be different. But their differences on every point are enormous; and, however carefully we must weigh their opinions and them as against each other, I think the day has not yet arrived when the Parliament of England will surrender itself on this vital matter to the absolute guidance of experts. I would remind my noble Friend of a story of our distinguished neighbour, the French, with respect to the hunting field. A Frenchman was riding so fast that he got among the hounds, and on being asked whether he was going to catch the fox he answered, "My friend, I will catch the fox." Now, that is precisely the case of these two Departments.

The Marquis

whom the noble Lord speaks of as the two Front Benches. He will only ride down the hounds if he tries to do the hunting in our stead. We may be corrupt—we may be animated by every motive that is unlike those by which Englishmen are usually guided; we may be the very type of Party corruption; we may be paragons of incompetence; but still it is only we, the Front Benches, to whatever Party we may belong, we, the Ministers of the Crown, who can do the thing which you want done, and it is of no use for you to try to take it out of our hands. It must be done by the political and civil officers of the Crown, taking the advice of experts; and any attempt to force them or to push them, or to taunt them into abandoning their own opinions, yielding them entirely to what are called the opinions of experts, will only have the effect of paralyzing those who may do something without giving the power to any others to do it in their place. I earnestly hope that the noble Earl will revise the opinion that he has as to the two Front Benches. After all, does it not occur to him as rather odd that the people who are likely to know most of the inside of the Offices, to whatever Party they belong, or whatever prepossessions they begin with, always come to similar conclusions? Does it not occur to him that there may possibly be some facts and some sound reasons which lead to a result that a priori you could not expect? The noble Earl, I think, in his speech, which contained many good things, injured his case by adding to it these suspicions and these reproaches in regard to those who hold political Office. This perpetual repetition of the formula that they are neglecting the highest interests of their country in order to make successful Budgets against Ministry after Ministry, no matter what may be their political opinions, or their moral character, or their intellectual capacity, does seem to condemn itself, and it shows that there must be something weak in the cause which is constantly appealing to prejudices of such a description. I would ask the noble Earl to believe that we, and noble Lords opposite, are animated by as pure a desire to serve the public in the recommendations that we give as he is—that we are as sensible as he is of the stupendous magnitude of the interests committed to our care; that we feel as deeply as he can do the enormous responsibility which the protection of this vast Empire carries with it; and that we are devoting all that we have of knowledge, of industry, or of capacity to carry that task successfully into effect.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS briefly replied, thanking his noble Friend for what he had done, and only expressing the hope that the view which his noble Friend took of all those questions would lead to the Government arriving at some wise decision which would result in giving greater confidence and security to the country.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that after the speech of the noble Earl the late First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook) it was unnecessary for him to detain their Lordships with any remarks. His only object in rising was to say that the figures which that noble Earl had quoted were substantially correct. The following (omitting coast defence) was a statement of the relative strength of the Navies of Great Britain, France, and Russia:—In 1888 Great Britain had 34 armoured battle ships, France had 23, and Russia 2. In 1890 the numbers would be respectively 40, 24, and 7. In 1888 Great Britain had 6 armoured cruisers, France 4, and Russia 6. In 1890 England would have 14 armoured cruisers, France 4, and Russia 3. In 1888 we had 1 torpedo ram, while France and Russia had none. In 1888 England had 73 unarmoured ships, with a speed of 11 to 16 knots, while France had 51, and Russia 26. In 1890 we should have 78, France would have 37, and Russia 26. In 1888 England had 21 unarmoured ships of 16 knots and over (exclusive of gunboats), France had 6, and Russia none. In 1890 England would have 39 ships of that class, France 21, and Russia 4. In 1888 England had 4 torpedo gun vessels, with a speed of 19 to 21 knots, France had 8, and Russia 1. In 1890 England would have 13, France 8, and Russia 2 of that class of vessels. That list did not include the two protected cruisers, the Blake and Blenheim, of 9,000 tons and 22 knots, and capable of steaming 15,000 knots at 10-knot speed. Nor did it include the Vulcan, protected cruiser, of 6,600 tons and 20 knots, and capable of steaming 12,000 knots at 10-knot speed. The battle ships Mino- taur, Achilles, Hector, Valiant, and Defence were not included in the list, because it had not yet been decided to repair them. It should be noted that three iron-clads were on foreign stations. Therefore, as he had stated, the figures given by the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) were substantially correct; and, that being the case, he would not detain their Lordships with any further remarks.

QUESTIONS.

CEYLON—GOLD DISCOVERIES.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to an article in The Times of Ceylon, of May 31, reporting the discovery of gold in the district of Sarangalla by Constable Arachichi; whether it is true that the Ceylon Government purchased nuggets from the constable for the Museum in Colombo; and, whether the Secretary of State will advise an inspection of the district by a competent gold-mining expert at the Government expense with a view to ascertaining whether the gold area is sufficiently rich to warrant its being worked in the interests of the Colony?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State has seen a reference in the Ceylon newspapers to the subject; but there has hardly yet been time for any Report by the Colonial Government to be received in this country. Such a Report will, doubtless, be made in due course; and when it arrives the Secretary of State will consider the suggestion made in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACT—THE BURGH OF TAIN.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to a correspondence which has been proceeding between the Local Authority of the Burgh of Tain and the Board of Supervision regarding an alleged breach of the Public Health (Scotland) Act; and, whether, in cases where the Local Authority omits to put the provisions of the said Act in force, it is within the province of the Board to insist on their doing so?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute) (who replied) said: I am informed that a correspondence has recently taken place between the Board of Supervision and a local complainer regarding an alleged breach of the Public Health Act. As the statements of the Local Authority and the complainer were conflicting, the Board have remitted the case to their Inspecting Officer to inquire and report—when next in the neighbourhood; and, at the same time, informed the complainer that the Act empowered any two householders to take proceedings against the Local Authority, irrespective of the Board. As to the last Question, the Board considered all such cases as this one on their merits; and if satisfied that the public health is not injured by the arrangements complained of, they do not proceed against the Local Authority, leaving it to the complainers to do so if so advised.

INLAND REVENUE—EXEMPTION FROM THE INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can explain why, and on what principle, one set of tenements should be exempt from House Duty by a concession granted by the Treasury, when other tenements let at similar rents, occupied by working people, are not held to be exempt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): If the hon. Member would do me the honour to refer to my answer to a similar Question on Tuesday, the 19th, he would see that the principle on which certain buildings divided into tenements of under £20 annual value are exempted from House Duty, and other buildings containing tenements of similar value are not, has already been explained by me. The principle is that exemption is granted where the tenements are structurally separate, so that each is in a sense a house by itself, separated by some clear physical demarcation from other similar houses under the same roof. On the other hand, exemption is not granted where the tenements are merely one or more ordinary rooms in an ordinary house, with nothing to separate them from the rest of the house or to constitute them a distinct and self-contained dwelling. I may add, that relief is also granted in cases where more than one separate tenement is occupied by one tenant, provided that the annual value of the entire and combined holding is under £20.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF DUTCH CATTLE AND SHEEP.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the noble Lord the Member for Lewisham, Whether the latest accounts from Holland show that no contagious disease exists among Dutch cattle and sheep, and that the transit of German sheep has been stopped for some months; and, whether, under these circumstances, the restrictions on the importation into this country of Dutch stock will be removed, so as to place it on an equality with that from Scandinavia?

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM (Lewisham): The Government are not aware of the existence of any contagious disease among animals in Holland at the present time; but in the first week of May last, German sheep, among which foot-and-mouth disease existed, were brought by railway through Holland and shipped to this country from Flushing. On May 14 last the Government were informed that the transit of sheep from Germany through Holland had been prohibited. The question of relieving Dutch stock from restrictions is one of very serious importance; and an application from the Dutch Government on the subject is under consideration.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPEALS AT DUNDALK.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the serious complaints made in The Belfast Morning News of the 14th and 15th instant, as to the great inconvenience of bringing the tenants of the estates of Mr. Sewallis Shirley and Mr. H. H. Shirley, at Carrickmacross, to have their appeals heard before the Land Commission at Dundalk; whether the Land Commission received a Memorial from the tenants pointing out the inconvenience and expense which attendance at Dundalk would involve; whether he is aware that the tenantry on these estates are among the poorest in Ireland, and would not be able to bear the expense of attending with their witnesses at Dundalk; whether he can say what number of appeals from the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners still remain to be heard on these estates; and, whether he will advise a sitting of the Land Commission to be held at Carrickmacross, where there is a suitable and commodious Courthouse, and where there is also good hotel accommodation?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that in the ordinary course of practice cases from the Carrickmacross Union would be heard either in Dublin or Monaghan, and that they fixed the sitting at Dundalk specially to meet the tenants' convenience and to save expense to all parties. The distance from Carrickmacross to Dundalk is 14 miles only, and there is convenient railway communication between the two places. No remonstrances were received by the Commissioners until within the last week, although the arrangement to sit at Dundalk has been public for two months. There are 150 appeals pending from the estate of Mr. Sewallis Shirley, and 116 from the estate of Mr. H. H. Shirley. The Commissioners state they are satisfied that Dundalk, which was selected with the consent of the professional men on both sides, is the proper place for the hearing of the cases, and they are unable to change the arrangements they have made.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked, whether there was any reason that the ordinary practice of the Land Commission should not be brought more into conformity with the convenience of the parties concerned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he knew the Land Commissioners were extremely anxious to meet the convenience of all parties engaged.

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked, was it not a fact that in this case, and in the case mentioned previously, the Sub-Commissioners were holding the sitting actually outside the county in which the tenants resided?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was quite possible that a place outside the county might be the most convenient, taking all the circumstances into consideration.

INDIA—THE UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVANTS—PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in India, that the Secretary of State recently sent out a despatch to the Viceroy in Council, suggesting that pensions of uncovenanted servants should be paid at a fixed rate of exchange, or anything to that effect; what, if so, was the reply of the Indian Government; and, whether he will lay a copy of the Secretary of State's despatch and the reply thereto upon the Table?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The statement made in India as described in the Question is inaccurate. The correspondence which has passed between the Secretary of State in Council and the Government of India on the subject cannot, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, be laid on the Table with advantage to the Public Service.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES BILL) — SUPERANNUATION AND PENSION OF THE POLICE FORCES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the conditions as to superannuation and pension under which the members of the Police Force, including the Chief Constables, entered the Service, will be in any way affected or modified by the provisions of the Local Government Bill?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The powers of Quarter Sessions as to superannuation and pension of the members of the Police Force are proposed by the Local Government Bill to be transferred to the Joint Committee of the Quarter Sessions and the County Council. Subject to this, those powers will not be affected. The police superannuation funds will be transferred to the County Council under Clause 63 (1) of the Bill; and they will be held by them for the same purposes, and subject to the same conditions, as they would have been held by Quarter Sessions if the Bill had not passed.

EAST INDIA—MR. TAYLER, EX-COMMISSIONER OF PATNA.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, for the convenience of hon. Members, the Government will lay upon the Table a reprint of the Minutes of Sir Barnes Peacock and Sir Henry Ricketts, with reference to a recommendation of Sir Frederick Halliday, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, that Mr. Tayler, Ex-Commissioner of Patna, should not be granted the Public Commission of Inquiry for which he had asked, but that the records of a certain case, formerly tried by Mr. Tayler during the Mutiny, should be submitted to the Judges of the Sudder Court of Bengal for their opinion and Report without the presence or further examination of Mr. Tayler; whether the Government would now be willing to submit Mr. Tayler's case to Sir Barnes Peacock for his decision; and, whether, as a fact, Mr. Tayler was ever informed that he was at liberty to demand a Commission, as recommended by Sir Henry Ricketts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Minutes referred to, which are inaccurately described in the Question, have already been laid before Parliament in No. 308 of 1879. The Secretary of State sees no necessity for reprinting them. The action of the Secretary of State in refusing to re-open the case of Mr. William Tayler has been approved by a large Parliamentary majority, and the Government cannot now reverse that policy. Mr. William Tayler was never entitled to ask for a Commission. In 1859 he was offered, as I before stated, an inquiry by the Sudder Court into his judicial conduct at Patna, which he declined.

SIR ROGER LETHBRIDGE, arising out of the answer of the Under Secretary, asked, whether it was not the fact that Sir Henry Ricketts did recommend that Mr. Tayler should be allowed a Commission, and said that the Commission, if asked for, would be granted?

SIR JOHN GORST: I must refer the hon. Member to the Minutes, which will speak for themselves.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, What are the names and dates of appointment of the 10 Resident Magistrates appointed by the Government?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) (who replied) said: The following are the names and dates of appointment of the Resident Magistrates in question:—N. L. Townsend, October 1, 1886; John Preston, October 1, 1886; O'Neil Segrave, October 15, 1886; Cecil Roche, October 23, 1886; Ulick Bourke, August 22, 1887; Colonel M. S. Tynte, August 22, 1887; F. G. Hodder, August 29, 1887; Lieutenant Colonel H. Caddell, January 17, 1888; W. H. Joyce, January 20, 1888; and G. H. Shannon, May 5, 1888.

MR. J. E. ELLIS asked, whether the House was to understand that Mr. Segrave had been appointed since the affair at Mitchelstown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; Mr. Segrave was appointed on the 15th of October, 1886; and, if I remember rightly, the Mitchelstown affair was in September, 1887.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, What are the names and dates of appointment of the County Court Judges in Ireland appointed by the Governments of the Marquess of Salisbury either between June, 1885, and January, 1886, or since July, 1886?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) (who replied) said: No County Court Judges were appointed between June, 1885, and January, 1886. Mr. Kisbey was appointed to Armagh and Louth on April 22, 1887; Mr. Fitz-Gibbon to Antrim and Belfast on November 19, 1887; and Mr. Webb to Donegal on December 27, 1887.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—THE ISLE OF DOGS—RAIN FLOODS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, Whether it is a fact that, on Tuesday evening last (26th instant), during a heavy rain storm, the basements of many houses in the Isle of Dogs were flooded with sewage, the depths varying from a few inches to two or three feet; whether, though the weather had been threatening for some hours, when the storm burst, the temporary engines at the pumping station were not at work, the engine only registering a 10 lb. pressure of steam; whether neither at the beginning nor during the continuance of the storm was any engineer in attendance at the station; how did the remissness occur; what steps do the Metropolitan Board of Works propose to take in the matter in order to prevent a repetition of the flooding; and, what compensation do they propose to give to those who have suffered from the overflowing due to the non-working of the pumping engines?

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): Several houses were flooded owing to the insufficiency of the local sewers to take the storm waters away quick enough into the Board's main sewers. One of the two powerful temporary pumping engines was at work when the rain commenced, and was more than equal to pump all the water that came to it. The engineer, whose duty it was to attend these engines, was on the spot at the time with his stoker and worked his engine. There was no remissness on the part of anyone connected with the Board. The Board is now erecting permanent engines for preventing floods in future, which it is expected will be completed ready for working next month.

INLAND REVENUE — REMISSION OF PENALTIES ON STAMPING INSTRUMENTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can state generally the conditions on which it is proposed to remit the penalties payable on stamping instruments executed prior to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1888; and, in particular, whether it is proposed that there should be any limit of time as regards the date of the instrument proposed to be stamped; and, when the Memorandum dealing with the matter will be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The question has been considered, and it is thought that the penalties payable on stamping the instruments in question may be remitted; but the concession will not, of course, extend to instruments which cannot in any case be legally stamped after execution without payment of a fixed statutory penalty, nor is it to apply to instruments in respect of which personal penalties have been incurred, or to articles of clerkship. In any case in which a longer period than three months may have expired since the unstamped or insufficiently stamped instrument was first executed, the remission of the penalty or penalties must be by way of repayment. The Board of Inland Revenue, however, will refuse the benefit of this concession in any case in which it may appear that the instrument is not voluntarily presented for stamping, but is presented in consequence of other circumstances—such as, for instance, the necessity of producing the instrument in Court, or of making good the title to property at the requisition of a purchaser. In the consideration of applications for relief from penalties payable on stamping instruments executed prior to the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, and not presented for the purpose until after January 1 next, the Board will have regard to the fact that the liability to the payment of such penalties might have been avoided had advantage been taken of the arrangement in question.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND) — SENIOR SCHOOL INSPECTORS — APPOINTMENT OF MR. STEWART.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the case that the recent appointment of Mr. Stewart to the office of one of the Senior School Inspectors in Scotland is the first departure in Scotland from the principle of promotion by strict seniority of service; and, whether any, and what, good reasons existed for doubting the ability of, or for passing over, the Inspector standing next to the vacancy, or the eight Inspectors following him, who were all senior to the Inspector appointed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have nothing to add to the answers which were given on the 12th of June to the hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Wallace) and on the 22nd of June to the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Macdonald Cameron).

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—PROCEEDINGS AGAINST CORNELIUS CURTAIN AND OTHERS—THE DUBLIN COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings in the Dublin Court of Exchequer on Wednesday last, on an application for a conditional order for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that there was no evidence to convict Cornelius Curtain and 10 others, who had been sentenced to a month's imprisonment by two Resident Magistrates for unlawful assembly; whether the Lord Chief Baron is correctly reported to have said that the order ought to be granted; that the questions raised were fit and proper to be argued before the Court; that it ought to be argued whether the assembly was illegal; that another—“ Question was whether the real object and meaning of the Plan of Campaign, as developed in the speech of Mr. Dillon in October, 1886, was matter that could be taken judicial notice of by the Judges without evidence, and that he would like to have that question argued ; ” that—

whether Baron Dowse dissented from the Lord Chief Baron on the jurisdiction of the Court, and whether, in consequence of this division of opinion, no Rule could be made; and, whether the 11 persons accused are thus left without any means of testing the legality of the sentence that they are now undergoing, notwithstanding the view of the Lord Chief Baron that it ought to be argued before his Court, whether the magistrates had taken the evidence required for a conviction?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: The facts are substantially as stated; but I am unable to vouch for the strict accuracy of the report of the Judgment of the Lord Chief Baron. The result of the application to the Exchequer Division, referred to in the Question, is that the accused cannot have recourse to the proceeding by habeas corpus for the purpose of testing the legality of their sentences. This arose from the difference of opinion prevailing among the Judges as to their jurisdiction in such cases, the Court being equally divided in the particular case referred to.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Then, may I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he still stands by the statement which he made very recently, which was that so long as the decision in Sullivan's or Brosnan's case—I forget which—stands it is in the power of anyone, so long as he is under sentence of Resident Magistrates, to go to the Court of Exchequer and have the case decided by that Court on a point of law?

MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir; I adhere to that statement as regards the full Court of Exchequer; but if the accident occurs that one of the Judges who hold that the jurisdiction exists is absent, there will then be an equal division of opinion, and no Rule can be obtained.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Then, are we to understand that in consequence of an accident happening these 11 persons are to be deprived of any chance of their case being authoritatively decided?

MR. MADDEN: In consequence of their application having been made at a time when the full Court was not sitting.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Then I will ask the Chief Secretary whether this case is to be left as it now stands?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I suppose they could have gone to the Court of Queen's Bench.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, as it is admitted in the answers of the Solicitor General that the Chief Baron stated that he would like to have argued before him the question whether the Judges could take official knowledge of the Plan of Campaign as being illegal without evidence being offered, whether, in the case of Mr. Dillon, no evidence of a conspiracy was offered, and no evidence of the Plan of Campaign was offered; and whether, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman will submit a case to his legal advisers as to whether Mr. Dillon is legally detained or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not accept the statement of facts just made by the hon. and learned Gentleman; but if he desires any further answer he should put the Question on the Paper.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Which statement of fact does the right hon. Gentleman not accept?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not agree that no evidence was given.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): As this unfortunate division of the Court of Exchequer affects the liberty of the subject, will the right hon. Gentleman take some means by a test case of obtaining an opinion which shall be binding on all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no conceivable method of doing that. The hon. Member appears to be under a misapprehension. These prisoners had two methods of obtaining a re-hearing of their case on the legal point. They might have gone to the Court of Queen's Bench, and they refused to do so; or they might have gone to the Court of Exchequer, and they went; but they chose to go at such a time that they did not get the full benefit that they might have obtained at another time. But that leaves the other remedy entirely untouched.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Has not the Court of Queen's Bench declared that it will not go behind the order of the Resident Magistrates, and will not look into the depositions in a case of certiorari or habeas corpus? Did not the Solicitor General tell us that eight Judges of the Queen's Bench had already declared that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The point was that they could go to the Queen's Bench to have a case stated.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: But this was not upon a case stated. The magistrates did not state a case.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Are these 11 persons assumed to know beforehand that Mr. Justice Andrews would chance to be sitting at Nisi Prius on Wednesday?

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Was there any case stated in these cases at all—was it not an application for habeas corpus?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman does not apprehend the point, and I shall explain it. The magistrates refused to have a case stated, and counsel for the prisoners might have gone to the Court of Queen's Bench and compelled the magistrates to state a case if they so thought fit. That is the point.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to answer my Question—whether we are to assume that these persons were to know beforehand that Mr. Justice Andrews would be sitting at Nisi Prius?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the counsel might have known.

Mr. Bradlaugh

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 — (PERSONS PROCEEDED AGAINST, &c.)

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay before the House an analysis of the Return, ordered May 31, 1888, as to "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," stating the dates and places of the several cases; the total number of cases; the number proceeded against under head or description of offence; the totals in each of discharge, acquittal, conviction, appeal, and result of appeal; and also the totals for the aggregate of cases of each description of sentence; under separate heads the number and names of Members of Parliament proceeded against, with the several heads of charge against them, and their classification for the purposes of prison treatment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): In accordance with a wish expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), I am having the Return, which was ordered on May 31, as to the proceedings under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act modified by the insertion of Provinces and Counties. I do not at present see any objection to giving the rest of the information asked for if it does not require too much clerical labour; and I think it will not, with the exception of the last sentence. I see no reason for giving under a separate head the names of Members of Parliament, which has nothing to do with a Criminal Return, though doubtless it might be used for controversial purposes.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked, if the right hon. Gentleman would object to complying with the last sentence in the Question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he could not give that information in a separate Return in regard to Members of Parliament alone; but he did not know that there was any objection to giving it in regard to persons in general. He should see if it would not require too much expenditure of labour.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman, who had control of the Irish Prisons Board, and who had confessed that he made a distinction in the prison treatment of priests, would give a Return under a special head showing the cases of priests who were in prison and the distinctions that were made in regard to their treatment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, if particulars in regard to the treatment were given in the case of the other prisoners, of course it would also be given in the case of the priests; but he could not give a special Return in regard to the priests any more than in regard to Members of Parliament.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CONVICTION OF MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.—THE "PLAN OF CAMPAIGN."

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report of the case of Cornelius Curtain and others on Wednesday last, when the Lord Chief Baron is reported as using the following words:—

"But the question was whether the real object and meaning of the Plan of Campaign, as developed in the speech of Mr. Dillon in October, 1886, was matter that would be taken judicial notice of by the Judges without evidence. He would like to have that question argued;"

and, whether, since Mr. Dillon was convicted of conspiracy at Dundalk before County Court Judge Kisbey without any evidence as to the object and meaning of the Plan of Campaign other than that of the speech referred to, he will take any steps to secure that the point of law shall be argued before the Judges, and their decision thereon ascertained without delay?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University) (who replied) said: Nothing fell from the Lord Chief Baron, in the case referred to, tending to throw the slightest doubt on the sufficiency of the evidence on which Mr. Dillon was convicted. On the contrary, in the course of the arguments he referred to evidence, such as was given in that case, as sufficient to prove the nature of the Plan of Campaign. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] The Government have no power to take the course suggested by the Question.

MR. JAMES STUART: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman lay on the Table of this House the Evidence and the Judgment in the case of Mr. John Dillon's appeal?

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Gentleman should put a Motion on the Paper for a Return in the ordinary way.

MR. JAMES STUART: If I move for it, will the Government give it?

MR. MADDEN: When the Motion is put on the Paper in the ordinary way I will consider it.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman on what authority he states that the Lord Chief Baron referred to the evidence in Mr. John Dillon's case; and is it not the fact that the evidence which the Chief Baron referred to was that of "Blunt v. Byrne"?

MR. MADDEN: I did not state that the Chief Baron referred to the evidence which had been given in Mr. Dillon's case. What I stated was that he referred, in the course of the argument that was the subject of the Question, to evidence of the same class as that given in Mr. Dillon's case as being satisfactory. I read from the Report, which I obtained in the ordinary way, in answer to an inquiry sent over as to what really occurred. I am informed that the Lord Chief Baron referred to evidence as to the illegality of the Plan of Campaign as given in the "Blunt v. Byrne" case, and in that respect the hon. and learned Member is accurate; but further on, in the course of argument, he is stated to have suggested to counsel for the prisoner that by obtaining a copy of United Ireland containing a statement of what the Plan of Campaign was, that would tell him all about it. And that evidence, in addition to the speeches which were proved in Mr. Dillon's case, constituted the evidence given in that case, and was the class of evidence to which the Lord Chief Baron referred in contradistinction to the evidence in the case before the Court?

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman what is the ordinary way in which the Government obtain Reports of this character; and, further, whether, in order to put an end to the controversy in regard to the terms of the Lord Chief Baron's Judgment, he will lay the Judgment of the Lord Chief Baron on the Table?

MR. MADDEN: My answer to that is the same which I have already given. We obtain the best information we can as to what has occurred. If the hon. Member wishes for a Return—I am not here to undertake on behalf of the Government—he can move for it in the ordinary way.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I wish to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, whether it is not the fact that the account which he gives of the Lord Chief Baron's Judgment conflicts with the account given in the public Press?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir; I am not aware of that.

Subsequently,

MR. SEXTON said: Might I ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if it is not a fact that a reporter in Dublin was engaged by direction of the Government to take a special note of the Judgment of the Chief Baron in the Killeagh case; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman did not quote from that Report in the course of the debate on Tuesday last?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): My impression is that there was no special Government Report at all.

MR. SEXTON: But did the Government engage a reporter to take a special note of the Judgment on this occasion, and did they quote from it the other night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for believing that such is the case.

MR. SEXTON: I will ask the Question again on Monday.

EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS).

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, and what steps the Government of India have taken, for carrying into effect the Resolution of this House of June 5 with respect to the Contagious Diseases Act and the Cantonment Acts in India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): A despatch has been sent to the Government of India bringing under their notice the Resolution of June 5. There has not yet been time for a reply to this despatch to be received by the Secretary of State.

RULES AND ORDERS OF THIS HOUSE—DIVISIONS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in consideration of the fact that Committees of the House now sit simultaneously with the House itself, and that great inconvenience arises from the difficulty in reaching the House from the Committee Rooms in time for a division, he will consider the advisability of proposing an extension before 4 o'clock of the time prescribed by the Standing Order between the ringing of the bells and the closing of the doors?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) in reply, said, this matter was regulated by Standing Orders, which left considerable discretion to Mr. Speaker. It was obviously improper to interfere with the Speaker's discretion, and the Government could not make any proposal.

DR. FARQUHARSON asked, if the Government were aware, not only of the inconvenience, but even of the danger to which hon. Members were subjected in having to rush from the Committee Rooms for the purposes of a Division

MR. W. H. SMITH supposed that the inconvenience and danger were incident to the position and the duties of Parliament. He was sure it was the desire of the Speaker to remove any danger and inconvenience to which hon. Members might be subjected.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE DEBATES OF THE HOUSE — LENGTH OF SPEECHES.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in the Debate on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) on Monday and Tuesday nights, the 16 hours devoted to the debate were occupied by 15 speakers only; and, what steps he proposes to take in order, without prolonging the Sittings of the House, to enable a larger number of Members to take part in the set debates of the House?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, that this was a question in which the Government ought to be exceedingly slow to interfere with the general discretion which must rest with hon. Members themselves. It was for hon. Members themselves to proportion their speeches to the importance of the questions with which they were dealing, and to the claims of other hon. Members to be heard. He thought he could best answer the Question by expressing the hope that all hon. Members would have regard to the claims and rights of other hon. Members and the due despatch of Public Business.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman would prevent the Chief Secretary for Ireland in future taking up all the time of the House on the last night of an important debate?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, that in answer to the hon. Member for Northampton, he had promised to state what the Business would be on Monday. The Government proposed to put Reports of Supply and one or two other Reports not yet confirmed by the House first on the Paper; they also proposed that an opportunity should be afforded to the Chief Secretary to bring in his Bills for the drainage of the three districts in Ireland which had been mentioned in the House; and after that Supply would be taken, but no votes as to which the evidence given before the Committee had not been circulated.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) inquired, whether the Government intended to take further time of the House from private Members on Tuesdays and Fridays?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, if it should be necessary for the Government to ask for further time for the discussion of the Local Government Bill, he would give the House ample notice. He rather relied to-day, however, on the assistance of hon. Members. [Mr. LABOUCHERE dissented.] The hon. Member said they were not to have the assistance. Of course, that was a plain indication of the necessity which might be imposed upon the Government. The Government would rely upon the assistance of the House to vote the measure now in possession of the House before they made further demands for time. He would see what progress they made to-day; and he hoped the House would render it unnecessary for him to ask on Monday for further facilities.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 28th June.]

[ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Powers of County Council.

Clause 15 (Entire maintenance of main roads by County Council).

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 7, after "shall," to insert "after the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety."—(Sir John Dorington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury) said, he last night mentioned the object of this Amendment, and the President and the Secretary of the Local Government Board expressed their opinion that the view which he took was an exaggerated one. He had reflected over the remarks they made, and he could not help thinking that he was correct in the view he took, and that the time between the period when the County Councils came into effective working, and that when they would have to take over the maintenance of the roads, was far too short for a satisfactory arrangement to be made for carrying out the new work. He, therefore, hoped the Government would assist those who would have the carrying out of this work by granting a longer extension of time than the period to the 1st of April. He did not insist in any way upon the 1st of April, 1890; he only mentioned that date because he thought it would be a convenient date. It was the date on which the present Highway Authorities would cease to exist, and the new District Councils would come into force; it was also the commencement of the financial year. These were the only arguments he had to advance in favour of that particular date; on the other hand, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman it would be a putting off of the work of the County Councils for a very long time. Therefore, he should be satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman were to name some earlier date—say, three months after the setting up of the County Council, or certainly six months would be better. The business to be undertaken would be very great in his county, and he could speak better for that than for any other county; they had between 800 and 900 miles of main roads, costing about £40,000 a-year. The setting up of a new organization to manage these roads would certainly tax the capabilities of the County Councils to a very great degree, and would be a very large tax upon their time at the commencement of their existence. It was suggested that they should hand over the management to the present authorities, that they should contract with those authorities to do the work. To a very great extent that would be a satisfactory arrangement, but to a certain extent it would not be a satisfactory arrangement. Take the case of counties where there were no Highway Boards at all, and where the County Councils would have to negotiate with an indefinite number of parishes with regard to the management of the roads. His own county, for instance, was about equally divided between Highway Boards and independent parishes. Some Highway Boards were extremely good, others were quite as defective in management as the others were excellently managed, and if he had anything to do in the matter he certainly would not recommend entering into contracts with some of those Bodies in regard to the main roads. It would take a considerable time to make these arrangements, and he certainly hoped that the proposal he had made, simply with a view of facilitating the working of the Act, would meet with the approval of the Government, or else that the Government would make some suggestion to meet him half way.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he felt the force of many of the remarks of his hon. Friend, but the difficulty he had was in departing from the date laid down in the Bill. His objection to the date fixed by his hon. Friend was that the new system of finance would come into operation at the beginning of April. He could easily understand that it would entail great complication of accounts if they were to say that for three months, which was suggested as a compromise by his hon. Friend, things should remain as they were. There did not seem really any tangible resting ground between the proposal in the Bill and the proposal of his hon. Friend, which would delay the operation of the Bill, so far as main roads were concerned, for 12 months. His hon. Friend had pointed out that they proposed to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), which would enable the County Councils to arrange with the District Councils to maintain the roads for three months, or six months, or 12 months; or for any period they thought necessary before they got their own organization into effective use. Although the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Sussex only dealt with a delegation to District Councils, the Government proposed towards the close of the Bill in dealing with District Councils to provide that District Councils should include any existing authorities. That Amendment would enable the County Councils to say to the Highway Boards—"We will delegate to you for whatever time we think fit the care of the main roads under certain conditions." In view of the fact that the elections for these Councils would take place in the early part of January, and that the County Councils would not take over the care of the main roads until the beginning of April, he could not but think there would be time for making the necessary arrangements. He, therefore, hoped that his hon. Friend would be content with the power which was given to the County Councils to make arrangements with the existing authorities. That power he thought would be amply sufficient to meet all difficulties the hon. Gentleman had foreshadowed.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he did not quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman meant by existing authorities. By Clause 3 all the powers of the Quarter Sessions had with regard to main roads and highways been handed over to the County Councils. That naturally included all contracts and arrangements now in existence. Speaking for his own county, and he had been a member of every county committee for the last 20 years, he was persuaded that this would upset everything during the first three months. At the present moment the roads were managed and repaired by the overseers of the parishes, and these overseers received the money due to them on the certificate of the county surveyor. In some cases the Quarter Sessions made arrangements with the Highway Board, and in that case they contracted for the maintenance of the roads for one year, and sometimes for three years, and even longer. Therefore, under Clause 3 the County Councils would take over all the contracts, liabilities, and arrangements of the county magistrates. But what was done by the sub-sections of Clause 15 which they were now discussing? They provided that the roads should be well maintained and repaired by the County Councils. It was quite true that the President of the Local Government Board proposed to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) which provided that the County Councils should, if they chose, delegate their powers to the District Councils, or to anybody else who could do the work better than they could; but the District Councils would not be in operation when the County Councils were first elected, and the real question was whether there would not be utter chaos and confusion during the first three months. He was afraid that under the arrangement which was being made the overseers of the highways during the last three months of the present financial year would scheme to do as little to the roads as possible; they would put very little material on them, and spend as little as possible in repairs; the proverbial stitch in time would not be taken, and the roads would be handed over in such a state that it would take at least three times the amount of money to put them right that would have been necessary to keep them in a state of repair. Of course, the Amendment before the Committee could not be accepted for financial reasons, though he did not think that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long) gave any good reasons why it should not be accepted. Possibly, the hon. Gentleman had spoken from his knowledge of Wiltshire; but the authority of the hon. Gentleman (Sir John Dorington), who had the reputation of being one of the ablest Chairmen of Quarter Sessions in England, was in direct conflict with that of the hon. Gentleman. What was wanted was a modus vivendi; they wanted it to be clearly understood that under Clause 3 all the liabilities and contracts would be taken over, and that Clause 15 would not come into force until such time as the District Councils came into existence.

MR. RITOHIE said, he did not quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman meant by a modus vivendi. He understood the right hon. Gentleman advanced arguments against the proposal, and that one of his arguments was that there were contracts now existing. If there were contracts existing there would be no difficulty, the roads would be repaired. The right hon. Gentleman also said that, during the last three months of the present financial year nothing would be done. But that argument would hold good whatever year was fixed. The argument was not a good one, because the County Authority at present only paid upon the certificate of the county surveyor one-half, and the Government paid one-quarter, so that if the present authorities did not repair the roads properly the county surveyor would withhold his certificate and the Government would not pay their quarter. Therefore, it seemed to him that the contingency which the right hon. Gentleman feared was not one which was likely to arise; but if it was, it was still as likely to arise 12 months hence.

MR. HENEAGE said, he did not object to the clause in the future, and did not wish that the operation of this provision should be suspended for 12 months. What he wished was that it should be clear on the face of the clause that the County Councils should take over the contracts as they stood, and should administer the roads in the same way as they were now administered, until the County Councils were able to delegate their powers. The County Councils would not have a staff at their command to manage, to maintain, and repair roads scattered over the whole county. He had spoken to several Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and they seemed to be of his opinion.

MR. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale) said, he hoped that the hon. Member (Sir John Dorington) would withdraw his Amendment. If the County Councils had to take over the whole management of the roads, he could well conceive that some longer period than was allowed might have been required; but he understood the Government intended to provide that the County Councils might delegate their duties to the District Councils. Under the superintendence of the county surveyor, there would therefore be very much the same system which was now working so well in most counties. He thought that it was simply wasting the time of the Committee to further press this Amendment.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, that all that was asked was that the present authorities should continue to have charge of the roads until the County Councils were able to undertake the duties. Personally, he believed that unless some such arrangement was made, the roads of the county would get into a lamentable state of repair.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes) said, it was as well that he should point out that under Clause 124 it was provided that all contracts, deeds, bonds, agreements, and other instruments existing at the present moment should be as binding in every way upon the new authority as upon the existing authority. He, therefore, failed to see how the contingency which his hon. Friend suggested could possibly arise. He could hardly credit that the county surveyor would allow the roads to be improperly repaired. He was convinced that in his own county, as in many others, the surveyor would take every precaution before he granted his certificate. No doubt, some difficulty in connection with financial arrangements might arise as matters now stood; but he thought that if by this Amendment they got rid of one difficulty, the probability was that they would be landed in others much greater.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) said, he objected to the word "delegation." There was no power whatever in the Bill to delegate this duty; and even if the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) did not imply delegation. He, however, thought that, on the clear understanding that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet be accepted, his hon. Friend (Sir John Dorington) would do well not to press his Amendment.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON said, that on that understanding he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley), in moving, in line 7, after the word "shall," to insert "save as to any part thereof situate in a borough," said, that the effect of the Amendment was to provide that those portions of main roads which were situated in boroughs should be exempt from the general obligation of being maintained by County Councils. The Committee would be aware that they were many complications in reference to the maintenance of main roads. The obligation to maintain them had been thrown upon the counties since 1807, but there were, in many places, important thoroughfares which were only distinguished from main roads by a technical difference. In regard, however, to the equity and convenience of the maintenance of main roads, the President of the Local Government Board must be aware that he had made a material difference in his scheme by the further concession to boroughs with a population of 50,000. By this scheme all such boroughs would be placed in the position of Quarter Session boroughs. There was hardly any subject upon which such a variety of considerations prevailed. There were many municipal boroughs in which there was not one yard of main road, while in others main roads were an important feature. He candidly confessed that of all the proposals that had been made for dealing with the question, that of the Government was least satisfactory of all. What was felt, and what he asked the Committee to consider, was that on the whole it would be better to treat all municipal boroughs exactly as they were proposing to treat county boroughs, and in the same way as they had heretofore treated Quarter Sessions boroughs. He wished the President of the Local Government Board to explain precisely how the concession would operate, especially in boroughs where there was a considerable amount of main roads, costing large sums of money to maintain. It would be obviously unjust to draw a revenue from municipal boroughs of large rateable value for the maintenance of external roads, and to leave to them the burden of maintaining all the other thoroughfares which were hardly distinguishable from main roads. The right hon. Gentleman had placed a number of Amendments on the Paper, from which it would appear that he was desirous of meeting the difficulty and arriving at some amicable arrangement between the Municipal Authorities and the County Councils; but he was not prepared to say that those Amendments satisfactorily met the case of main roads. He, therefore, confidently pressed his own proposal, believing that it was a proper solution of the difficulty, and it simply involved the carrying out of a practice which had hitherto worked well, and which was the only arrangement up to 1878.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 7, after "shall," insert "save as to any part thereof situate in a borough."
—(Mr. Woodall.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was rather a wide one. He wished, first of all, that the boroughs which remained in the county should maintain their own roads, and draw their own revenues for the maintenance of them. That would mean, although the hon. Gentleman did not say how much, a portion of the duties collected within the municipal area. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman meant the whole of it. At any rate, his proposal went in that direction. Under the provisions of the Bill, boroughs not included within the districts of the County Councils would be able to maintain their own roads in their own districts in their own way, and they would receive a certain sum in aid derived from local taxation. Not only would the County Councils have the power of devolution, so far as boroughs and urban districts were concerned, but they would be obliged to devolve the power to any borough that applied for it. The County Councils would have no authority whatever to refuse the application of a borough to maintain its own roads. Therefore, as far as that matter was concerned, the hon. Gentleman might be sure that the boroughs and urban districts would have a perfect right to maintain their own roads within their own area. The hon. Member said that it would be very unfair to make such boroughs contribute anything towards the maintenance of roads outside their own districts. There he disagreed with the hon. Gentleman, and he was sure the hon. Gentleman, on reflection, would see that that was hardly a fair ground to take up, because the fact was that roads outside the borough district were very largely used for borough purposes, and the heaviest part of the traffic upon them came from the boroughs. In such circumstances it would have been extremely unfair to the farmers of the county, upon whom highway rates fell heavily, to make and maintain such roads at their sole expense. The Government recognized the importance of the question so much that they said, even in respect of the boroughs outside the counties that were to be formed into county boroughs, that they ought to contribute to the small tax proposed to be imposed on vehicles, even when they were taken out of the county for all other purposes. That being the case, he did not think the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was one which would commend itself to the fairness of the Committee. He did not know whether the hon. Member had Quarter Sessions boroughs in his mind. By the Amendment which would be placed on the Paper by the Government, Quarter Sessions boroughs would be entitled to appeal to the Local Government Board to have their main roads maintained by the County Councils, while their main road rate would be very small, and thus they would be placed in an infinitely better position than that which they at present occupied in respect of the maintenance of their roads. The position of Quarter Sessions boroughs at present was that they were not liable to contribute to the county rate for main roads. They maintained three-fourths of the cost of their main roads and received a contribution from the Government. They had never given anything to the county, nor had they received anything from the county. As the Government were now about to impose upon them the liability to contribute, it would be clearly unjust if the main roads were not to be maintained by the county. Therefore it was proposed by the Amendment he had placed upon the Paper that Quarter Sessions boroughs should have the right to have their main thoroughfares declared main roads maintainable by the counties. Under this Amendment he thought the boroughs would be in an infinitely better position than they were now. The County Councils would obtain a vote of money sufficient to enable them to maintain the main roads in the county. The whole cost of maintaining main roads throughout the country was £1,000,000 sterling. Hitherto £250,000 had been contributed by the country. That contribution would cease after the passing of the Bill, but in lieu of it a considerable amount of duties would be handed over to the County Authorities by means of the Horse and Wheel Tax, so that 9-10ths or 7-8ths of the cost of main roads would be provided for. The position of Quarter Sessions boroughs would be this, that if they had their main roads declared and maintained by the county, in return they would be liable to pay a rate. Quarter Sessions boroughs would be in a much better position than they were now, and, on the whole, the arrangements made in the Bill would be advantageous rather than otherwise.

MR. WOODALL said, he would point out that in all cases boroughs with a population of 50,000 would be entitled to become county boroughs; but there might be another municipal borough with precisely the same roads intersecting it which would be left out, according to the proposals of the Government. Did he understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that, having carefully considered the circumstances of such boroughs, the new arrangements would be equally and equitably applied to all?

Mr. Ritchie

MR. RITCHIE said, it was impossible for him to say that he had considered the relative circumstances of individual boroughs, but his opinion was that the boroughs outside would not be placed in a disadvantageous position. They would have to maintain their own roads, but would receive a portion of the new licence duties levied in the county, and they would receive a certain contribution from the Wheel Tax.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) said, he objected to the Amendment on the ground that every proposal of the kind would largely increase the expense, and would multiply the authorities who would have to deal with the roads. Some hon. Members were under the impression that certificates in reference to roads were given by competent road surveyors, but in many parts of England they were given by the magistrates themselves, and were not worth the paper they were written on.

MR. WOODALL said, that in most cases Boroughs possessed competent and efficient surveyors, steam rollers and other appliances, and he assumed that whatever arrangements were made under the Bill the roads would be under the superintendence of the competent staff, which in boroughs had now to deal with them.

MR. HENEAGE said, he should like to know why municipal boroughs should not have the privilege of maintaining their own roads as well as Quarter Sessions boroughs?

MR. RITCHIE said, the right would be given not only to municipal boroughs but to urban districts.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen) said, the question was one of great importance to the county he had the honour to represent. He understood that under the arrangement proposed by the Government a portion of the licensed duties were to be assigned to the maintenance of county roads even within the boroughs. There were several boroughs in Lancashire which were not Quarter Sessions boroughs, and which contributed in the ordinary way to the county main roads. He wished to know what was to be their contribution in future towards the maintenance of main roads in all parts of the county?

MR. RITCHIE said, his noble Friend must remember that hitherto the Quarter Sessions boroughs had never contributed to the county at all, but, in future, not only would the boroughs which were not Quarter Sessions boroughs, and which were to be made county boroughs, but the county boroughs, inclusive of the Quarter Sessions boroughs, would contribute to the county roads a certain proportion of the Van and Wheel Tax. In return for the contribution to the county by such boroughs, which were not Quarter Sessions boroughs, the county had hitherto contributed one-half of the cost of the roads, but the contribution would now cease.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) wished to have a clear explanation from the right hon. Gentleman upon this matter. The right hon. Gentleman said that all boroughs would contribute in future, by means of the Wheel and Van Tax, to the maintenance of main roads. That was not at all clear. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, had an Amendment to Clause 30 on the Paper which it was rather difficult to refer to now, but which appeared on page 32 of the Amendments now before the House, and was as follows:—

“ In the case of the duties collected by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in respect of the licences for trade carts, locomotives, horses, mules, and horse dealers under any Act of the present session, those Commissioners shall certify the amount collected in each county in like manner as if the county included each county borough specified in the fourth schedule to this Act as situate in that county, and the amount as so ascertained shall be divided between the said boroughs and the residue of the said county in proportion to rateable value.”

In Lancashire, for example, if the tax were treated as a tax upon the county at large, and distributed according to rateable value, about one-half would go to the county outside the boroughs and one-half to the boroughs. That would only be giving to the county what fairly belonged to the county itself, and would not be a contribution from the boroughs to the main roads. It would only be a payment by the wheels in the boroughs which wore out the county roads towards the cost of those roads. He must point out that it was necessary for the Committee to consider the fact that in the Bill as it stood, or as it would be amended by the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the expense of main roads for the county would be very heavy unless the Van and Wheel Tax brought in such a large amount in diminution of the county rate as would really leave only a tenth of the expense to be paid out of the county rate. According to the best calculations they in Lancashire had been able to make, they were convinced that nothing of the kind would happen. They could not make out that they would be receiving much more in aid of the county rates for main roads than they were receiving from the Parliamentary grant. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee some more information on the point. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to make a great change in the law with respect to main roads. At present all the Quarter Sessions boroughs were exempt from all payment towards the expense of main roads. The Bill destroyed that exemption, and said that in future all Quarter Sessions boroughs should contribute to main roads. He thought that was a perfectly fair proposal; but instead of being content with this the right hon. Gentleman turned a large number of Quarter Sessions boroughs into county boroughs and again exempted them. Then his hon. Friend who had proposed the Amendment went far beyond the legislation of 1878, applying the exemption to all the boroughs mentioned in the Amendment. This proposal was really a little too strong, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would stand firm in resisting the demand.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, he thought that some of the Quarter Sessions boroughs would be rather hardly treated by this Bill. At present they did not contribute at all to the main roads of the county, but repaired their own main roads. It was now proposed to make them contribute by means of the Wheel and Van Tax and the Licence Duties, and also to make the rateable property in the boroughs liable to a main road rate. This was hardly equitable. If the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the high street of a large town should be considered a main road, in that case the entire position of matters would be altered. But this, he believed, it was not his intention to do. He did not think the rateable value of the Quarter Sessions boroughs ought to be placed under contribution to the roads of the county in addition to the Licence Duties and the Van and Wheel Tax.

MR. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, Prestwich) said, he hoped that the Committee would not regard this as a question between town and county, and he trusted that the President of the Local Government Board would stand firm in his opposition to the Amendment. In his constituency there were main roads for four or six miles between different boroughs which ought to be kept up for the purpose of the traffic which mainly passed from one borough to another.

MR. TOLLEMACHE (Cheshire, Eddisbury) asked whether the President of the Local Government Board had read a speech in The Times that day, made by Mr. Hibbert, in which it was said that in this Bill practically half the rateable value of Lancashire would be taken away from the rural part of the county. He wished to know whether the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to appoint a Commission on the subject referred to other counties as well as to Lancashire.

MR. RITCHIE said, that it did not refer to the county of Lancaster particularly, but it would affect all the counties of England and Wales. He had not had time to read the speech of Mr. Hibbert to which reference had been made, but he had had the opportunity and advantage of hearing Mr. Hibbert speak at the Local Government Board. He had pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman that there were two questions raised. In the first place, there was the question whether it was the case or not that the Quarter Sessions boroughs in Lancashire did not at present pay a sufficient amount towards the maintenance of the main roads. The deputation thought not, and that to deal with the question on the present basis would be unfair on account of that exemption. As to that point he was bound to say that he could not hold out any hope that the Government would be prepared to make any alteration. In this Bill they had been compelled to take the law as it stood, and where they found that exemptions existed they could not attempt to inquire whether such exemptions were right or wrong, but were obliged to take them as they found them. That being so, his hon. Friend would recognize the fact that, as a large number of the boroughs in Lancashire were Quarter Sessions boroughs and had never contributed towards the main roads, Lancashire was not being deprived of anything she had previously received as far as the boroughs were concerned. That was one point in connection with Lancashire. In the second place, he had pointed out that care must be taken that a fair and equitable adjustment was made as between the boroughs that were taken out of the county and the remaining portion of the county. On that point he had said that those concerned had good ground for making representations to the Local Government Board, and he had promised that he would consider the matter. The result of the consideration was that he had put down an Amendment on Clause 30, which, however, it would not be right or proper, nor would it be in Order, to discuss now. The idea of the Government was this, that as far as the existing application was concerned, they could not undertake to inquire whether the basis of assessment was right or wrong; but they ought to make provision that the county should not in any way be financially injured by the boroughs being taken out of them. As far as he understood the Representatives of the boroughs, prior to the decision which was arrived at which took certain boroughs out of the county, there was not a single borough Member who did not express entire concurrence with him that whatever provision was made care should be taken to secure that the contribution of the boroughs should continue to be paid. It was said, that it was not so much a question of finance, or whether they would gain or lose, but that they should be left to their own independent action. It was on that distinct understanding that he had enlarged, to so great an extent, the fourth Schedule, and he had no reason to believe that there was any strong feeling adverse to a fair adjustment of the financial relations between the counties and boroughs.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated with perfect accuracy and fairness the position taken by the large municipal boroughs in reference to the question, and he did not think there was the most remote desire on the part of the boroughs to depart from the original arrangement. The right hon. Member for Clitheroe (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth), however, had attempted to depart from it in another direction, and to put a burden upon the boroughs which at present they did not bear. He could assure his right hon. Friend that that proposition would be resisted to the utmost. He could quite understand that Lancashire was an exceptional county. For his own part he could understand that there was a difficulty; but, if necessary, it must be dealt with exceptionally by the House. But they should not have injustice done throughout the length and breadth of England simply on account of what was being done in Lancashire. He would recall the attention of the Committee to what the position of these main roads was. Prior to the passing of the Main Roads Act the expense of maintaining the roads was paid by the turnpikes. When the roads were dis-turnpiked, the counties had imposed upon them by the Act of 1878 the liability of contributing one-half, the other half being paid by the Local Authorities. The Quarter Session boroughs were exempt from that arrangement; but had to maintain the roads within their own area without receiving any contribution from the county. He quite admitted that with regard to small Quarter Sessions boroughs the arrangement would be perfectly fair; but the present legislation was intended to meet the case of the large boroughs. He would give, as an illustration, the case of a main road in Wolverhampton. That road was originally constructed out of the Consolidated Fund, and it formed the main road to Dublin by way of Holyhead. The Act imposed upon the borough of Wolverhampton the entire expense of maintaining that road at a cost of something like £200 a-mile. The borough of Wolverhampton did not ask for any exemption, they would still have to bear that burden, but the roads they had to maintain within the boroughs represented a rate of 1s. Therefore, in any re-adjustment of the burden of keeping the main roads in repair, they maintained that the county ought to make some contribution, which, at present, they did not.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he could not say that his view was entirely that of his right hon. Friend on that occasion. He had always desired that a Local Government Bill which created County Councils should make much of the county, and he wanted, as far as possible, that the boroughs should be part of the county, and that certain representative functions might be devolved upon them. But hon. Members on that side had incurred considerable disappointment owing to so many boroughs having applied, not unsuccessfully, to be taken out of the counties in which they were situate. He thought that these financial questions should be deferred until they had dealt with the constructive part of the Bill, and that they should then be approached with a view to setting them on a fair and equitable basis. He thought they could not advisedly carry further this discussion, so far as finance was concerned. He reminded the Committee that the Amendment on which they were engaged had for its object that the County Councils should have nothing to do with the repair and maintenance of main roads within boroughs. For his part, he was ready to make his acknowledgments to his hon. Friend, who had stated the case of the boroughs very fairly; but to say any borough, however small, should maintain its own main roads and not contribute to the county, would, in his opinion, be unadvisable, and if his hon. Friend were to press his Amendment to a Division, he should be compelled to vote against it.

MR. WOODALL said, there were many boroughs whose position in this matter of main roads was much more strikingly inequitable than anything he had been able to instance. He confessed that he found himself between two cross fires, and, being ready to meet the views of his right hon. Friend on every occasion, as far as he could properly do so, as well as to further the progress of the Bill, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment. He must, however, reserve to himself the right to raise this proposal again at a later stage when the right hon. Gentleman's scheme was more clearly understood.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin) said, the Amendment in his name had for its object to transfer the maintenance and repair of roads from the County Council, as proposed in the Bill, to the District Council, and the proposal, he thought, would probably receive some favour at the hands of the Committee, not only upon its own merits, but because he saw similar Amendments on the Paper in the name of other hon. Members. He ought, perhaps, to explain that the series of Amendments in his name were unanimously adopted by the Court of Quarter Sessions in his own county, and as it was his duty to bring them forward, he would state the case for them as briefly as possible. It was pointed out that the County Council was too large a Body to undertake the maintenance and repair of main roads, and that it would be better that this should be entrusted to smaller Bodies, which should take charge of the roads over smaller areas. In his own county there would be a Council of 68 members, who would meet at one convenient place; but there would be no less than 28 District Councils formed in the county, and it appeared to him that the maintenance of the main roads would be entrusted to them with greater advantage than to the County Councils. His Amendment, then, would provide that the administration and management should reside in the District Council, and the County Council should exercise a supervising power. At the present time, the Quarter Sessions had, by their Committees, undertaken the work, and the system had been found to answer very well, and he ventured to believe that, by the adoption of his proposal, a more efficient and economical administration of main roads would result than from the proposal of the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 8, after "county," insert "district."—(Baron Dimsdale.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'district' be there inserted."

MR. LONG said, he thought his hon. Friend could hardly expect the Government to accept this Amendment, because it would destroy what they believed to be one of the most useful provisions of the Bill—namely, that the County Councils should be directly responsible for the maintenance of main roads. His hon. Friend had stated that the existing arrangement worked extremely well. He did not deny that there had been a great improvement in the condition of main roads in his own county, but he thought that anyone who had taken part in the administration of road work in Quarter Sessions must realize that the existing powers of the Quarter Sessions were not adequate for the purpose in view. Although it was true that the certificate was not issued unless they were satisfied, at the same time it was frequently the case that the surveyor was prevented by his present position either from making any recommendations or from seeing that they were carried out. The Government believed, therefore, that the proposal in this clause was an improvement on the existing system, and for that reason did not find it possible to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, that as he had an Amendment on the Paper exactly identical with that of the hon. Member opposite, he wished to say a few words in support of the proposal to confine the administration of main roads to the District Council. He regretted the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board, because in his own neighbourhood there was a very strong consensus of opinion in favour of the principle embodied in the Amendment. The only difference of opinion was as to whether there should be something in the nature of a permissive system of contract between the County and District Councils such as he understood to be proposed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). From what he had heard on this subject in the county which he represented, it was obvious to him that a great saving of expenditure would result from the administration of main roads being concentrated in the District Council. There was an opinion in favour of something like an improvement on the 13th clause of the Highways Act, in order to ensure adequate supervision and management of highways. So far as he understood, there was an objection to the Highway Boards on the ground that they were not sufficiently numerous. Their administration was generally approved, and the transfer of their duties to the County Councils would, in his opinion, be satisfactory. He should willingly support the Amendment of the hon. Member, and he hoped there would be an expression on the part of other county Members on both sides of the House in favour of the principle for which he contended—namely, that the highway administration should be concentrated in the District Councils. If the Government could not accept the Amendment, he hoped they would adopt that of the hon. Member for Ashburton (Mr. Seale-Hayne), which would give the same power to the Rural District Councils as the clause gave to Urban Authorities.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield) said, he did not know what his hon. Friend meant by concentration of administration; but the meaning appeared to be that the main roads of the county should be parcelled out to the District Councils; which, to his mind, was as unsatisfactory and uneconomical a method of maintaining the roads as could be conceived. The roads in question were the main arteries of circulation through the counties from end to end, and they were now told that they were to be left to Boards of Guardians, every one of which had its own idea of road maintenance, some of them very unscientific, as well as their own peculiar views on the question of using local stone. He was of opinion that this matter must be dealt with as a whole by the County Council. Road-making, to be scientifically conducted, must be done with the best stone that could be procured, and he thought it stood to reason that the County Council would be better able to command the best stone than the District Council. For these reasons, he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hitchin (Baron Dimsdale).

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock) said, he agreed that the Highway Board system was an improvement on the old parish system; but the qualifications thought necessary for surveyors were not always high. He had known a case where the principal recommendation offered on behalf of a candidate was that his brother had held the post before him. He thought that the proposal of the Government, modified by the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), was much more likely to produce good road-making than that now before the Committee.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) said, he thought that, in framing this new Local Government Bill, it would be wise to borrow from the experience of South Wales, and place the whole of the main roads under the County Councils.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) said, that the proposal of the Government meant the establishment of a new staff different from that at present working in the counties. He did not know whether it was implied that the County Councils might maintain the roads in an efficient state by means of contracts with the District Councils; but, if so, he had nothing to say against the proposal.

MR. LONG said, the Government did not propose to entail on the County Council the providing of the machinery for the maintenance of the roads. But power was given them to maintain the roads, and if they believed they could do that more economically and better through their own surveyor they would have the right to do so. On the other hand, if they believed they could do the work more economically and better by contract with the District Councils and the present authorities, they had power to do so; and there would be no necessity for the new machinery to which the hon. Gentleman had referred.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in line 8, page 12, after "situate," insert "and no tolls, commonly called turnpike tolls, shall be collected in South Wales."—(Mr. A. Thomas.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he might spare the hon. Gentleman some trouble by pointing out that, under the new condition of things, Wales would in future be in the same position as any other part of the country as regarded main roads. The counties would collect their own Licence Duties, and it would, therefore, seem unjust that the toll system should be continued. It was, he believed, the unanimous opinion of the people that the tolls should be abolished, and the Government were prepared to accept the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. But he would ask him not to press for the insertion of the words here, because they would come in rather awkwardly, but be satisfied with his assurance that he would be prepared hereafter to carry out his wishes either by Amendment or by means of a new clause.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town) said, he agreed to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and pointed out that the main roads in South Wales having, with regard to turnpikes, been dealt with in a special manner, it was the desire of the inhabitants that they should now be placed in the same position as the rest of the Kingdom.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY (Hereford) said, he might point out that funds for the roads were provided not only by tolls, but by a county road rate of a special character; that was to say, its incidence is not the same as the ordinary county rate; and the tenant could recover it from the landlord. He rose to express a hope that when the clause of the right hon. Gentleman was brought in, he would see that the county road rate was also abolished.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS said, that Clause 15, which provided that the cost of maintaining the main roads appeared to him a more appropriate place for introducing the Amendment. At any rate, Clause 46 was not the proper place.

MR. RITCHIE said, the subject was one which must be dealt with rather comprehensively. It could not be dealt with in a line or two, and his own opinion was that it was a fit subject for a new clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, the law with regard to foot-paths was not very clear. An hon. Friend had told him of a case in point; it appeared that the Authorities, owing to the uncertain state of the law, were keeping in repair a path out of Cheltenham rather than run the risk of not repairing it. That was not his view of the case, although he was bound to say that he had spoken with one or two professional men in his Division of Sussex, who said that if they were to take over the main roads in towns they might be liable for the repair of the pavements at the side as well as of the road itself. He believed the Committee would think it unjust that the County Councils should be compelled to pay for these pavements. Again, he might point out that some of the towns might think it right to have wood or stone pavements in the roads, and it would be manifestly unfair that the County Councils should have to pay for that. The right and proper course was to repair the road as it had hitherto been repaired, and maintain it in a condition fit for the conveyance of the through traffic. He believed his right hon. Friend was prepared to accept the Amendment he had placed on the Paper with a certain modification, which, if it met with the approval of the Committee, he (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) was willing to accept; but he would like to hear his right hon. Friend's views on this question, which was of undoubted importance. Some of the foot-paths he had referred to were made for the benefit of a particular parish, or for some special purpose, such as making and raising a path so as to get dry to church, and did not form part of the main road; and it would be very unwise to allow the repair of these to be taken over by the County Councils. For these reasons he begged to move the Amendment he had placed on the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 9, leave out "and," and insert "but such main road shall not be deemed to include any footpath or pavement by the side of such road, nor shall the county council be required to maintain or repair a road further or otherwise than is necessary for maintaining the same in a condition fit for the conveyance of the through traffic."—(Sir Walter B. Bartelot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, his hon. and gallant Friend's Amendment divided itself into two parts, one of which related to the question of foot-paths, the other to the condition in which main roads should be maintained. His hon. and gallant Friend said truly that the law was not as distinct on this matter as was desirable; but certainly so far as the question of the pavements was concerned he did not think there could be much doubt that no liability rested with the county to maintain those at the side of the main roads in boroughs. With regard, however, to footpaths in the rural part of districts he thought the practice was different, and that the rule had been that the county should contribute towards the maintenance of such foot-paths. He believed the words of the Turnpikes Act were pretty clear—namely, that the turnpike trustees were authorized to make and repair causeways for the use of passengers at the side of turnpike roads; but the following section provided that they were not to make or repair any footpath in a village or town. He should wish his hon. and gallant Friend, therefore, to accept an alteration of the first portion of his Amendment, which would show clearly that no obligation should lie on the County Council to maintain any paved footpath—that he should leave out the words “footpath or pavement,” and insert “any paved or pitched causeway or pavement.” That he thought would carry out the desire of his hon. and gallant Friend in that respect. With regard to the other portion of the Amendment dealing with the repair of roads, he might point out that the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend amounted to the division of the repair of the roads into two parts—the first related to the part which had to do with local traffic, and the second to that required in the county for through traffic. If the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet were inserted in its present form, he could easily imagine that a conflict of opinion might arise between the District and the County Councils as to the interpretation of local as distinguished from through traffic. It would be extremely undesirable that any such conflict of opinion should arise, and it seemed to him to be a plain duty to maintain the roads in a proper state of repair, no matter whether it was out of repair on account of local or through traffic. But his hon. and gallant Friend said that the Town Authorities might take it into their heads to put down wooden or stone pavement. He would, however, point out to him that by this Bill a Town Council, if it desired to maintain its own roads, would only be able to call on the County Council for a contribution on the same basis as that on which the contribution was now made, so that it did not seem that the case which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had suggested was at all likely to arise; and, further, he believed it would be seen that if the road through a town or urban district were pitched or paved in any way it might cost considerably less to repair—although the original cost might have been great—than would be the case if the ordinary pavement had to be used. Therefore, he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not think it necessary to press the latter part of his Amendment, but adopt his suggestion with regard to the first part, in which modified form the Government were, as he had said, willing to accept it.

MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay) said, he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend, who seemed to think that the footpaths at the side of main roads were not maintainable by the Main Road Authorities. He knew, however, that in the county of Devon the cost of maintaining footpaths, which existed during the time when the main roads were turnpike roads, had always been allowed. It seemed to him that the paths must be kept up by someone; and, therefore, if it were not done by the County Council it must be done by the District Council, and then there would be two surveyors side by side engaged upon the same road. There were many cases of main roads in rural districts running between two large towns, for the sake of which towns only the footpaths were kept up, and it would, therefore, be unfair to throw the cost of their maintenance upon the rural districts. He also reminded the Committee that many roads were declared main roads because they led to railway stations situated outside the urban districts which used them; those roads had paved footpaths—he knew of an instance—and, therefore, the whole cost of them would be thrown upon the rural districts.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) asked if the right hon. Gentleman meant footpaths wholly pitched and paved, or did he mean to include those which had a curb at the side?

MR. LLEWELLYN asked with whom the maintenance of the footpaths, which were of importance in the localities in which they existed, was to rest?

MR. RITCHIE said, he had not proposed that footpaths should be excluded from the Bill. The Amendment he suggested would only exclude pitched or paved causeways or pavements.

MR. LLEWELLYN said, he took exception to that. Someone must take charge of the footpath, whether paved or otherwise, and the proper authority to do that was the one which had charge of the roads.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool) said, they were now engaged in transferring certain powers from Quarter Sessions to the County Councils, and he submitted that it would be more convenient not to discuss upon this clause the question of amending the Highways Act of 1878. The only way in which they ought to discuss the District Council was in its relation to the County Councils and their power to discharge the powers of Quarter Sessions. He suggested that his hon. and gallant Friend should withdraw his Amendment.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) said, he considered that this was the most important Amendment that had been considered by the Committee. He might point out that a large portion of the footpaths in county towns were continued a considerable distance beyond the latter. They were often constructed of cement and asphalt, and it seemed to him that they were made for the convenience of the parish people, and, consequently, that it would be a great injustice if the cost of maintenance were thrown upon the County Council. He hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would persevere with his Amendment.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) said, that as the law at present stood no person had a right to make enclosure within 15 feet of the centre of the road; and if the footpaths were left in the condition they would be in under the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet, they would, to a great extent, become of the nature of common land, and adjacent owners would have an inducement to make illegal encroachments upon them. There would then be fences instead of the pleasant strips which now border many roads on either side. He thought that would be the effect of the Amendment, and, therefore, hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press it.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, he thought the Committee would do well not to attempt to amend the Highway Act. He thought the hon. Member who last spoke had exposed one of the objects of the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend would see that the opinion of the Committee was largely in favour of his Amendment not being passed. He sympathized with every attempt to amend the law, but their labours would be considerably increased if they were to attempt to make all the alterations suggested. He thought it was the opinion of the Committee that the law at present provided security for the County Council never being called upon to do more than was necessary in respect of the roads, and he trusted, therefore, that his hon. and gallant Friend would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the Amendment he was about to propose, whilst enabling the County Council to hand over to District Councils the repair of main roads, yet retained in the County Council those powers which he thought it absolutely necessary that they should possess in order to insure that the main roads should be kept in a good and efficient state. The noble Lord the Member for the Petersfield Division (Viscount Wolmer) had said that it would be better if the County Councils could maintain and keep the roads in repair; but he thought the noble Lord would consider that the proposal he made was one which would work well, and be far more economical in its results than a system under which two surveyors would be working side by side. In the interests, therefore, of economy and efficiency he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, at end of line 17, insert—“(4.) The county council and any district council may from time to time contract for the undertaking by the district council of the maintenance, repair, improvement, and enlargement of, and other dealing with any main road, and, if the county council so require, the district council shall undertake the same, and such undertaking shall be in consideration of such annual payment by the county council for the costs of the undertaking as may from time to time be agreed upon, or, in case of difference, be determined by arbitration, in manner provided by this Act.

“(5.) Provided, that in no case shall a county council make any payment to a district council towards the costs of such undertaking as respects any road, or towards the costs of the maintenance or repair of any road by an urban authority, until the county council are satisfied by the report of their surveyor, or such other person as the county council may appoint for the purpose, that the road has been properly maintained or repaired, or that the improvement or enlargement of or other dealing with the road, as the case may be, has been properly executed.”—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

Mr. Matthew White Ridley

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton) said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect as that of the hon. and gallant Baronet, and would, therefore, say a few words in support of the principle involved. He thought there was a very strong desire in the counties that the District Authorities should have power to retain the control of their own roads. The Rural Authorities desired to be vested with the same power as was proposed to be given to the Urban Authorities, and he was at a loss to understand why they should not have it. He believed it would be productive of greater economy that this should be done, because the District Authorities would have their own staff for the maintenance of the roads; he was perfectly confident that they would repair more efficiently and economically the portions of the main roads which passed through their districts than would be the case under the system proposed in the Bill. Moreover, he believed, the inhabitants of the districts would be the best people to keep watch upon the roads, and to compel the District Authorities to keep them in order; and the public at large would, of course, be protected, because the County Inspector would see that the District Authorities maintained the main roads in proper condition. Under these circumstances, he sincerely hoped that the Government would accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet.

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) said, he hoped that if the Amendment were accepted, the word "annual" would be struck out. It was well known that at times it was much more economical to pave old roads than to go on repairing them. It was desirable that the payment for this should not be made by annual payments, but in one lump sum.

MR. LONG said, the Government were prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as it stood. The Government, however, could not accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Ashburton (Mr. Seale-Hayne) that the same power should be conferred upon the Rural Authorities as upon the Urban Authorities, because it would not fall in with their proposal that the maintenance of the roads should fall on the County Council. With reference to the point raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, he did not think it necessary to take out the word "annual," because whether the money was spent in one year or three, the authorities must expend what was necessary to keep the roads in a proper state of repair.

MR. STANSFELD said, he could hardly understand the necessity for the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE pointed out that the proposed arrangement would be useful in the case of where a strip of road belonging to a rural area came between two Urban Authorities, the maintenance of which it would be too costly for the County Council to keep in their own hands.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he thoroughly approved the Amendment, which was a step in the direction of economy, a principle too often lost sight of in the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN said, the object of the Amendment which he rose to propose was to do away with a hardship only recently discovered by Local Authorities. By a decision of the Court of Appeal this year an Urban Authority had had to pay out of its own pocket the cost of paving a road with paving blocks, as it was held that that did not come under the head of maintenance. A great injustice had been inflicted, because in this case the work, which cost £80, would have lasted for 10 years, while the cost of macadamizing the road would have come to £10 annually during that time. In this latter case the Urban Authority would get three-fourths of the cost returned to them, and so would really only have had to pay £25 spread over 10 years. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment he was about to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 24, after the word "same," insert the words, "and for the purpose of the maintenance, repair, improvement, and enlargement, and other dealings with such road, shall have the same powers, and be subject to the same duties as a highway board."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LONG said, that the Government were prepared to accept the first Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

[Eleventh Night.]

because it appeared that this section of the clause did not confer on the Urban Authorities quite sufficient powers; that was to say, not quite the same powers that the preceding sub-section of the clause conferred on the County Councils. He did not know whether he would be in Order in referring to the second Amendment which the hon. Gentleman regarded as consequential, but which could not be accepted by the Government as a consequential Amendment. If the Government were to accept the hon. Gentleman's second Amendment the result would be that the County Councils would be liable to be called upon to repay to the District Councils the expenses incurred not merely in repairing the roads, but in the improvement and enlargement of them, and of course the enlargement and improvement would include the widening of streets or the buying up of property. It must be evident to the Committee that it would be impossible to lay on any County Authority any such burden. Of course, the Government recognized that there was some grievance in a case such as that cited by the hon. Gentleman; but it was impossible to render the County Councils liable to the very heavy expenses in question. The Government would accept the first Amendment, which dealt with the powers of the Urban Authority, but they could not accept the second Amendment, which, as he said, threw on the County Councils liability which they could not reasonably be expected to bear.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN said, he now begged to move to insert "improvement or enlargement" after "repair" in line 26. This Amendment raised a very important principle indeed, and it was one he really hoped the Government would see their way to accept. Of course, he did not wish to insist upon the insertion of the particular words he proposed. He was entirely at one with the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long) in saying it would be absurd to expect the County Councils to pay for the making of streets or the buying up of property. He had no idea that the words he proposed would bear such a construction, and therefore he was willing to accept any proposal the Government might make to obviate such a rendering. The point he had in view was quite clear and distinct. He had in mind, as he had said, one case—it was one of a great many instances—in which the Leek Improvement Commissioners spent £80 in paving a short piece of road. By that they effected a great economy, they saved an annual outlay of £10 a-year for 10 years. If, instead of doing that, they had gone on expending £10 a-year for 10 years, they would have spent £100 in all. They would have got £75 back again into their own local coffers, and therefore they would have only laid a burden of £25 upon the Leek people extending over 10 years. Instead of that they spent £80, and when they had done so, they had to bear the whole burden themselves. No one knew that was the state of the law until this year. If it was an old and well-established law he would not press this point so very much; but a decision in the matter had only been given so late as the 7th of May. All that was asked was that this defect should be remedied. He would accept any words which would remedy it, and he earnestly appealed to the Government to consider the matter favourably.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 26, after the word "repair," insert the words "improvement or enlargement."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HARRY T. DAVENPORT (Staffordshire, Leek) said, that Leek was in the Division of Staffordshire, which he had the honour to represent, and he could confirm what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. M'Laren) had said as to the Leek case. When the street had been paved with blocks the Quarter Sessions, in the exercise of that economy which was one of their greatest characteristics, refused to make their contribution; the case thereupon came before the Courts, with the result mentioned. He hoped that some interpretation of the word "maintenance" or "improvement" would be inserted, which would meet such a case as this. He understood that the hon. Gentleman was prepared to vary his Amendment in any way which the Government might desire, and he trusted that the Government would be able to see their way to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought that if they left out the word "enlargement," and agreed to the words "improvement with regard to paving," the difficulty would be met.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought that his Amendment would cover the matter, because it said that the County Councils might do so-and-so, and he thought that that was all that was necessary.

MR. BRUNNER said, that the hon. and gallant Baronet's (Sir Walter B. Barttelot's) Amendment did not quite cover what might be an exceptional or temporary provision such as was required in the Leek case. He suggested to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that provision might be made for an agreement between the County Council and the District Council which would meet such a case as the one in point.

MR. RITCHIE said, that that was exactly what his hon. and gallant Friend's Amendment which had been added to the Bill did, because it said—

"The county council, and any district council may from time to time contract for the undertaking by the district council of the maintenance, repair, improvement, and enlargement of, and other dealings with any main road, and, if the county council so require, the district council shall undertake the same."

MR. STANSFELD said, that, as he understood the position, they were now dealing with the case of an Urban Authority having elected to take charge of the main roads within its own limits; they were not dealing with the case where the District Council and the County Council had come to an agreement. His hon. Friend the Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren) had brought to the notice of the Committee a legal decision which, as he understood it, was this—that where the Local Body, instead of repairing a main road in the old style, had repaired it in an improved style, it had been held not to be repaired, but to be a re-making of the road, and that thereupon it had been held that the Local Body must bear the whole cost of such remaking. What had been done might prove an economy in the long run; but still the Local Body had no claim at all for a contribution. He was sure that everyone in the House wished the County Council to contribute a fair proportion in respect to what was necessary for the maintenance of the main roads within the limits of a smaller district. It might be that, where there was a great deal of traffic, paving would, in the long run, be more economical; but whether it was more economical or not, the County Council, according to the legal decision, would get off without any contribution whatever. It was not always easy to find a way, on the spur of the moment, of getting out of a difficulty; but it occurred to him that a remedy might be found by inserting, after the word "repair," in line 26, the words "or reasonable improvement."

MR. FULLER (Wilts, Westbury) said, that the difficulty might be met if they were to put in the Bill a definition of what was "maintenance." There were many other things besides paving which might come under the heading of "maintenance;" and, therefore, it was as well that there should be a definition of the word.

MR. RITCHIE said, he understood that the point was that there should be some provision by which a district should have some kind of claim for reasonable improvements made in their roads; and clearly, of course, it would be to the interest of the County Councils, who had to pay for the maintenance of the roads, that reasonable improvements should be made, because in that case the cost of maintenance would be less. If the hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren) agreed, the Government would accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) subject to future consideration, in case it did not quite meet what was wanted.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was quite prepared to accept the Amendment suggested by his right hon. Friend, and therefore asked leave to withdraw his original proposal, and he would then move the words suggested—namely, "or reasonable improvement."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 26, after the word "repair," to insert the words "or reasonable improvement."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. RITCHIE said, he had now to propose to leave out the words—

"In like manner and on the like conditions as the contribution towards such costs is directed by the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, to be paid."

The reason he proposed to omit these words was that he found, from a great many communications he had had, that they were likely to be misunderstood. The Bill only provided for the payment by the county of one-half the cost, and a great many of his correspondents outside the House and inside the House seemed to think that the retention of these words would imply, at any rate, that the contributions of the county should only be the same as were specified. The words were not at all necessary, and he proposed to omit them.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 26, to leave out the words from the word "road" to end of line 28.—
(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

MR. BRUNNER, in moving an Amendment which stood in his name, said, he supposed he would hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether the omission of words they had agreed to would affect the Amendment?

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 26, after the word "road," to insert the words "to the extent of three-fourths of such cost, but otherwise."—
(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, it was quite evident that the insertion of these words would be a total departure from the principle of the Bill. They had provided the County Councils with what was considered adequate funds; they called upon the Councils to maintain the whole cost of the roads, and the hon. Gentleman now proposed to relieve them of one-fourth of that cost.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. RITCHIE, in proposing to leave out from "sum," in page 12, line 30, the words—

"Based on the average expenditure on the road during the three years next before the passing of this Act, or the date of the road becoming a main road (as the case may be),"

said, it would be seen that in the Bill they proposed to say that the annual sum should be paid on the average expenditure during the three years before the passing of the Act. He had found, from a great number of communications he had received, that this basis was a basis which most of those who were interested desired to alter. Some correspondents suggested that the term should be three years, some five, and some seven. The Government, however, thought, on the whole, that it would be desirable not to lay down any absolute basis at all; and he, therefore, begged to move the omission of the words.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 30, to leave out from the word "sum" to the second "as" in line 32.—
(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'based on the average expenditure,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he thought there was a little misconception in using the word "contribution." He could quite see why the right hon. Gentleman had left out the last three lines of the preceding sub-section. If those lines had remained in the clause, all that the County Council would have been called upon to contribute would have been one-half of the cost of the main roads. "Contribution," which was the word used in this sub-section, was rather like "subscription;" the payment might be a large one or be a small one. He certainly thought that some other word should be substituted for "contribution."

MR. RITCHIE: Payment.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: The alteration could be made on Report.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. FULLER, in moving the insertion of the words "from time to time" after "as may be," in line 32, said, unless those words were put in, the fixed annual sum would not be alterable from time to time, as the circumstances altered in the different rural districts. The wear and tear on the roads might be increased or decreased in certain circumstances, and the contributions should, therefore, be varied from time to time.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 32, after "as may be," insert "from time to time."—(Mr. Fuller.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. BRUNNER, in moving in the same page to leave out the word "arbitration," in line 33, and insert "the Local Government Board, after inquiry," said, he moved that Amendment at the request of the Association of Local Boards and other Sanitary Authorities, a very important Body which represented such authorities over a very large proportion of the country. They desired him to say they were so thoroughly satisfied with the action of the Local Government Board in these local inquiries that they would very much prefer being left in the hands of the Local Government Board. A good many of them had experience of arbitration, and it was not at all a pleasant experience. When the Local Government Board did its work well, and the authorities over whom it ruled were perfectly satisfied with it, he regretted to find—it might be through an excess of modesty on their part, but whatever it was he regretted very much to find it—that the Local Government Board was disposed to part with this work. He recommended this Amendment to the right hon. Gentleman, and trusted sincerely that he would accept it.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 33, to leave out the word "arbitration," and insert the words "the Local Government Board, after inquiry."—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'arbitration' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LONG said, he thought the Amendment was unnecessary, because if the parties did not agree upon an arbitrator the Local Government Board would be empowered to interfere.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he hardly thought that met the case. Arbitration was really a most expensive proceeding. He was not one of those who advocated denuding the Local Government Board of its powers. He thought that the Board exercised its powers most efficiently and economically, and he thought matters of this kind could certainly be settled in an hour or two by the Board, and at very little or no cost. In the interest of economy he asked the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, they must be very careful in this matter. The Local Government Board were perfectly willing to undertake any duties the House of Commons desired to place on the shoulders of the Board; but if questions of this kind were to be left for settlement by the Board, the House of Commons must be prepared for an increase in the Local Government Board Estimate. There was no Department of the Government whose officers were more hard worked than those of the Local Government Board at present. If the Committee thought it was desirable that this duty should be undertaken by the Local Government Board, it would not shrink from it; but the Board could not be expected to do the work without an increase of its staff.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, he hoped the Government would accept the proposal.

MR. HENEAGE said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that the other night they were discussing what powers should be transferred from the Local Government Board, and even from the Home Office, to the new County Councils. Now, it appeared, hon. Gentlemen wished to transfer back powers to the Local Government Board. [Cries of "No, no!"] At any rate, they wished to cast fresh duties upon the Local Government Board, which by this Bill they intended to get rid of. The counties were particularly anxious that decentralization should take place; and, if that was so, surely hon. Members did not wish to hand over to the Local Government Board that authority which they thought, in the interests of the country, they should be relieved of. He trusted the Government would not accept the Amendment.

MR. HENEAGE said, he would remind the Committee that this Amendment referred to disputes between the District and the County Councils, and the only question was whether those disputes should be settled by the costly method of arbitration or by the Local Government Board? What they were discussing the other night was the transference of the administrative functions of the Local Government Board, which they thought would be discharged better by the County Councils.

MR. RITCHIE said, it was his intention, if the Committee accepted this proposal with reference to arbitrations, to propose the insertion of words later on by which the cost of these arbitrations would be very greatly reduced. What he intended to propose was the appointment by the Local Government Board of an arbitrator, under rules and regulations fixed by the Local Government Board. It would not be necessary they should have their own Inspector to do the work, but they might make rules which would prevent the great expense which undoubtedly did attend many of these arbitrations.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he begged to point out to the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the arbitration was to take place in cases of disputes between the District and County Councils; and, therefore, it was clear that the County Councils could not adjudicate in their own case. With reference to the appointment of an arbitrator by the Local Government Board, he imagined that the right hon. Gentleman did not suggest that the arbitrator should be under the Board's control. The right hon. Gentleman would merely appoint a professional man, and he would charge very highly indeed for his arbitration work. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) did not wish to see the Local Government Board's Estimate increased, yet he would sooner vote for the addition of one or two Inspectors rather than that the County Councils should be called upon to defray the costs of arbitrations.

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government would accept the Amendment.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he hoped the Committee would not induce the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment. He thought it would be very much to be regretted if the Local Government Board was going to have its finger in the pie more than it already had under the provisions of the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words proposed be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT, in moving the insertion of the three sub-sections which stood in his name, said, the first sub-section was very important, because, as he understood, his right hon. Friend was anxious that the County Councils should have more power than the Court of Quarter Sessions now possessed with regard to main roads; that they should be more liberal, if he might use the term, in accepting and taking over more main roads than had as yet been taken over as main roads. In many parts of the country there were certain parishes and certain districts which had no main roads at all, and yet they were called upon at the present moment to contribute largely to the maintenance of main roads in other districts. As he read the Bill, it was the intention of the Government that if the County Councils thought there was a road which ought to be made a main road, they should have the power to make it a main road. That being the case, he thought everyone would agree that the road should not be taken over and repaired by the County Council, or by the District Council, if the County Council delegated its powers to the District Council, until the road had been put in a proper state of repair. There might be one road in excellent repair and another road which had been absolutely neglected, and certainly the district in which the road was situated ought to be made to put the road in repair before it was taken over by the County Council. The next two sub-sections were to enable the County Council, in the event of the District Council failing to do its work, to compel the District Council to do the work, or to do the work themselves, and charge the District Council with the cost of doing it. He thought these sub-sections were absolutely necessary in the Bill; and, therefore, he begged to move their insertion.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, after line 33, to insert—

"(6.) Where a county authority order a road to become a main road, such order shall not take effect until the road has been placed in proper repair and condition to the satisfaction of the county council.

"(7.) If at any time the county council are satisfied, on the report of their surveyor or other person appointed by them for the purpose, that any portion of a main road, the maintenance and repair of which are undertaken by any district council, is not in proper repair and condition, the county council may cause notice to be given to such district council, requiring them to place the road in proper repair and condition; and, if such notice is not complied with within a reasonable time, the county council may do everything that seems to them necessary to place the road in proper repair and condition, and the expenses of so doing shall be a debt of the said district council to the county council.

"(8.) If any difference arises under this section between a county council and a district council as to what is necessary for the maintenance of a road in a condition fit for the conveyance of the through traffic, or as to the refusal of the county council to make a payment under this section to the district council in respect of any undertaking or road, or as to any notice given to the district council by the county council to place a road in proper repair and condition, such difference shall, if either council so require, be referred to arbitration, in manner provided by this Act."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he was inclined to think that this was a very desirable Amendment. It was quite clear that if the county were to pay for the maintenance and repair, and had power to contract with the Local Authority for the repair and maintenance of roads, there ought to be some power by which they could see that the money they paid was properly laid out in maintaining the roads in a proper state of repair. He did not suppose anyone was prepared to take any exception to the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend, which merely provided security that the roads should be kept in a proper state of repair.

MR. HENEAGE said, he would be glad to support the Amendment so far as the provisions of Sub-sections 6 and 7 were concerned; but he did not think they ought to have Sub-section 8. The County Council surely ought to be the judge of whether the roads were in such a state that they were prepared to take them over as main roads. It would be for the District Council to apply to have the roads taken over, and they must put them in a proper state before they were taken over. If they accepted Sub-section 8 arbitration would be again necessitated.

MR. RITCHIE said, that if the Committee were disposed to accept the principle of the Amendment, he had one or two small Amendments to suggest. In the first place, "County Authority" should be altered to "County Council;" and, in the second place, he would ask the Committee to strike out the words—

"As to what is necessary for the maintenance of a road in a condition fit for the conveyance of through traffic, or as to the refusal of the county council to make a payment under this section to the district council in respect of any undertaking or road, or as to any notice given to the district council by the county council to place a road in proper repair and condition," as the Committee had declined to accept an Amendment in the same sense.

An hon. MEMBER: And leave out "arbitration?"

MR. RITCHIE: And "arbitration."

MR. WOODALL asked, whether there were any means by which the District Councils or boroughs could be compelled to make certain thoroughfares main roads? Under the Act of 1878 there was an implied obligation that certain roads such as those leading to railway stations and directly communicating between two places should be constituted main roads. Did the right hon. Gentleman contemplate that there should be any sort of power given to enforce that obligation upon the Local Authorities?

MR. RITCHIE said, the matter was one which hardly came under the clause. So far as Quarter Sessions boroughs were concerned, in which the County Authority had no power of declaring thoroughfares to be main roads, a provision would be inserted in the Bill by which the County Authority would be called upon to make such declaration. But the Government had not made provision in the Bill by which the District Councils would be able to compel the County Councils to declare a road to be a main road. It would be within the power of the County Councils to do that, and he should think they would be prepared to do it.

MR. WOODALL said, it was obviously in the interest of the County Authority to avoid increasing its liabilities by constituting main roads; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would give the matter his consideration, seeing that he was taking such great care that the County Authorities should not make the main roads, except under the conditions which the right hon. Gentleman had set forth.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER asked, whether it would not be well to follow this precedent in boroughs where streets were declared highways? There was no arbitration or dispute in the matter; but the Local Authority had to decide whether the street was made to its satisfaction before it took it over. He thought that before the County Authority was called upon to take over a main road, such authority should be satisfied that the road was in a proper condition. The County Authority itself, it seemed to him, should be the judge in the matter.

MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman means that that should be so, so far as Sub-section 8 is concerned?

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: Yes; I would take that sub-section away altogether.

MR. BRUNNER said, the same rule obtained in the rural districts under the Rural Sanitary Authorities at the present time. The Rural Sanitary Authorities were not bound to accept a road, unless it was put in proper order before being handed over to them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, that in Sub-section 6 it was provided that the County Council should be the authority over the roads, and that the roads should be made to their satisfaction; whereas Sub-section 8, as proposed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), made provision for disputes arising between the County Councils and the District Councils as to what might be necessary for the maintenance of a road in a condition fit for the conveyance of the through traffic, or as to the refusal of the County Council to make a payment under the section to the District Council in respect of any undertaking or road, and the sub-section provided for the reference of such difficulty to arbitration. But this might be held to apply to what the County Council might have a right to require to be done before taking over a road, and therefore he thought it would be better to leave out Sub-section 8 altogether. He would, therefore, move its omission.

Amendment proposed, to the proposed Amendment, to leave out Sub-section 8.—(Sir Richard Webster.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 8 stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

MR. STANSFELD said, that the substance of Sub-section 8 was practically contained in Sub-section 6, which was governed by Sub-section 7. Under Sub-section 6, the County Authority would determine whether it should order a road to be a main road; and, having satisfied itself upon the point and taken the road over, it would be bound to fulfil its obligations under the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act of 1878.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, it was because he considered that ambiguity would arise in interpreting Sub-section 8 that he moved its rejection. The County Council might say to the District Council or other authority—"We will not take over a certain road until you do something which we consider necessary for its maintenance in the future;" and under Sub-section 8 this might be supposed to amount to a dispute to be settled by arbitration.

MR. STANSFELD said, that in the event of any difficulty arising between a County Council and a District Council on a road becoming a main road, there would be a sufficient power already in the law to enable a settlement to be arrived at.

Question put, and negatived.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would consider the advisability of giving the District Councils a locus standi on the question of getting thoroughfares made into main roads? It was necessary to make roads leading to railway stations main roads, and yet in some cases the County Councils might refuse to take them over.

MR. RITCHIE said, he had already stated that this question would be considered at a future stage.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, there were new powers given under Sub-section 2 of this clause now before the Committee. The County Council, for instance, was to have power to turn a highway into a main road, and to contribute to the repair of a main road within the jurisdiction of a District Council without taking the entire management of such road upon itself. Well, those powers were liable to abuse, and he should like to have some explanation as to why County Councils were to have conferred upon them power not hitherto exercised by Quarter Sessions—power to contribute towards the maintenance of some highway in the county, while they did not take it over as a main road.

MR. RITCHIE said, that it had been reported to the Local Government Board that there were cases in which roads, though they were not main roads, were to some extent in the category of main roads, and in regard to which it would be advisable to give a County Authority power to make some contribution. He did not think the County Councils would be likely to abuse that power. There might be some cases where County Councils would hesitate to take over the whole responsibility for the maintenance of a road, and yet where they thought they might fairly contribute something towards their maintenance.

MR. BRUNNER said, he thought the County Councils might be trusted to do what was right in the matter. The next Amendment on the Paper was in his name—namely, in line 36 of the clause, after “highway,” to insert the words “including any public footpath by the side of such highway.” He had the authority of his hon. Friend the Member for the Radcliffe Division of Lancashire (Mr. Leake) to move the Amendment standing in his name—namely, after “highway,” to insert “or public foot-path. He would move that Amendment, therefore, in preference to his own. He begged to point out that this was a permissive right to the County Council, and that, therefore, the objection would not apply which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had urged with regard to the Amendment relating to public foot-paths already brought under his notice. It seemed to him a very great hardship that everywhere all over the country, that part of the road which belonged to foot-passengers should have been allowed to become not only less and less in area, but less and less fit for their use every year. He desired, in moving the Amendment, to obtain from the Committee an acknowledgment of the principle that the County Council, no less than the District Council, owed a duty to foot-passengers as well as to those who were wealthy enough to travel on wheels.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 36, after the word “highway,” to insert the words “or public foot-path.”—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. RITCHIE said, that he saw a similar Amendment to this down in the name of several hon. Members, and having given this power in connection with roads that were not main roads, he did not see why they should not also give it in connection with main roads.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HENEAGE said, he now desired to move the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse)—namely, in page 13, after line 8, to insert the following sub-section—

“Notwithstanding anything in the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, contained, county councils may at any time declare that any road now being or hereafter to become a main road has ceased to be a main road and has become an ordinary highway, and section sixteen of the said Act shall apply to such road accordingly.”

MR. RITCHIE: We have already provided a discretion to the County Council.

MR. HENEAGE said, he was aware of that; but he wanted to do something more than they had yet decided upon. After the Act of 1878 became law, owing to a great deal of through traffic which used to pass on certain roads being diverted by railways, many old turnpikes were made main roads that ought never to have been made so. This had been done very often by the Local Government Board against the wish of the County Authorities, and in such cases as those he desired to give the County Councils authority—he wished them to be able to declare that certain roads should no longer be main roads. When the Highways Amendment Act came into operation in Lincolnshire, they appointed a very strong Committee indeed to examine into all the roads, and they sent in a carefully prepared scheme to the Local Government Board, saying which roads ought to be main roads and which ought not to be main roads. They only recommended that six miles of dis-turnpiked roads should be made main roads, with the exception of some small pieces of thoroughfares near railway stations, but they agreed that many miles of other roads should be made main roads; but what was done by the Local Government Board? They sent down an Order, declaring that all dis- turnpiked roads should be made main roads, and did not take the slightest notice of any of the recommendations of the County Authority. The consequence was that in Lincolnshire they had 30 or 40 miles of main roads which had no right at all to be main roads, and that they had other roads which should have been made main roads but were not. He thought that by accepting the Amendment it would be found that they could decrease the main roads in Lincolnshire by one-half.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, after line 8, to insert the following sub-section—"Notwithstanding anything in 'The Highways Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878,' contained, county councils may at any time declare that any road now being or hereafter to become a main road has ceased to be a main road and has become an ordinary highway, and section sixteen of the said Act shall apply to such road accordingly."—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, the right hon. Gentleman probably had not seen that which had been brought to the notice of the hon. and learned Gentleman who was to have moved the Amendment. He referred to the decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, in which it was laid down that the power of deciding the point in question was clearly by Statute vested in the Local Government Board. Where Local Authorities desired to get rid of existing main roads they must apply to the Local Government Board.

MR. HENEAGE said, he was aware of that decision, and if he had known that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse) had not intended to move the Amendment, he (Mr. Heneage) should have himself put down a modified proposal on the Paper. This Amendment had been agreed to by the Lincolnshire Quarter Sessions, who desired that the County Councils should have the power to act in these matters without appealing to the Local Government Board. The Quarter Sessions thought the County Councils, who would be in possession of better information than the Government Department, would be the best judges of what should be done in the matter of deciding that certain roads should cease to be main roads.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, in the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Dundee (Mr. Firth), he begged to move the Amendment standing in that hon. and learned Member's name—to add to line 11, on page 13, "the provisions of this clause should not apply to the county of London." He did not know that the Amendment was absolutely necessary; but it was clear, for many reasons into which he would not enter, that the provisions should not apply to London, and therefore there could be no harm in putting the matter beyond dispute by specific words.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 11, add the words "the provisions of this clause shall not apply to the county of London."—(Mr. Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. RITCHIE said, he would point out that it would be much more convenient to discuss the point with regard to London when they came to the London Clauses.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL GUNTER (York, W.R., Barkston Ash) said, the next Amendment, which stood in his name, he moved in accordance with the resolution passed by the Quarter Sessions, having jurisdiction over the district to which he belonged. The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, gave certain powers in regard to local divisions in Lancashire called "hundreds." Well, in Yorkshire similar local divisions existed, but they were called "wapentakes," and as the Act only dealt specifically with "hundreds" it did not apply in the case of Yorkshire. They had therefore the anomaly that in one part of the country one system prevailed, while in a district immediately adjoining and only separated by the county line, through the absence of one word in the section of an Act of Parliament, a different system prevailed. Considerable inconvenience was necessarily the result. They asked in Yorkshire to be put on the same footing as the adjoining county of Lancaster, and as he wished to have the same law applied to other counties where this anomaly existed, he had used the words "all counties," and the words "in any other district."

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, at end of sub-section (7) add—
"Provided that, in construing that section, it shall be deemed to apply to all counties, and that 'hundred' shall include 'wapentake;' and any hundred or wapentake charged with the expense of the maintenance and repair of all the main roads situate therein shall be relieved from the cost of contributing to the maintenance and repair of any main road, or part thereof, situate in any other hundred, or in any other such district."—(Colonel Gunter.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman would scarcely press the Amendment. He was not sure, in fact, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman knew what the effect of it would be. So far as he (Sir Richard Webster) understood it, the effect would be to break up the counties into small divisions, and give local jurisdiction to those small divisions of the county which really should be dealt with by the County Councils as a whole, a policy which would be adverse to the principle on which the Bill had been framed. He could not see any practical reason for picking out wapentakes and hundreds, and making them subject to a special provision apart from the county at large. Considerable trouble would arise if the latter part of the Amendment were put in force, whereby particular districts, in consideration of their maintaining and repairing their own main roads, should be relieved from the cost of contributing to the maintenance and repair of main roads in other districts.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, that in Lancashire the county was broken up into hundreds, and the care of the main roads was vested in the authorities of each district. In the West Riding of Yorkshire the same system entirely prevailed, but the word "wapentake" was used in place of "hundred," and in consequence of that the Local Authorities there were unable to exercise the powers which the authorities of districts abutting upon their own were able to exercise. It would, perhaps, meet the hon. and gallant Gentleman's point, if an Amendment were inserted declaring that the word "hundred" should include "wapentake."

COLONEL GUNTER said, he would withdraw his Amendment in the hope that that Amendment would be inserted later on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Power to County Councils to enforce provisions of Rivers Pollution Act, 1876).

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he would congratulate the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) on the progress he was making with the Bill; but it was a certain disadvantage to him (Mr. Brunner), as hon. Members who had a fuller knowledge of the subject with regard to which he was about to move an Amendment than he had himself were not in their places, presumably not having expected the Amendment to be reached. His first duty was to make it clear what his Amendment was. The first Amendment standing in his name was in line 15, to leave out the words "so much." The second and third Amendments were consequential. His desire was this—that instead of making it the duty of each County Council to protect against pollution so much of a river as bordered on or ran through the territory over which it had jurisdiction, to provide that each river in the country should be under the protection of a joint committee, consisting of or elected by all the County Councils of the districts through which that river ran. This matter of the pollution of rivers was a very important one. It was a matter upon which the prosperity of the country, and in a large measure the food of the people of the country, depended, as well as the amenities of life throughout the rural districts. Now, this matter of the protection of rivers from pollution ought to be in the hands of a powerful body. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would, he bemanufacturers might make their factories secure. By the adoption of his Amendment they would find that the rivers would be cared for in every particular, and that the country would be enormously the gainer. He begged to move the Amendment.

[Eleventh Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 15, to leave out the words, "so much."—(Mr. Brunner.)

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he was not at all sure that the Amendment the hon. Member had moved would meet the idea he had put forward; on the contrary, he was inclined to think that it would do something to make matters still worse. His (Mr. Bradlaugh's) objection—which, perhaps, he might raise on that Amendment—was to the clause itself as it stood. They had clear evidence before them that the Rivers Pollution Act of 1876 up to the present time had utterly failed, and that it had failed because in many cases the persons who were the offenders were at the same time the persons who had to administer punishment; it was their duty to punish themselves for their own offences, and naturally they did not do so. Well, he did not see how the Amendment of his hon. Friend was going to meet the difficulty. He did not know whether he should trouble the House with evidence on this point; but there was, at any rate, plenty of evidence very briefly stated and explained in the admirable Report of Mr. Fletcher on River Pollution. Mr. Fletcher gave a number of cases, and his view was clear in his Report to the effect that the power ought to be taken from the Local Bodies and put into the hands of the Local Government Board, through its special Inspectors—namely, the power to enforce against these people that which they would not enforce of themselves. It might be said that they were going to have a higher sense of morality upon the new Local Bodies; but in his mind the question was one of the same difficulty. There would be a clashing of interests between the Local Authorities, which clashed interests had already been found, as Mr. Fletcher stated in his Report. The Act had entirely failed on account of this clashing of interests, and the river pollution question was becoming of more and more importance every day. They had now in our large centres of population a menace of evil which was constantly growing, because of the want of care of the water supply, which was necessary for the people to drink. He thought it desirable to say that on the present clause. He did not know whether the Government would say that under the new authorities to be constituted by the Bill something more would be done to deal with this matter than had been done in the past. He (Mr. Bradlaugh), at any rate, could not support the Amendment, as it seemed to him that it would only aggravate the existing evil.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) said, if the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had considered what would be the effect of the Amendment if passed, he would have supported it rather than have opposed it. It was quite right to say that the Rivers Pollution Act had failed on account of local interests, and on account of small areas; but the object the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brunner) had in view in proposing this Amendment was to enlarge the administration of the river into a drainage area, and thereby to overcome the local interests that defeated the present Act. The larger they could make their drainage area, and make a combination of interests through a joint committee, the better would they be able to prevent river pollution. They had successfully combated with the fouling of air in various districts, by entrusting the Local Government Board with power to put a stop to the pollution of air by emanations from factories. Well, the principle of this Bill was to take away certain powers from the Local Government Board, and give them to the Local Authorities; but the more they cut up the drainage area and gave jurisdiction to different authorities through which rivers passed, the more completely would they prevent the efficient action of the Rivers Pollution Act. He, therefore, quite sympathized with the hon. Member who proposed the Amendment to get a committee of all the interests in the drainage area to act, because he believed that in that way they would have a much better chance of preventing the pollution of rivers. It was nothing short of a disgrace to the country that we should be so far behind in preventing river pollution. As he had said, we had grappled with the pollution of air, and we ought now to grapple with the pollution of water. Very long ago, ages ago, long before the history of this country commenced, some countries were in the habit of taking measures for the prevention of the pollution of rivers, seeing the importance of such action much more clearly than we seemed to do. In Egypt the Nile was thus protected in ancient times, and he had always felt that Moses made a mistake in not carrying away with him one of the Commandments of the Egyptians, that they should not pollute rivers. Unfortunately, Moses did not add that to the Ten Commandments, and the result was that all rivers had ever since been polluted. This question was of great importance to the agricultural community, and he thought that if the power of preventing the pollution of rivers were taken away from the Central Authority, the more urgent it was to combine Local Authorities throughout a drainage area, which might include several counties, and to make them responsible for the purity of the common streams.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he hoped the Committee would not adopt the Amendment. He wished to point out to the hon. Member who had moved it that the excellent object he had in view, and to further which he would establish joint committees, could already be attained by the provisions of the Bill as it stood. There was nothing to present one or two, or, in fact, any number of counties, coming together and forming a joint committee. He was acquainted with the Report of Mr. Fletcher, which stated that the Rivers Pollution Act had failed in many respects; but still there were other cases in which that Act had been of considerable use, and he thought it was desirable that they should avail themselves of any steps which could be taken to prevent the pollution of rivers. He agreed that when they were dealing with this question of drainage, floods, or with the river as a whole, it might not only be desirable, but necessary, that the matter should be taken in hand by a joint committee of the County Councils, who would deal with the whole drainage area. But they had also to deal with large and substantial local pollutions. There had been many cases where there had been very serious local pollutions, and it seemed to him that it would weaken the power of the County Council if, in the case of a sudden and serious pollution in their portion of the river, they should possess no power of dealing with it until they had assembled together a committee from the other portions of the river who had no interest in the matter. The County Councils would not be able to act by means of a joint committee. By all means let the hon. Member (Mr. Brunner) put down an Amendment, if he chose, to enable large joint Bodies to deal with pollutions which required the interference of all districts through which the river ran; but he (Sir Richard Webster) could not see why a particular County Council should not have power to prevent pollution in that portion of the river which ran through its own jurisdiction. When the Committee remembered that the clause said that—they would be at a loss to see what reason there was for preventing a County Council which might be anxious to do this work from taking it in hand. He quite agreed with the observation—he had already said so—that something should be done to see that the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Act were better observed; but it would not, in his opinion, be a step in that direction to try to prevent the County Councils from discharging this function over that part of the river over which they had jurisdiction. Though he believed that something should be done to prevent the pollution of the water supply, he did not think it would be desirable to accept this Amendment.

“A county council should have power, in addition to any other authority, to enforce the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, (subject to the restrictions in that Act contained) in relation to so much of any stream as is situated within, or passes through or by, any part of their county, and for that purpose they shall have the same powers and duties as if they were a sanitary authority within the meaning of that Act,”

MR. BRUNNER begged to point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Local Authorities were very frequently not to blame if they did not interfere with the pollution of a river, and for this reason—that when a pollution took place within their jurisdiction it very frequently did no harm there, and nobody grumbled. The pollution did harm, and was felt as a very severe loss, not in the district where it occurred, but far below. It was just for the reason that, where the pollution was caused, it was not felt as a nuisance, and that it was caused by people who would have a majority on the County Council, within whose jurisdiction the mischief was caused; it was just for that reason that he wanted the County Councils to join together for the purpose of protecting each river from source to sea. He was a manufacturer himself, and had been amongst manufacturers all his life, and had had this question before his eyes for a great many years. He knew exactly where the shoe pinched, and he could assure the Committee, from experience, that it would do right to follow him, and not the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) said, he would point out that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had misapprehended the effect of the Amendment. Instead of weakening the hands of the County Council, he took it that the effect of striking out these words would be to enlarge the power of County Councils generally, although it would restrict the power of each County Council individually in the matter of the prevention of river pollution in its own district. He held that if any pollution took place in a portion of the river passing through a district under the jurisdiction of the County Council, that that County Council should have the same power of taking action as that possessed by the riparian owner. The riparian owner was able to take action against anyone fouling the stream, though that fouling took place above his land. If they struck out these words, then a County Council suffering from the fouling of the river in another county would be able to take action under this particular clause; therefore, it seemed to him that instead of narrowing it would enlarge the power of those Councils.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, the hon. Member (Mr. Brunner) had in his Amendment an important provision which would remove the objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. Would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General look at the further Amendment of the hon. Member on the following page—namely, to insert at the end of line 21 the following words:—

“And in every case where a stream passes through or by more than one county, the Local Government Board shall direct the council of every county through or by which such stream passes, to join in appointing out of their respective bodies a joint committee, which shall, in relation to the whole of such stream, have all the powers and duties by this section granted to a county council.”

That Amendment described the way in which the proposal would work, and did not take away the power of the County Council, but only added to it. He would ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to what would happen now. They were taking out of the counties a considerable number of large boroughs through which a river passed. The County Councils would not be able to go into these large boroughs and say—“This stream has been fouled within your jurisdiction, and we must take action upon it, to prevent a continuance of the evil,” because the borough would have become a county in itself. Therefore, if the Committee wished to make the measure when it became an Act of Parliament an efficient one for the prevention of river pollution, they must form an authority larger than a single County Council, and including, in fact, the drainage area, which would enable them to go into the boroughs and the counties, and to have all the interests combined in order to put a river into a state of purity.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he merely wished to say one word as to this question, because this was really as important a clause as they could have in the Bill. It was notorious that all over England our rivers and streams were polluted, and that this river pollution might be prevented if proper means were taken. He held that the Bill was the measure on which these means might be taken; but he ventured to think that these means were not at present contained in the clause. He did not see how, under the clause, one County Council would have power to deal with another County Council which refused to do its duty in regard to that portion of the river passing through their district; and what he was anxious to see was that some power should be given by which the pollution of a river could be prevented from its source to its outfall. Unless they had some better means of action than that which was proposed by the clause, they would never be able to put an end to river pollution. He knew how much the health of the country depended upon a good water supply; therefore, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would do well if he strengthened this clause in the manner suggested on Report. With the legal advice his right hon. Friend was able to get, he, no doubt, would be able to put words in the Bill to effect all they desired.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the Government desired by means of the clause to provide a remedy for some of the evils which were admitted to exist with regard to river pollution. It had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) that the offender at present was the very authority for putting the Act in force, and that, naturally, on the part of this authority there was a pardonable reluctance to do so. That being so, the Government were desirous of taking advantage of the larger area and authority they were setting up in the Bill to provide a means by which a remedy might be found in places where the fault lay with the Sanitary Authority itself. Under the power which would be conferred by the Bill, the boroughs would be still charged with the duty of preventing the pollution of rivers; but if they did not perform their duties, the Bill would enable the County Councils to intervene. It was also provided that where a stream was in more than one county a joint committee should be formed for the purpose of taking any action. The only difference between the Government and the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment was this—the Government thought they could fairly rely upon the authority drawn from so large an area as a county to do its duty under this provision; and, on the other hand, hon. Gentlemen who supported the Amendment thought they could not rely upon the County Council, though it were returned from a large area, and though it might be charged with many very important duties, and though they were in hopes of being able to secure an authority powerful enough to put in force the Acts of Parliament with the administration of which these Councils were to be charged. The Government were still of opinion that the County Authority would do its duty in this respect. It seemed to him (Mr. Ritchie) that by adopting the Amendment, and the other Amendments on the Paper by the hon. Member, it would be made impossible, or practically impossible, for one County Authority to act with regard to streams which did not come wholly within its own area—that if a stream passed through three or four counties, it would be impossible for any one county to act by itself for the purpose of preventing pollution within its own area. He understood that was not the view of the hon. Gentleman, and it might be that he (Mr. Ritchie) was mistaken; but, at any rate, it seemed to him that the discussion which had taken place indicated that a much larger provision than that advocated by the Government should be adopted. He would, therefore, recommend the Committee to adopt the suggestion which had been thrown out—namely, that they should let the clause stand as it was, with the view of enabling the Government, with the light which had been thrown upon the whole matter, to consider whether they could insert some words which would make the clause a more effective one.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said, he rose to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board the point mentioned just now by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), which the right hon. Gentleman had not noticed. He (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) did not wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman to enlarge the Bill beyond what its original drafting would have accomplished; but he wanted to impress upon him the condition of that part of Lancashire with which he (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) was best acquainted—namely, that part drained by the Ribble and its tributaries. That river was polluted by about five districts. As the Bill originally stood, those districts would have been dealt with by the County Council; but the Amendment making Burnley and Blackburn into counties of boroughs had removed two of those districts. The County Councils of Burnley and Blackburn would be supreme in their own districts, and there would be no power for the County Council having jurisdiction over the other three districts to come in and deal with the tributaries of the Ribble as they passed through Blackburn and Burnley. In that way the County Council might find itself powerless to prevent pollutions originating in the districts of Blackburn and Burnley, and injuring the important districts of the county below those towns. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some attention to the matter, in order to prevent any difficulty arising in this respect.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had pointed out that the Government did not desire to cut down the powers of the County Councils, but that what was desired was to supplement their powers by a more powerful and more representative Body. If the hon. Member (Mr. Brunner) would withdraw his Amendment, the Government would undertake to bring forward an Amendment to carry out the hon. Gentleman's views in line 21. It would be necessary to alter the clause that dealt with rivers passing not only through one county into another, but through a borough and a part of a county. The subject having now been debated at some length, and fairly well understood, it would be well for the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment, for, either now or on the Report stage, the Government would add to the clause words to enable a joint authority to be constituted consisting of representatives of the Local Authorities, which would best enable the points last referred to to be dealt with.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he thought that to carry out the object of the hon. Member for the Northwich Division of Cheshire (Mr. Brunner) a little more would obviously be necessary than the Amendment proposed; therefore he trusted the hon. Member would accept the suggestion of the Government, and withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) said, that neither the right hon.

Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board nor the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General seemed to have remembered that by the clause, as it stood, the River Thames outside the Metropolis would be absolutely unaffected, and would remain, as now, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy Board. The clause, as it now stood, was subject to the regulations of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, in which there was a clause saving the powers of the Thames Conservancy Board. Now, the Thames Conservancy Board was a very bad authority indeed for the protection of the Thames—

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER wished to point out to the hon. Member that the saving powers to the Thames Conservancy Board did not prevent the operation of the Rivers Pollution Act. It was necessary to insert the saving clause, in order that the Conservancy Board might retain the powers they already possessed; but these powers did not override the powers of the Act.

MR. BAUMANN said, that the Thames Conservancy Board was the authority for carrying out the provisions of the Act. He knew that that was the case in connection with the complaints made not long ago as to the pollution of the river by house boats, and the difficulties created by steam launches. It seemed to him that the powers in the case of the Thames should be in the hands of the County Councils of the districts through which the river passed, and should be taken out of the hands of the Conservancy Board. He trusted that the Government, after they had considered this point, if they thought he was right, would on the Report stage introduce such words as would carry out his suggestion.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that if it was understood that the Government intended to give to the County Councils full control of the streams so far as they exercised jurisdiction over the districts through which they passed, and in addition to create another authority, as anticipated by the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment, then he thought it would be well to leave the matter over till the Report stage, because he thought it would be impossible to get to the form of words to be added. He was of opinion that the A—went to moved by the hon. Gentleman would deprive the County Councils of the necessary authority for dealing with this subject, rather than the reverse.

MR. RITCHIE said, the hon. Gentleman had stated correctly what the Government proposed to do. Their proposal was that they should be allowed to take the clause as it stood, in order to amend it at a later stage.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, he would ask whether the words in the clause "in addition to any other authority" preserved the authority of the County Council? Did the proposal mean that the authority should be exercised under the clause in addition to that exercised by the Sanitary Authority as it already existed? Supposing the Amendment of the hon. Member were inserted, several County Councils, "in addition to any other authority," would have power to enforce the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act in case of emergency.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw his Amendment?

MR. BRUNNER: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, there was likely to be a conflict of opinion between the authorities constituted under the Bill, and the existing Town Councils or Local Boards. There were towns which had Sanitary Authorities, through which rivers passed; and as the County Council would have jurisdiction over such rivers, some Amendment, he thought, should be inserted, in order to prevent the conflicts certain to arise when two authorities exercised similar jurisdictions within the same area.

MR. BRUNNER said, the Chairman had been a little too quick for him—as, indeed, he was too quick for most people. He just wished to ask this question, whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was to be taken as assuring him that the County Councils would include the Councils of boroughs?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

AGRICULTURAL TENANTRY (WALES).

RESOLUTION.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) said, he should endeavour to be moderate and circumspect and well within the mark in any statement and in any considerations he might urge upon the House. Anyone making a Motion with regard to Wales, and especially with regard to agriculture in Wales, was immediately met by the deplorable want of Parliamentary information on the subject. When he looked at the Diplomatic and Consular Reports on the state of trade and agriculture of the small countries of Europe, and even those of the South American Republics, he felt envious that those countries should have so great a share of attention on the part of the House, while a country not far distant should have so very little attention paid to her in respect of her social condition and agriculture. In 1879 an important Royal Commission was appointed, to inquire into the depressed state of agriculture, with regard to which he had to make some general remarks. In the first place, not a single Welshman, or anyone connected with Wales, was appointed upon the Commission, and, as a natural corollary, very few Welshmen were examined before the Commission. For all the counties of South Wales, the only one examined was an extensive land agent; while, for North Wales, the only person examined was Lord Penrhyn, who was much respected, but who was a large landowner, who lived as much apart from the ordinary tenants of Wales as the Olympian gods. The Commission, in their wisdom, appointed a gentleman who for many years had been a Poor Law Inspector to be Assistant Commissioner for Wales; he knew no Welsh; he was an absolute stranger to the Welsh farmers, and instead of examining them and collecting information from them, he sent a number of very carefully prepared inquiries to Poor Law clerks. That was a natural expedient for him to obtain information, but one would have imagined that this gentleman would have taken more care, and have gone, not to the Poor Law clerks, but to the farmers themselves. Now, his Report was practically the sum total of the Parliamentary information upon the state of agriculture in Wales which they possessed. In his Motion he referred at the outset to the special circumstances of Wales, and he saw on the Paper of that morning that the hon. and gallant Member for West Denbigh (Colonel Cornwallis West) had put down an Amendment which practically challenged the first part of his Motion. The hon. and gallant Member asked the House to deny that there were any special circumstances existing in land tenure in Wales. He (Mr. T. E. Ellis) wished to appeal, first of all, to the Report of the Assistant Commissioner with regard to the difference between English and Welsh agriculture. Mr. Doyle, the gentleman to whom he referred, was Assistant Commissioner not only for the 12 Welsh counties but for eight English counties, and he reported that the eight English and the 12 Welsh counties comprised in his district exhibited greater variety and more marked contrast in the distribution of land, as well as in respect of inhabitants and the character of agriculture, the condition as well as the habits of the rural population, than would be found within the same limits in any other portion of the United Kingdom. So much for his statement. He now came to the special circumstances over and above this distribution of land as between England and Wales. The first circumstance arose from the special charm and delight of the land of Wales itself; for instance, the Welsh tenant had an attachment to the soil which he cultivated, and to the religious and social community in which he lived, which could not, he ventured to say, be found in any part of England. Lord Penrhyn, although he did not know much about the small hillside tenants of Wales, was examined before the Commission, and being asked if there was in Wales what was called hereditary tenantry, he replied that there was a great feeling about that, they liked to succeed their fathers and grandfathers on their farms. If any further testimony were necessary, he might quote the statement made last year by a large Conservative landowner of Cardiganshire, who said that "landlords in Wales were able to secure a higher rent, because Welshmen loved the soil on which they were brought up, and because the tenants were not true to one another; if there was a farm about to become vacant there were a dozen people applying for it—they would not give the sitting tenant a chance of making terms with the landlord." Their contention was that the land system, as it existed in Wales at present, enabled the mean and self-seeking to profit at the expense of the industrious and bravely struggling tenant. But not merely did this land-hunger affect the tenantry, it affected purchase. Gentlemen who had made fortunes in large English cities desired to find not merely land and luxuries of ownership, but they wanted to get rest, scenery, and a magistracy and county status. Now, there was no place where they could get those things so easily as in Wales. A Non-conformist might be the leader in his neighbourhood for 50 years; he might be respected and beloved by the community, but he had very little, if any, chance of a magistracy during the whole of his life; but suppose some stranger—some Churchman, or a gentleman of particular political opinions—went to Wales and bought a small estate, he had not to wait many years before he was put on the Magisterial Bench to dispense justice to Welsh speaking people. Those gentlemen bid against the tenant, who himself was so attached to the soil that he was ready to offer what often appeared a foolish price for his holding, first of all in order that he might keep his home, and further, that he might secure the fruits of his improvements and industry. Now, those gentlemen came over with fortunes, they bought land over the head of the cultivator at a fancy price, and then they turned round and applied commercial principles, saying they had paid a certain amount for the land, and must get so much per cent for the outlay. Anyone who knew Wales even superficially must be aware that this statement was well within the mark. Mr. Doyle, in his official Report, stated that in Montgomeryshire demands had been made to raise the rents to pay a fair percentage upon the purchase money. This competition for land was a circumstance special to Wales, was specially adverse to the interest of the tiller of the soil, and placed him at the mercy of the landlord. But this was aggravated by another circumstance, the chasm or social gulf which existed between the landlords and the occupying tenants. He would not dwell upon that point, but merely refer to three great questions which divided the bulk of the landlords of Wales from the bulk of the occupiers. Wherever one went in Wales—except on the borders of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire, and parts of Brecknockshire—it would be found that the cultivator and his family were Welsh speaking, and that his religious services and social communications were carried on in the Welsh language. On the other hand, with the rarest exceptions, the landlord was ignorant of the language of his tenants. That would naturally create a certain amount of estrangement and a chasm between the landlord and the tenant; but it was further aggravated by the fact that at a critical period in their religious and national history the end of the last century, most of the Welsh people built up a religious system of their own, and were separated entirely and completely from the landowners of Wales, who remained attached to the Anglican ecclesiastical system. The division, however, did not stop there; for in the course of the present century not merely had there been a religious divorce, but as complete a political divorce between the landlords and the cultivators. He was glad to see present many of his Colleagues from Wales who were large landowners; but he thought if each one of them were to give an impartial experience of Welsh landlords at election times he would say that 19 out of 20, if not 99 out of 100, were bitterly hostile to the popular cause. It was not without significance that every County Member for Wales, with the exception of the hon. Member for Radnorshire (Mr. Walsh), sat on that side of the House, and they were there not alone, because they were pledged on some burning question in regard to Wales, but also because there had lately been a gradual but sure and inevitable revolt against the land system of Wales as at present administered. What, then, had been the results of this difference between the landlords and tenants in Wales? He thought there had been two results—first, a want of sympathy between the landlord and tenant, and, secondly, a deplorable want of information and knowledge on the part of the landlord as to the conditions and circumstances of the cultivator of the soil. Not only was there a want of sympathy, but in too many cases the landowner employed his position and his monopoly of the land in order to punish the cultivator on account of his creed. He (Mr. T. E. Ellis) did not want to refer at great length to that point, but if any one in that House conversed with the ordinary tenants of Wales with regard to their past electioneering experiences, he would find that the three General Elections of the years 1859, 1865, and 1868 were not merely well known, but that the memory of the evictions which took place after those elections had burnt itself indelibly into the hearts and consciences of the people, and many a day would have to pass over Wales before the memories of those evictions passed away. It might be said that the passing of the Ballot Act of 1870 had alleviated that condition of things. He did not suppose that there were any people within the four countries that were more thankful for that great Act than the Welsh people, because it had enabled them to exercise their right of suffrage with something like liberty. But even at the present day this want of sympathy between the landlord and tenant worked very disastrously to the social welfare of Wales; for in many parts there was among a certain number of the landowners a set purpose to make it difficult and impossible for Nonconformists or Liberals to obtain farms. This led to the creation of a class of sycophants and spies, the most abominable that infested God's earth, who were ready to watch for the political and religious action of a Nonconformist and Liberal tenant, and not only that, but to oust him from his place and get his farm, because they were ready to take up the political and religious view of the landlords. This feeling was strong in Wales, but he thought that the landlords were beginning to find out that the Churchman and persons of certain political opinions were not always able to pay the rent to the very day. Even during that week there had been a somewhat ludicrous illustration of the tension between the landlords and tenants in Wales. In one of the newspapers published in Wales the following circular appeared that week. How far it had obtained the sanction of any landowner, and how far it would be repudiated by landowners, he did not know, but it was interesting as mirroring the circumstances of the time. The circular was addressed to the clergy, landowners, and tenants, and was to the effect that the Church and all landed property was so seriously attacked, and the spirit of socialism was so rapidly spreading in Wales, that it was becoming necessary for the clergy and the wealthy to know who were their true friends, and to act accordingly; that landowners in particular should be on their guard as to the persons to whom they might let their land, and should ascertain whether candidates for their farms were the friends of order and justice, or of anarchy and confiscation. The circular went on to say that, at the urgent request of certain persons of influence, a Conservative registry had been opened as a medium of communication between the landowners wanting tenants and tenants wanting farms, and that with the view of carrying out the scheme, Incumbents were requested to inform the writer of any farms vacant or about to become vacant in their parishes, and so on. He quoted this in order that it might serve as a salutary warning to the class of informers he had referred to. He regretted also to have to refer to the fact that during the last few weeks and months in which there had been considerable, if not fierce, agitation in Wales, tenants had been receiving notices to quit because they had taken a certain line with regard to the tithe question. It seemed to him that the very essence of the land system in England was that there should be a thoroughly good understanding and strong sympathy between the landlord and the tenant. The hon. Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall (Mr. Courtney) had written a paper lately in one of the monthly reviews upon the subject of occupation of land, in which he referred to the extreme value of the leasehold system existing in Scotland at the present time; but he said that when leases did not prevail there was not unfrequently in the South of England a person who might be called a sort of providential landlord, animated with much the same taste, having the same feelings, and looking forward to the same objects as the persons who farmed under him. It was perfectly clear that such a community did not exist in Wales as the hon. Gentleman said existed in the South of England and in Scotland. But not merely did the state of things in Wales affect the sympathy which ought to be between landlord and tenant, but it led to the want of information on the part of the landlord as to the actual condition and circumstances of his tenants. Many landowners in Wales regarded the payment of rent as the only test of the prosperity of their tenants. Lord Penrhyn was asked before the Commission whether anything like indebtedness had crept in amongst the tenants; and his Lordship replied that he did not know, that they had all paid their rents, and that he had never heard of any complaint of the kind. As if the august and secluded occupant of Penrhyn Castle could hear the complaints of Welsh-speaking tenants on the remote hillsides. But what were the replies which Mr. Doyle obtained from the Poor Law clerks in Carnarvonshire, where Lord Penrhyn was the largest landlord? In reply to the question whether rents were regularly paid, the clerk of one Union replied that they were paid, but that many of the tenants borrowed from bankers and friends to pay the rent, and that no abatement or reduction had been made. The reply came from Anglesea that the tenants had paid the rents, but had been considerably assisted by bankers and corn merchants. Another reply was that it was believed that the tenants had paid, although several had borrowed money to pay their rents. One answer from Breconshire was that the tenants were heavily in arrear, that abatements were sometimes made, but not to the extent to which they had been made in other parts of the country. The report from another Union was that rents had been paid regularly, but that bills of sale had been on the increase. Now, those reports were made in 1881, at the time when Mr. Doyle reported that the depression in England was most serious, but that it was not so serious in Wales. It was the last four or five years that had been absolutely ruinous to the farmers in Wales; and if that were true at the date referred to, how much more true was it at the present time? How did this want of knowledge on the part of landowners affect the tenants? In the first place, the landlords would not realize to what a serious pass the tenants had come; they had been deceived by the great competition for small hill-side farms, which were very numerous in Wales; and, whilst the competition for them had been intensified, the standard of rental of good land was made to apply to the land on the rugged hill-side. He thought that had it not been for two facts the crash would have come three or four years ago. This had been averted, first, because the holdings in Wales were very small, so that when a large number of tenants had become bankrupt and were sold up, a number of labourers who had saved money were able for a time to take their places, many of them soon collapsing. The second cause which had averted the crash was that Welsh tenants were proverbially thrifty and industrious. Mr. Doyle said that the Welsh farmer, to whatever class he might belong, was more thrifty than an English farmer in a corresponding position, and that the farmer in Wales fared worse than the English labourer in receipt of average wage. From the figures published by the

Inland Revenue Commissioners a few years ago, a very instructive comparison was to be made with regard to the rise of rents between the years 1842 and 1879. He found from that Report that rents in England rose during that period 23·5 per cent as against 34·6 in Wales; and yet the reduction and abatement of rent in Wales was incomparably lower than it had been in England, although the fall in prices in Wales had been quite as serious and quite as ruinous as it had been in England. Cattle had fallen in the last four years from 33 to 50 per cent, sheep 33 per cent, horses 30 to 50 per cent, butter 36 per cent, corn 30 per cent, and wool 60 per cent; yet up to last year the average reduction in rents in Wales had not amounted to more than 10 per cent. Some landowners had made excellent reductions, however; from 15 per cent to 25 per cent in some cases. One, if not more of his hon. Colleagues, four or five years ago, who had realized the position of the tenants, had given upsteadily 25 per cent on each rent day. There were many landowners in Wales, however, who had only given small abatements of 5 or 10 per cent, and there were others who had made no abatement at all. Even in the present year, with a ruinous fall in prices, the average reduction did not amount to 15 per cent. What had been the effect of this upon the welfare of the people generally? Of course, the first effect had been upon the farmers. He thought he might count by scores farmers belonging to the most industrious and thrifty of their class to be found in England or Wales who had become bankrupt and been sold up. At the present time, without doubt, the majority of the tenantry were involved in debt. They went surety for each other at the banks, and the result was that whenever one farmer got within the grasp of his creditors, he generally took with him six or seven others. Not only was that the case, but the farmers' stock was depreciated, and labourers found little work, rural parts were depopulated, and land had been steadily deteriorating, so that the local burdens of the highway, school, and poor rates were becoming heavier to bear. In order that he might be certain of the ground on which he was going, he would read a short quotation from The Land Agents' Record, which said that there was no concealing the fact that the tenant farmers had been very hard hit, and were using the capital of other parties to meet their payments; that, whilst the supply of manure was ample, the cultivation of the land was going down; that fields were left long beyond their time, and, notwithstanding that there was a general decrease of value each year, the tenants clung to their farms owing to the very great loss they would sustain by selling out, and from their inability to turn their hands to any other trade. It seemed to him that this state of things called for the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government. In good times the majority of the Welsh cultivators lived in fear of increased rents, and in times of falling prices they were subjected to rents which were excessive. Moreover, the yearly tenure was in Wales doubly insecure, because the tenant depended upon the caprice of a landlord who very often hated and detested his religious and political principles. He thought he might say, in reference to the majority of estates in Wales, that the agreements had been so drawn up as to be restrictive and vexatious. Coming from a peasant home himself, and having opportunities to go in and out among the peasantry, he could not but express his keen sense of the anxiety and pain and agony with which hundreds and thousands of honest and thrifty peasants exercised their civil and religious rights of citizenship, and worked from morn till night to keep their homes together, and to feed, clothe, and educate their children. He might be asked what remedy he proposed? It seemed to him that it was not his duty to propose a remedy, but simply to state to the House, as honestly and truthfully as he could, the condition of things in Wales. He had, in the latter part of his Motion, referred to what was most specially and urgently needed in Wales. On that point he would quote, for the second time, an authority very much respected in that House, and by the extreme school of political economists and advocates of freedom of contract. He referred to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall, whose views, expressed in a significant article, admirably represented the needs of the tenants in Wales. The hon. Gentleman said, that what they were in search after appeared to be the institution of some kind of intermediate authority which should be able to regulate and supervise the relations between the occupying tenants on the one hand, and the person or community entitled to rental on the other, and who should be able to supervise, modify, or control their relations one with the other, so as to secure the idea of constant and best occupation. On one of the Standing Committees, of which he had the honour to be a Member, some 70 members of the House were discussing a Bill which provided for intervention, to a great extent, between the traders of this country and the powerful railway monopolists; and, in listening to the discussions day by day, he had often asked himself the question, that, if it were necessary that the powerful and almost omnipotent traders of England should have an intermediate authority between them and the Railway Companies, how much more necessary was it for the Welsh tenant to have an intermediate authority between him and the landlord. In some cases, where public authorities were the owners of land, this difficulty had been met. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests had some years ago considered the condition of their tenants, and given reductions of 25 per cent, and even more. Again, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had recognized the condition of agriculture, and they had given not merely a reduction of 25 per cent to the tenants, but also very great facilities for purchase. That was what they were asking for on behalf of the Welsh tenantry. They asked for facility of purchase of farms in Wales, and that, when farms were in the market, there should be some right of pre-emption to cultivating tenants who had spent their lives and industry upon their holdings. They might be told that there were no special conditions in the legal tenure of land in Wales, but law depended on the spirit and temper and circumstances of its administration. They were confronted with the fact that the tenants in Wales were suffering severely; ruin and the blighted prospects of their children were staring them in the face, and he and his hon. Colleagues were only doing their elementary duty as their Representatives in stating their case before the House. They were pledged up to the hilt to do so, and no Member of the House was more deeply pledged to them than the hon. and gallant Member for West Denbigh (Colonel Cornwallis West). They did not speak for English farmers, who could bring their grievances before the House of Commons, but only for the tenants of Wales whose petition was, that the House, and especially Her Majesty's Government, should not meet their grievances with mere legal quibbles or with jeers, as was sometimes the case, or with cold refusals, but should give a serious and sympathetic attention to their grievances; and should devise an immediate, timely, and effectual remedy.

Mr. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) said, he rose to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Merionethshire. He desired to state what he had observed when living in a purely agricultural district in Wales during the last 10 years, and to compare that with his experience as bursar of an Oxford college in the management of property scattered through the North Midlands and South of England. He should only refer to that part of the Welsh problem which he knew, and it was for others to say how far what he stated was fairly applicable to Wales as a whole. He wished to state, in the first place, that in his opinion the land question was very different in Wales to what it was in England; and, in the second place, that the social conditions of the people intensified and increased the difficulty. Taking the case of England, he said with reference to the past 10 years, which had been years of serious difficulty, if they left out altogether questions of seasons, prices, and difficulties between farmers and labourers, and if they restricted themselves solely to the question between landlord and tenant, and especially to the question of reduction of rent, they found that the cases in which the landlord and tenant had come most successfully through the struggle occurred when the landlord and the agent had had the most intimate acquaintance with the circumstances of the tenants. On the other hand, the greatest disasters which had ensued were largely due to the almost culpable ignorance which had led to refusals to grant reductions of rent where they were absolutely essential, which ignorance had led to the ruin of the tenant and sometimes to the ruin of the landlord also. Two principal results had followed in England from this state of things. First of all, in many parts of England the farmers had learned a spirit of independence which they had not before, and in many cases they had the whip hand of the situation. They had also learned to move from one part of the country to another in a way which before was unknown; many West-country farmers had recently travelled to the Midlands and North-country farmers had come to the South. In the second place, where the landlords had dealt fairly with the tenants, they found much of that good feeling on which the whole of the English land system was based. It had been thus with the system in England, where the landlord knew, or ought to know, his tenants well; he met them in the same field, in church, on the Board of Guardians, and in the county town on market day, and in many other respects he made himself the personal friend of his tenants. This had led to an improvement in the good understanding which resulted from the fact that the tenant knew that he and his landlord had borne their burden together. But in Wales neither had there been an increase of independence on the part of the tenants, nor had there been much additional desire to move from place to place, or any improved understanding between the landlord and the tenant. With regard to his experience in Wales, some English Members would say that the Welsh system was the same as the English, because the landlords made the improvements and erected farm buildings in Wales as they did in England, and because the Agricultural Holdings Act applied to Wales as well as to England. He ventured to say that a more shallow statement could not well be made on the subject. There had been, fortunately, good landlords in Wales who had dealt quite as well with their tenants as the best landlords in England, but the question was, had this been the rule? He would make one or two quotations bearing on this subject. His authority was the correspondent of The Times, who he thought ought to satisfy the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Kenyon) because he certainly wrote, as far as he could, from the same point of view. There was nothing more remarkable than the contrast between the spirit and tone of those letters and the spirit and tone in which Wales was referred to in the leading articles of many English newspapers, which said, that practically Wales was the same as Yorkshire, and if it were not, that it ought to be. The Times correspondent, who did not write as a supporter of the tenants, said nine months ago—

“The danger of the situation could not be easily exaggerated. Men will not, or dare not, pay their tithe, and the agitation will soon extend, if it had not done so already, to the payment of rent.”

What lay at the root of the difficulty was the competition for farms and the land-hunger to which his hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire had alluded. “The competition is intensely keen throughout Wales,” said The Times correspondent; and he asked how this land-hunger was to be dealt with? A farmer had written to him saying that it was a matter of common experience to have a host of candidates for a vacant tenancy, for which they knew that the rent was too high but which they were willing to take hoping for better times. He was now going to quote a land-agent of as wide experience as any in Great Britain. This gentleman said that his experience was, that Welsh farmers would put up with a very great deal from their landlords rather than be turned out of their holdings; that they were very anxious to acquire a freehold; and that they would borrow the purchase money and burden themselves with the payment of interest exceeding, substantially, the amount of a fair rent; and that it was sometimes as easy to get 40 years’ purchase for a farm in Wales as it was to get 30 years’ purchase in England. It was well known also that sometimes when a farm was vacant many tenants would offer premiums to agents, and tell them that if they would only let them have the farms it would be worth their while. Another effect of the land-hunger was, that it had lead to a most remarkable punctual payment of rent. This land-agent said the tenants were very reasonable and extremely honest, and that he had never held a rent day without having every penny paid that was due. Could they wonder then, if, under this state of competition and fear of one another, the tenants who paid their rents so punctually had done so by spending the savings which they had earned in other days? The Times correspondent said, that the Welsh tenants were paying their rents with their savings of by-gone years, and he added that the shadow of the mortgage was over the land; and further that he sincerely doubted whether the tenants could go on in their present position unless their rent was alleviated. As far as he (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland) had seen, the tenants of Wales were the most thrifty people that could be found in the whole country. This was borne testimony to by The Times correspondent, who said that thrift such as was almost unknown existed among them; and those persons who had observed the people of Brittany would be able to picture to themselves the species of economy practised in Wales. If the farmers were thus hard pressed, what was the condition of the labourers? They had in the district that he knew no cottages built for them by the landlords, as was the case in England. As a rule, their labourers were hired for six months or a year; they sometimes lived with the farmers, and they were frequently lodged over outhouses or barns; but they put up with their hard lives because they knew that their masters were living hard lives as well. This remarkable fact also results, that while the master is making no money the labourer is saving some of his wages, and is actually making money which may be brought into competition with the farmer, because the idea of the labourer was to get a small farm even if he had to pay a rent which he could not afford. There were no doubt in Wales some generous landlords who had made liberal reductions of rents. But, speaking of the average landlord, there was a difference between England and Wales. Anyone who had been present at a rent audit in England knew very well that the agent who accompanied the landlord regarded the farmer who came before them with respect, feeling that the landlord, if he was wise, would keep him. The agent knew that if the landlord lost the tenant he would not get such a good one again—that he might get a man of straw, or, perhaps, be unable to get anyone at all. The tenant might say, “I must have additional farm buildings built,” or might ask for a reduction of rent, and the landlord would hesitate in refusal. But in Wales the farmer knew that if he made a reduction of rent a condition of keeping his tenancy, there were 10 or 20 men ready and willing to take his place. That, in his (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland's) experience, was the actual condition of facts, although he knew many landlords in Wales who, as well as reducing rents, had constructed new buildings of an excellent character for their tenants, spending a great deal of money in this way. The real, vital difference—amongst many others—between the two cases was this—the Welsh tenants felt the want of a change; they were conscious of the absence of that good understanding between themselves and their landlords which protected the English tenants. Welsh agricultural districts were represented in the House of Commons, and hon. Members were under pledges to those of their constituents interested in agriculture, to endeavour to obtain some change, but the agitators—if they choose to call them so—on the subject of farmers' grievances in England had never very largely succeeded. The English farmer said—"On the whole I am satisfied with the good understanding I have on my farm;" and, therefore, there was not the same demand for change in England that there was in Wales. The state of things which existed in the Principality produced a bad effect on the relations of the classes to one another, a bad effect on the land, and a bad effect on its productiveness. And now he had a few words to say on the second point. He maintained that the social conditions, as he had observed them in Wales, intensified the difficulty. Take first the question of language, to which the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Motion had alluded. The Times correspondent said that—

"Seven-tenths of the Welsh people habitually use Welsh in their ordinary conversation."

And he said what he (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland) could bear out from his own experience. He further remarked—

"The attempt to Anglicize Wales has failed, and always will fail. I suppose that the language will die and is dying. These are the words of nine Englishmen out of ten, but I have never yet heard them from the lips of any man who had a genuine acquaintance with the people. In short, the attempt to Anglicize Wales has only resulted in adding additional difficulties to, and investing with dangerous complications, the problems connected with the Established Church and with property and land."

The Times correspondent said he differed from Lord Selborne on this subject, and held that the dividing line between Wales and England and the different characteristics of Welshmen and Englishmen were remarkably conspicuous. He (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland) had no hesitation in saying that there were more columns in the Welsh language turned out of Welsh printing presses to-day than had ever been turned out before in the history of the country. What was the bearing of this upon the Land Question? Well, a Welshman had put this matter to him very forcibly only a little time ago. He had said—"Put yourself in the position of being a tenant under a French landlord; you would, I suppose, know as much about the French language as we know about the English language; and if you had to go to the landlord to explain in detail the difficulties of your position, and to appeal for a slight reduction of rent, would you not feel some trembling, and feel that the landlord and his agent had the best of you in the matter of language. That," he said, "is the way we feel in this matter when we have to go before the English landlord." The Welsh did all they could to keep up Welsh traditions and their Welsh language, as was evidenced by the interest they took in their National Eisteddfods, and the honours they bestowed upon those who distinguished themselves in native literature. They were keener about education than we were; their chapels were admirable instances of their sentiments in this direction, many of them being centres of educational life. He did not desire to introduce unnecessary controversial matter, but he must say a word about the religious aspect of the question. As a rule, the landlords and land agents were of one religious persuasion, whilst the great bulk of the farmers were of another, and, certainly, that did not lessen the difficulty. Take the parish in which he lived. There were, he should suppose, 120 farmers in that parish, and he would venture to say that out of that 120 there were not six who attended the parish church, and not three who attended it regularly, and the whole education for 16-17ths of the children was under the exclusive management of the clergymen of the Established Church. He had sometimes wondered what in an English country parish would be thought of the state of things in which, in a village of Episcopalians, a benevolent Baptist of means had built large schools for the education of the children some time ago, and a Baptist minister had sole charge of the education of the children, 16-17ths of whom were Church children. Unfortunately, there had sometimes been conditions which had added to these difficulties of language and religion. There had been cases in which the farmer had been told that he must go once to church on a Sunday if he wished to hold a certain farm; and farmers had told him that they had been strictly enjoined when they took a farm that they must take no part in politics whatever, and that they had loyally obeyed; but he would ask the House at what a cost must they have obeyed? There, again—even in politics—things were different in Wales to what they were in England. In England the politics of landlords and tenants were pretty much the same, and even if they differed there was a genial sort of way of looking at these things, the farmer recognizing as a sort of principle that the vote and the lease should go together. The old Tory farmer in Yorkshire was like many another farmer in the country, when he said—"Ise blue, but I votes yaller; Ise blue to the back-bone, but I votes wi' my landlord." It was a sort of traditional sentiment with the man to vote with his landlord. This was not the way the Welsh tenantry acted. They would attend the landlord's meeting, when the landlord himself or one of his friends was standing for Parliament; they would come and sit on the platform and look very sheepish. They would sit there like fowls roosting, and they would come away looking very foolish; but the feeling of the people was with them, because it was known that possibly something serious might happen to them if they did not attend these meetings. Then would be heard the cry of "Screw! screw!" which was a common cry of the Welsh villagers when Tory meetings were being held, and it had a very significant meaning indeed. All this was very serious. He did not know if blame attached to landlords or agents in the matter; but it was unfortunate that both in religion and politics the landlords and the tenants should be on different sides. And what was the result of all this? Why, in the words of The Times correspondent, the man of business became the intermediary between the landlord and his tenant, and the relations between the man who owned the land and the man who cultivated it became purely commercial; and it was difficult to travel through the country with eyes and ears open without observing that the landlords and agents were cordially disliked. He attached no blame to the landlords for not being able to speak Welsh, nor to the agents for being, as some of them were, Scotchmen, Irishmen, and Englishmen; or, again, for being, as some of them were, captains and colonels. All he said was that there was in Wales an absence of those elements for the solution of the question such as were, fortunately, possessed in England at the present time. Well, what was the remedy? He thought that in all these matters, as in everything else, publicity was a good thing. That in itself went some way towards providing a remedy. If the Government were wise, it would look on the question in a sympathetic spirit; and, considering how little was done for Wales when a Royal Commission sat a few years ago, the Government might fairly institute an impartial inquiry into the whole of the question. But, beyond that, he confessed he thought that some security would be needed for the tenant if he was to be placed in a fairly independent position. For his own part, he should infinitely prefer to see opportunities for purchase provided to any other method of solving this difficulty. But in any case, in order that a purchase system might be provided, it was obvious that rents must be modified. Something would be done if it were settled how many years' purchase should be given for holdings. But, above all, let the Government do something. Do not let them raise a cry against "Agitators." Of course, if hon. Gentlemen liked, they could get up and quote translations from some of the vernacular papers in Wales, which would, no doubt, make the House laugh, and perhaps tend to make people think that the whole of this case was artificial and a sham. Let them do so if they liked. The vernacular Press of Wales was, no doubt, sometimes wild in its phrases, and fond of quoting Scripture, and it very often exaggerated; but even if hon. Members could quote passages illustrating these weaknesses, it would not solve the question. Even if they talked about "professional agitators" and the rest of it, they would not have solved the question to-night. They could not get agitators, and an agitation—a strong agitation, as he supposed they would call it—such as was commencing in Wales, unless there was something to account for it and some solid grievance at the bottom of it. The Welsh were a very patient and a very law-abiding people, and they would not get anything to make them excited or excitable unless there was some genuine reason for it. Well, he felt that he had only stated his case in a very fragmentary way, and he knew that any Englishman who meddled in this question ran the risk of being called an adventurer, who knew nothing about the question. But, he had tried to show, at any rate, that he knew more about it than those who only made a short visit to Welsh watering places or made an occasional visit to Snowdon; and he would venture to challenge even the hon. and gallant Member who was going to move the Amendment to say anything but that—though not in relation to his own estate or those of the best landlords—the circumstances which had been related to-night, as applying to the condition of the Welsh tenantry, were not too sadly true in many parts of Wales. Nothing had been said either by his hon. Friend who had moved the Motion or by himself about that much-abused term "Nationality" or Home Rule leading to disintegration. All that talk was utterly without foundation, so far as the Welsh were concerned. He would tell them how to make a Welsh Question if they wanted to make one. Refuse to Wales all idea that the Welsh had any special peculiarity or special circumstances as a race, and tell them that they were like other large districts in England, with no claim to special treatment; tell them, so far as Church matters went—as he was afraid the present Government would be obliged to tell them—that their complaints could not be listened to at all, and there would soon be a Welsh Question. Some leading English authorities on matters of this kind had been too wise to take up such a position. The late Mr. Matthew Arnold knew better than this; and Parliament would do well if it took his advice so far as Church Disestablishment was concerned. The Welsh people were infinitely in advance of us in regard to education, and were asking for some comprehensive scheme of secondary education, and nothing could be more reasonable than to give them an Educational Council of their own to settle these matters their own way. But tell them that their natural aspirations in the matter of education were not to be acceded to, and then tell them that on this Land Question they had no grievance, and then, without difficulty, they would make a Welsh Question. On the other hand, meet them half-way, and he knew no people more easy to satisfy. The Welsh were timid, but tenacious; and, though slow to move, they were excitable when they considered they had just cause for excitement. It had been said that they were prone to take advantage of the stranger; but that was largely due to the circumstances in which they had grown up, and to the suspicious attitude in which they were placed. But this he was sure of, that there was no more kind-hearted people on the face of the earth. There were two things seriously dangerous in any country like Wales. One was that it should be strongly felt that there was a great social inequality in the country; a feeling not as people would say of mere envy, but a perfectly reasonable and candid desire to count for something in the community in which they lived; and the other was the feeling that the distribution of property and the conditions of tenure of property were unfair and unreasonable, and pressed hardly upon the common people. Well, he feared that, to some extent, both these conditions were present in Wales. If the Government wished to avoid the evil results that might follow, let them, in a spirit of kindly sympathy, make a certain amount of reasonable inquiry, to see whether those who had stated the case that night had spoken falsely or truly. That would be going a long way. If the Government wished to avoid lawlessness—which was totally unnecessary, and need never come about—and further distress, he could only say let them make a full inquiry as to whether, in part at least, some remedy for the present distress could not be found.

Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland

Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard to the special circumstances of Wales, and the prevailing agricultural depression, and their effect upon the welfare of the Welsh people, this House is of opinion that Her Majesty's Government should pay immediate attention to the subject, and take steps to provide a measure of relief which shall secure fairer conditions of tenure and a re-adjustment of rent, more equitably corresponding to the fall in prices, and make such other provisions as will enable the cultivators of the soil to meet the trying circumstances in which they are placed,"—(Mr. Thomas Ellis),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.) said, he had given Notice of the following Amendment:—

"That this House, whilst fully sympathizing with the distressed circumstances of the agricultural population of England and Wales, is of opinion that no special circumstances exist in the tenure of land in Wales justifying exceptional legislation for that portion of the United Kingdom."

He believed he was unable to move this Amendment, owing to the Forms of the House; therefore, he would simply make it the text of the few observations with which he should trouble the House. The four points that had been dealt with by the hon. Member who had made the Motion (Mr. T. E. Ellis) were, first, as the hon. Member had stated, the serious condition of the agricultural tenancy in Wales; secondly, the special circumstances of Wales; thirdly, a fairer condition of tenure; and, fourthly, a re-adjustment of rent. Now, it was not his (Colonel Cornwallis West's) intention to trouble the House with very long remarks; but he thought he might be allowed to allude to a few of the points which had been touched on so ably by the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Motion. The hon. Member had begun by describing to the House what he considered the special circumstances which divided, upon this question, Wales from this country. He had told them that one cause of the great difference which existed between the tenantry in Wales and England consisted in the attachment the tenantry in Wales had for their holdings; and also in the fact that so many of them had been hereditary tenants. Well, he thought that very fact argued in favour of the landlords of Wales. The tenants delighted in remaining on their farms, and if that state of things existed, as he asserted it did, it proved that the tenants were not under that grinding system that many people asked them to believe they were under. This, the hon. Member said, showed a great hunger for land. He (Colonel Cornwallis West) confessed he came from a part of the country where that hunger did not exist. He did not know where it did exist. It might exist in parts of Wales; but, so far as his experience of the Principality went, it certainly was not apparent. The landlords were very thankful to get tenants to take the farms, and he could tell the House that, so far as the county he represented was concerned, there was happily not a single vacant farm in it. This statement applied to the land in Denbighshire. It might be true that it showed that the people were desirous of acquiring farms, but at the same time it proved that the people had the means to take the farms—had the money to take them. It seemed to him to be a hardship to turn round on the men who wished to take farms, and had the money to do so, and who agreed to pay a moderate price for them, and say that they were not to take them because other people could only farm them at a much greater reduction. In the course of his speech the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Motion had stated that to be a rule which, so far as his (Colonel Cornwallis West's) experience went, he denied most emphatically—namely, that Nonconformists were objected to by the landlords. He should like any hon. Member to give him the name, privately, of any great landlord in the Principality who had refused a tenant a farm because the man was a Nonconformist. The hon. Member had gone on to state that not only were tenants refused farms, but that people were not appointed magistrates because they were Nonconformists. That might occur in some parts of the Principality; but all he could say was, that he had the honour to make such appointments, and that he had never in deciding upon them for a moment considered whether a man was a Nonconformist or a Churchman. And now he would for a few moments address himself to the point as to the serious position of the tenantry of the Principality. He could assure the House that the tenantry of Wales at this moment were in a better position than the tenantry of England. He possessed a landed estate in the South of England, and lately he had been obliged to let land there at 10s. per acre; and he appealed to hon. Members who sat around him whether there were any parts of the Principality where land could be said to be worth no more than 10s. an acre? Whilst land in England in some places let for as low as 10s. an acre, in the Principality, so far as he was aware, it never let for less than 15s., and grass land would fetch £1 per acre and upwards. Now, was the tenure of land in Wales so different to that in England as to make it desirable that special legislation should be applied to the Principality? So far as his experience went, the agreements between landlords and tenants were the same in the Principality as in England. There were some exceptions, perhaps, so far as the custom of a county affected them, but they were in the nature of exceptions, and he maintained that it would be impossible to find on any large property in North Wales a single agreement between landlord and tenant which differed in any material point from ordinary English agreements. If that were the case, what was the ground for proposing—as he believed it was proposed—that a similar land measure to that in force in Ireland should be passed for Wales? It was absurd to suppose that the principle of the three “F’s” could by any possibility be applied to Wales. He challenged any hon. Member to give the name of a single landowner in Wales who did not do the whole of the permanent improvements and repairs on his property. Under these circumstances it seemed to him absurd to ask for a Land Bill for Wales on the same principles as the Land Act given to Ireland, where the conditions were totally distinct. It had been said that there had been no general reduction in the rents in Wales. Of course, that was a very difficult question to decide off hand one way or the other. He could only say, from what he had heard and what he had done, that he believed the reductions of rent in Wales had been very large, ranging from 10 to 30 per cent. Of course, he could not say that every owner of landed property, great and small, had granted such reductions; but he did say that the majority of them had granted fair reductions of from 10 to 20 or 30 per cent. He believed that if a Royal Commission were appointed on the subject, which he hoped might be the case, it would be clearly shown that the facts were as he had stated. As far as the landlords of the Principality were concerned, they would hail the appointment of a Royal Commission with the greatest pleasure. Thousands of pounds had been spent on the estate of every large landowner in Wales, and he was in a position to say that at the present moment there were hundreds of farms let at a price which did not pay 3 per cent interest on the capital invested by the landlords in farm-houses, drainage, and other improvements. He himself could guarantee that this was the case in his own part of the Principality, and he had no reason to suppose that a similar state of things did not exist in other parts of Wales. He believed one of the principal sources of the present state of things to be that, unfortunately, many tenant farmers had taken farms without having sufficient capital. Only a few days ago he was reading a most excellent pamphlet, written by Mr. Daniel Owen, of Cardiff, who was distinguished as an authority, and who thoroughly understood agricultural questions. Mr. Owen said—

“Farms are often taken by men with only £3 or £4 an acre, and sometimes even with less. With such men it is a struggle from the first; if a bad harvest comes, the struggle becomes more severe. Still they may manage to keep afloat in the face of one bad harvest, or, perhaps, of two bad harvests; but when it comes to four disastrous seasons, the current is too strong and they are obliged to give way. I cannot too strongly deprecate the evil occasioned by men embarking in farming with inadequate capital. And yet this is constantly done. If a man has, say, £2,000, he should not, as is too often the case, aspire after a farm of 300 or 400 acres.”

He believed that to a great extent what was going on now was the result of men wishing to have large farms, and not having sufficient means to carry them on. There was one point which had been under consideration—namely, as to whether the tenants in Wales did the permanent improvements or not. He had seen this stated to be the case in the Press. Of course, it was a very important question. If the tenants did carry out any permanent improvements, which was very doubtful indeed, he considered that the present Agricultural Holdings Act did not go far enough. What he should like to see, instead of a Motion of this kind, would be the introduction of a Bill dealing with Agriculture both in England and Wales. What he deprecated was to see the subject dealt with piecemeal in relation to one portion of the United Kingdom only. He wanted to see the whole of the country dealt with as one. He did not see why, on a question of this kind, in reference to which the condition of things, as they knew perfectly well, was more or less alike in the two countries, a special Act of Parliament should be required for Wales. The adoption of certain changes in the Agricultural Holdings Act would, he considered, be of much more practical use than the passing of a Motion of this kind. He thought that provision should be made in the Compensation Clauses of the Agricultural Holdings Act for acts of husbandry, due allowance being made for turnip land, fallows, manure, stubbles and seeds, and laying and trimming hedges. Tillages should be definitely explained in the Act, and a valuation scale should also be inserted. If a man, for instance, grazed a field with stock, instead of cutting it for hay, it would, of course, make a considerable difference to him. Compensation might also be given for corn consumed during the last year of the tenancy, and which had been grown upon the farm, due notice being given to the landlord that the tenant wished to consume his own home-grown corn. Such changes, if made, ought to apply to the whole of the Kingdom, and not merely to the Principality. He had been very much surprised at the picture which was drawn by the hon. Member who had last spoken of the condition of Wales, and of the want of sympathy between landlord and tenant which was said to exist there. He had lived in the Principality for his whole life almost, and had never heard of the terrible state of things which the hon. Member had described. He believed his tenants and himself were on the best of terms, and that the same was the case with the landlords and tenants round him with very few exceptions. When the hon. Gentleman said that the whole of the landlords of Wales were out of sympathy with their tenants, his reply was that it was simply not the case.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND said, he had not said a word about the whole of the landlords. He had stated again and again that many landlords were treating their tenants as well as the best English landlords.

COLONEL CORNWALLIS WEST said, he was very glad that he had obtained such a disclaimer from the hon. Member. He was certainly under the impression that the hon. Gentleman had said what he had stated. He would appeal to hon. Members from Wales who had any stake in that country as landowners not to be led to give a vote on the Motion from Party motives or a desire for popularity, but to tell the House whether or not it was true that the tenure of land in Wales was so different from what it was in England, and so hard, in its general effect, as to call for any special legislation. There were many in that House who could give the House such information. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. W. Davies) would, he believed, be able to explain what was the case in that county, and two or three other landlords who were men of position in their counties could state that the fearful picture which had been drawn of the relations between landlords and tenants was entirely imaginary. He believed there were some seven or eight hon. Members who were connected by ties of property with the Principality. The remaining Welsh Members were not, as the House knew, connected by such ties. There were some who hailed from the exchange and some who hailed from the Law Courts. He thought that the seven or eight Members who had property in Wales should support him in his contention that the landlords of Wales were not the tyrants they were made out to be by those who spoke on political platforms. He challenged such hon. Members to make out a case for the application of the principles of the Irish Land Act to Wales. If they could show any estate where the tenant had built his house and farmstead, drained or reclaimed land, bought the tenant-right, or fulfilled any other of the conditions of the Irish land problem, they would no doubt make out a case. He said none of these circumstances existed in Wales at the present time, or, if they did, it was in some portion of the Principality with which he was not acquainted. He felt confident that any proposal which would have the effect of withdrawing the capital now so profusely and so wisely found by the landlord on every large estate, and in most of the small ones too, would result in the ruin of all classes connected with agriculture; and in the severance of those ties of mutual regard and reciprocal good feeling which had characterized the relations of the landlord and tenant in Wales for many years past, and which, he believed, would otherwise be maintained in the future.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Denbigh (Colonel Cornwallis West) claimed to represent a constituency which was, perhaps, more interested than any portion of Wales in the Motion before the House, but he did not think his hon. and gallant Friend could point to a dozen men in his own constituency, except, of course, landlords like himself, who would endorse the sentiments to which he had just given utterance. Indeed, he thought that his hon. and gallant Friend himself was a very recent convert to the views he had expressed. Little more than a year and a-half ago, on the 28th of October, 1886, a public meeting or conference was called at Denbigh for the purpose of discussing the basis of a Land Bill for Wales, afterwards embodied in the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for the Eifion Division of Carnarvonshire (Mr. Bryn Roberts), and which Bill was lately before the House. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was not present, but he was told there was a discussion lasting for something like four hours on the subject. In the evening a public meeting was held, and Colonel Cornwallis West proposed the following resolution:—

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, the present depressed state of agriculture deserves the earnest attention of the Legislature, and it is desirable that a measure should be prepared and submitted to Parliament next Session, with the view of alleviating the distress now so generally felt among the agricultural and labouring population of the country.”

This was followed by a Motion approving of the Bill to which he had already alluded. Under these circumstances, his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Cornwallis West) could not quite claim a monopoly of consistency in this matter. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had taken great pains to arrive at the truth. Some 12 months ago he sent round to a number of his constituents questions as to the present position of agriculture in North Wales. He received a number of answers, which he had handed to his hon. and gallant Friend for the purposes of his speech. As his hon. and gallant Friend had forgotten to return them, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could not quote from them, but he could tell the House that they showed the depreciation of farming stock during the last 10 years in Wales to have been enormous. Not only had there been a great depreciation in stock, but there had been a still greater depreciation in the price of wool, which, in a country where by far the greater number of the farmers were sheep farmers, was a very serious matter. The hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis) had stated this depreciation at something like 60 per cent. He himself should have put it at something like 50 per cent. At any rate, the fall had been very heavy. Side by side with the great depreciation in the value of farming produce, there had been an increase in the rates, especially the sanitary rates. The wages of agricultural labourers had been nearly stationary. He should have thought this rather a matter for congratulation, but unfortunately the cause from which it had arisen was that a large portion of the agricultural population had migrated to the already over-populated industrial centres of England. With regard to rents, as far as he could gather, there had been reductions, but, as a rule, they had been spasmodic and temporary, and certainly inadequate. In some cases, no doubt, they had amounted to 20 per cent, but the average had been from 10 to 15 per cent. The tithe rent-charge, which he could only describe as a sort of running sore, eating into the very heart of the political and religious life of the people, had not been reduced at all. If matters had stood there, he would have agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Denbigh (Colonel Cornwallis West), that it was difficult to establish a distinction between England and Wales, because, if Wales had suffered much, England had suffered much also. He made his hon. and gallant Friend a present of that admission. He thought it quite possible that the great wheat-growing districts of England, such as those of Lincolnshire and Essex, were suffering quite as much as Wales. His hon. and gallant Friend said he was obliged to let English land at 10s. an acre. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was in a worse position than that, because he had an English farm which he could not let at all. But his hon. Friends who had respectively moved and seconded the Motion, had referred to two things which materially distinguished the case of Wales from that of England, and which, he thought, called for the special interference of Parliament. One of these was that extraordinary land-hunger which seemed to be common to all Celtic nations. His hon. and gallant Friend had said that there was not a single farm vacant on his estate. That was extremely probable. But why was that? It was because the farmer had nothing else to do but agricultural work, and nowhere else to turn to. In North Wales, at least, they had no large towns to draw off the surplus agricultural population. Indeed, the Welsh farmer who was deprived of his holding was the most helpless being in the whole world. He could not go to England on account of his ignorance of the English language, and he could not engage in any other industrial employment. He was forced back upon the land. In addition to this, he was strongly attached to the soil. These facts completely disposed of the argument which his hon. and gallant Friend based upon the circumstance, that there was no farm to let upon his estate. There was another material difference between the Welsh and English agriculturists. Between the Welsh landlord and tenant there was a "great gulf fixed." Englishmen did not understand this. They passed through Wales and visited watering places like Llandudno and Rhyl, but they obtained no knowledge whatever of the condition of the people. The barriers that separated landlord and tenant in Wales were almost insurmountable. There were barriers of language, barriers of race, religious barriers, political barriers. The Welsh landlords and tenants lived and moved in entirely different worlds. They spoke different tongues; they attended different places of worship; there was no common ground on which they could meet. Could there be a greater barrier than that which separated them in regard to language alone? Had any of them tried to drive a bargain in a language—such as German or Italian—of which they had but an imperfect knowledge? That was the normal condition of the Welsh tenant-farmer. People talked of freedom of contract, but it was impossible to have absolute freedom of contract where one of the parties did not understand the language in which the contract was written. The matter was exceedingly well put in a pamphlet written by Mr. R. A. Jones, who pointed out that the prevalence of the Welsh language in itself rendered it impossible for the two classes to be in sympathy one with the other. The result of these differences in language, religion, and politics was practically to place the Welsh landlords and tenants at arm's length. He said advisedly that the condition of Wales in this respect was far more like that of Ireland than that of England. His hon. and gallant Friend had challenged any man to say whether improvements were made by the tenants in Wales. In some cases they were, but it was perhaps difficult to lay down any general rule. He, however, relied not so much upon that point as upon the fact of the existence of the class-wall, as he might call it, between landlord and tenant. This was practically equivalent, in its effects, to absenteeism. As a rule, it was very difficult to convince Englishmen that a Welshman was anything more than a peculiar kind of Englishman, who preferred an Eisteddfod to a horse-race and spoke a language which no one could understand. It was refreshing, therefore, to find an Englishman like the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland), who, if he had lived for 50 years in Wales, could have more accurately stated the condition of the country than he had done in his speech. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Cornwallis West) had suggested that the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. W. Davies) should tell the House something about the condition of his county. The hon. Member for Pembroke, however, could scarcely be said to represent Wales at all. Parts of Pembroke was generally known as "Little England beyond Wales," and was an English colony. It did seem to be a little hard that because one, or possibly two, of the counties in Wales were satisfied with the present condition of things, the other 10 counties should be denied the justice they asked for. Of course, the House would be told that since the Union, in the time of Henry VIII., Wales was politically an integral part of England. That was the old argument which one always heard on these occasions, and it was one more worthy of a lawyer than of a statesman. The House of Commons had already knocked a good many holes in the Statute of Henry VIII., and they hoped to knock a good many more. Two or three Statutes had been passed which applied only to Wales, and when the House of Commons, by allowing it to be read a second time, put its seal, as it were, on the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill, it practically recognized the fact that Wales was entitled to distinctive treatment at the hands of Parliament. But, be that as it might, they could no more turn Welshmen into Englishmen than they could turn Englishmen into Welshmen. Say what they liked, the Welsh people were a distinct nationality. If their laws were the same, their customs, their habits of life, their language were different, and if the laws of a people did not correspond to their requirements, the sooner they were altered the better.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) said, he must congratulate the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis) upon the exceedingly courteous and tolerant way in which he had introduced this subject to the House. He felt that the tone of the speech of the hon. Gentleman had been such that it rendered it somewhat difficult for anyone who differed from him in many points to make his views sufficiently heard. Though he agreed up to a certain point with the last words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) with regard to the question of national sentiment, he felt the remarks the right hon. Gentleman made with regard to the want of sympathy between landlord and tenant, as resulting from the necessity of two languages in Wales, were, he would not say overstrained, but exaggerated and altogether beside the question at issue. The right hon. Gentleman had lived in Wales for a great number of years, but had he ever found a landlord in Wales who was not in sympathy with his tenants for the simple reason that he was not able to speak to them in their own language? He (Mr. Kenyon) had lived in Wales all his life, and had been connected all his life with the land.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he did not attribute any blame to the landlords. It was their misfortune, not their fault.

MR. KENYON said, he did not accuse the right hon. Gentleman of doing so. He was about to say that he had lived all his life in Wales, and that he had been connected, perhaps, more closely with land in Wales than the right hon. Gentleman. For 20 years he had been an agent of a large property in Wales. In that capacity he had been brought in contact with the tenant farmers and cottagers in Wales, and now he was a trustee and managing owner of a very large estate in North Wales. Never in his experience had there been any difference of opinion between him and those with whom he had had to deal very largely, on the score of language. There was perfect sympathy as between landlord and tenant, and he had no hesitation in saying, speaking from an experience both as tenant and as a manager of estates—and as a tenant he had no doubt he had, perhaps, as much experience as the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis), for he had farmed 350 acres for a considerable number of years at a considerable loss, and he was now farming his own land at a larger loss still—he had no hesitation in saying that the question of language or the question of land tenure in general in Wales had had no different effect upon him as a tenant or as a land agent than they would have had if he had lived in Shropshire over the Border. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. E. Ellis) based his Motion upon the statement that there were exceptional circumstances in Wales which required exceptional legislation. Now, what were the exceptional circumstances in Wales to which the hon. Gentleman referred? In the first place, the hon. Gentleman contended that there had been a great fall in prices. Surely there had been no greater fall in prices in Wales than there had been in any county over the Border; on the contrary, the prices in Wales had been less affected by the general depression of agriculture than the prices in the Border counties had been affected, and for this reason, that the great trade which was done by Welsh farmers, was done in mutton and in wool. No doubt the fluctuations in the price of wool were at one time very considerable; but wool at the present time was one of the very few things which had risen in price. Meat, too, had risen in price. Therefore, at the present moment, the two staple articles upon which Welsh farmers depended were actually on the rise, and not on the fall as the hon. Gentleman would lead the House to understand. Cheese was very largely produced in Wales, but, possibly, not to the same extent in the counties which the hon. Member (Mr. T. E. Ellis) was particularly acquainted as in the counties with which he (Mr. Kenyon) was specially concerned. Now, the value of cheese had actually risen during the last two years very considerably, and at the present moment was sold at a higher price in the market than it had been sold at for the last three years. If they took, therefore, the question of price, he thought the average fall in prices in Wales was certainly not greater, but if anything rather less than in the Border counties in England. Then the hon. Gentleman argued that the average reduction in rent had not been commensurate with the fall in prices. He (Mr. Kenyon) happened to know a little about the subject, and he asserted, without hesitation, that the average reductions in rent in the counties in Wales were certainly larger than the average reductions in the Border counties in England. The average reductions in rent in the Welsh counties with which he was acquainted varied from 15 to 30 per cent. In some cases they had amounted to 50 per cent, and many cases within his knowledge there had been permanent reductions in rent amounting to 30 per cent. He thought that if they came to investigate the question carefully it would be found that the reductions of rent in Wales, if not far in excess, were, at any rate, quite as large as the average reductions made in England. If there were no exceptional circumstances with regard to prices and reductions of rent, were there exceptional circumstances with regard to rates or agreements? He did not know what the average rates all through England were; but he knew that in Wales they were extremely reasonable. The average rating of Welsh parishes was 2s. 3d. in the pound, while the rating in many English counties amounted to 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. in the pound. The Welsh rates, except in some of the mining parishes, where there had been a great deal of pauperism, and where, perhaps, there had been large expenditure on school boards, would be found to be no higher than the rates in the rest of the United Kingdom. Now, they were told that the landlords in Wales bore some resemblance to their Irish brethren, of whom he wished to say nothing evil. They were told that the Welsh tenants made improvements, and that the landlords were such horrible creatures that they sucked up all the improved value after the improvements were made. Now, as he had said, he had had much experience as regarded land in Wales, but he did not hesitate to say that there was never made an observation which was so absolutely and entirely contrary to the facts as that statement. He was well acquainted with a large estate in Wales where, for many years, 50 and 75 per cent of the rental of the property was spent in making permanent improvements upon the property, and that after that time, and ever since, 25 per cent of the rental had been spent upon the property. Upon a very large estate adjoining the one he had just spoken of, they spent for some years the whole rent upon the property, and within his knowledge as a land agent there was not a single case in which a tenant had ever erected any building, or had ever made a permanent improvement upon the property with the single exception of drainage. Some tenants had cut the drains, but the landlords had provided the pipes. To compare the Welsh landlords with the landlords of Ireland was, therefore, unreasonable. He thought he might fairly say that the landlords had done their duty in expending money upon their property, and that they were entitled to be treated with justice and respect. There was one other point to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire alluded. In Wales, for some reason or another, a great deal of land had changed hands during the last 30 or 40 years. There had been cases of a certain amount of hardship to the tenants in consequence of this change of proprietorship. Where there was an old established estate, the probability was that the landlord had no desire to get rid of his tenant, and the tenant had no desire to leave his landlord. But there came a change; owing to some reason or other the land changed hands. Land in North Wales, particularly, had recently changed hands. The new landlord, coming in, perhaps from Ireland or Liverpool, might have paid a good price for the land. It had happened that the farms had been re-valued, tenants had been asked to accept the new valuation, and on their refusal to do so had been turned out. That unquestionably was a hardship which the tenants suffered. It was a hardship which, as had been fairly pointed out, was not altogether covered by the Agricultural Holdings Act. Some additional clause might very properly be put in the Act to cover the position of the sitting tenant—say of a man who had occupied the farm for a certain number of years. There was one other matter to which he must draw the attention of the House, and that was the Crown rents. There was a quantity of land in Wales which was subject to certain claims on the part of the Crown. Some years ago the Crown came down upon a little village in Wales, and claimed from the tenants 19 years' arrears of Crown rents. For 19 years the Crown rents had never been asked for; but then the Crown came down upon the people, because they knew the thing was getting far too old. It was very hard upon the owners that they should be asked to pay these rents, of which some of them had never even heard a syllable. The same thing had happened in parts of Merionethshire. He thought the House was entitled to hear from the Government what steps the Crown intended to take in the future with regard to its rents. He did think that, in the interest of the Welsh farmer—and no man had more sympathy for the Welsh farmer than he had—they ought to do all they could to ameliorate his condition. The Government would certainly do Wales a good turn if it granted a remission of such rents and royalties which existed at this moment. The landlords of Wales had been told that they were out of sympathy with the tenants. He did not believe it. He did not believe that any of the late riots had anything to do with the relations between landlord and tenant. He believed that landlord and tenant were, as they ever had been, one; that they always would pull together if they were not divorced by a foolish and one-sided policy on the part of the Government of the day—Liberal or Tory, as the case might be—and if, on the other hand, they were not led astray by—could he say—agitators? He would not use the term in reference to any friend of his on the opposite Benches, but simply in reference to certain ambitious Gentlemen who, perhaps, had some reason in putting themselves prominently forward. He maintained that if neither of the two elements he had mentioned prevailed—if the Welsh were treated with reason by the Government, if their just claims to legislation were regarded, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite would refrain from agitation, from stirring up strife in the country, his firm impression was that the traditional loyalty and good sense of the Welsh people would re-assert itself, and that Wales would still remain what it had ever been, the most law-abiding portion of Her Majesty's Dominions.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire) said, he did not rise at this late hour (11.20) to interpose at any length in the debate; indeed, he thought that the Welsh Members with whom he acted had very little occasion to elaborate their case. Even the speech to which the House had just listened proved conclusively the justice of the case of the hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis). The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kenyon) began by the admission, which was greatly in their favour, that so far from the hon. Member for Merionethshire having opened the discussion in the spirit of an agitator, he had opened it in the spirit of a young and promising Welsh statesman. The Welsh Members certainly owed the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. E. Ellis) a debt of gratitude for the exhaustive statement he had made on their behalf. The unity of the Welsh Representatives on this question was considerable, and the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Denbighshire (Colonel Cornwallis West) had not given them much alarm or anxiety. That the hon. and gallant Gentleman should move an Amendment at all was a surprise to most of them. He had always looked upon his hon. and gallant Friend as a more advanced land reformer than himself; he had always supposed the hon. and gallant Member committed to a view of land reform from which he (Mr. Stuart Rendel), with his poor judgment, shrank. But the hon. and gallant Gentleman had given them great hope and satisfaction, for he had pledged himself to the desirability of the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the question of agriculture in Wales. They knew that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not want to give to his Welsh tenants what it was impossible for him to confer upon his English tenants. With that species of opposition they might be well content. His hon. and gallant Friend made some statements, however, upon which he desired to comment for a moment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman referred, and referred with legitimate pride, to the fact that on many large estates in Wales no case arose which would justify an application to the House for its attention. He (Mr. Stuart Rendel) and his hon. Colleagues admitted it; they always would admit it. They believed that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's case was a case in point. But their complaint was not against the large landlords at all. Their grievance rather arose from the fact that Wales was peculiarly a country of small landlords, and, unfortunately, of indebted landowners. It was the case of these which was in question. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had also gently insinuated that if the question rested with the landowning Representatives of agricultural constituencies in Wales, no difficulty would arise. The case which the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself adduced was one which sufficiently answered that argument. The hon. and gallant Member pointed to the fact that there were only seven landowning Representatives of agricultural constituencies in Wales, though there were at least 20 of such constituencies. The mere circumstance that Wales returned from agricultural constituencies men other than landowners in such an overwhelming degree, the very fact that it rejected its natural leaders, the very men who had the best opportunities for gaining the confidence of the public in such constituencies, was surely a very solid argument, showing that there was something wrong in the relations between the landlords and the tenants in Wales. The hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to be under a strange impression. He stated with great courtesy, if he stated it definitely at all, that persons other than landowners were not altogether competent to discuss this question. But it did not present itself to them as an agricultural technical question. Many of them could not pretend to be competent judges on agricultural matters, but to them this was an industrial problem, and he thought that so far from landowners wishing to have an exclusive audience in the House and the country on matters in which they were supreme, it surely was desirable that they should refer such matters, or be willing to refer such matters, not only to disinterested persons, but to those who had an outside experience of the other industries of the country. He thought it was possible to show that some of the errors which had arisen in the agricultural system of Wales were due to the want of elementary knowledge on general industrial questions which the landlords unfortunately displayed. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Cornwallis West) cited a case. He (Mr. Stuart Rendel) would take that case, not because it was a strong one, but because it came from the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said the fact was that the mischief was largely due to the circumstance that so many tenants took farms for which they had not capital enough. Surely a landlord ought not to let his farms to tenants without sufficient capital. Why was a landlord induced to do this? Simply because he regarded it to his interest to have as large a competition for his farms as possible. If a landlord would only see that the competition was narrowed to men he knew to be competent to take the farms it was quite certain he would get rid of the very difficulties to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Cornwallis West) had attributed so much of the present state of things. There was another and a larger question relating to rent on which a more grievous error was frequently made by landlords. Welsh landlords were too much in the habit of considering that a fair rent was that which a farm would bring. The House knew that that unfortunately was an idea which was a great deal too commonly held as to what was a fair rent. A fair rent was certainly, as his

hon. and gallant Friend would agree, not what a farm would bring, but what the land could fairly earn and pay. The contention of the Supporters of the Motion was that for a long period back the tenants of Wales—than whom there were no tenants in the world more thrifty, industrious, and frugal, had been required to pay the price of existence and starvation rents. The result of this had been a more general depletion, a more widely extended condition of agricultural distress, a greater depopulation of whole districts, than perhaps could be instanced in the kingdom anywhere out of the Highlands of Scotland. Now, the idea was entertained in some quarters that the effect of making this Motion would be mischievous rather than beneficial, because it might, to a certain extent, shake confidence in capital, and might disincline investors to come to Wales. But it had been admitted, and admitted by the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Kenyon)—he believed it was also admitted by the hon. Member for West Denbighshire (Colonel Cornwallis West)—that if there were hardships and injustice in Wales, it was constantly occasioned by investors in land in Wales. Strangers came to Wales, put their money in land as a mere investment, and often acted in the harshest of manners. If hon. Gentlemen opposite were not aware of such cases, he and his hon. Friends could furnish them with plenty of them. No doubt confidence in capital was a very important thing for any industry; but what was wanted in Wales was not to give confidence to capital, but to give confidence to industry. How could there be any confidence in the agricultural industry under a system of yearly tenancy, and of competitive rent exaggerated to the highest point by the necessities of the people? That the competition for rent was exaggerated to the highest point in Wales, the House of Commons could easily satisfy itself upon if it would only take the trouble to inquire. Enough had been said about severance between the people and the landowning class—enough, for this evening, at any rate, but it was as well the House should consider, for a moment, what was the position of a Welsh speaking farmer ousted from his holding. A Welsh speaking farmer had absolutely no other resource open to him in Wales; he could not go out of Wales; he was simply turned out on the road side. If the landlords chose to remit the study of the question of fair rent to agents, if they would not look into the question of rental for themselves, the result inevitably must be that the country must become over rented as it was now. Upon the question of rental it was as well to point out that in Wales the rise of rent had been altogether exceptional. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had said, Wales was a pastoral country, and depended largely on wool and mutton. The opening up of railways in Wales brought the sheep-farming industry very rapidly to the front. Undoubtedly it gave a great stimulus to that industry, because it secured to farmers a sale for their mutton as well as for their wool, and this led to a very large rise in rents. It could be shown, to the satisfaction of the House, that the rise in rents of some hill farms in Wales was nearer 100 per cent than 35 or 40 per cent. He could adduce a multitude of cases where the rise had been far greater than 35 or 40 per cent, but he admitted that they would be isolated cases. All these facts, however, a Royal Commission would soon discover. There was unquestionably in Wales a state of things which required the serious attention of Parliament. If Parliament would not attend to this matter when they had before them clear evidence upon which to go, there was only one course for the people to adopt. If there was no other method of securing an adjustment of rent, and a better system of tenure than that of combination on the part of the tenants, that combination must be and would be sooner or later brought about. He and his hon. Friends liked agitation so little that they did not at all desire to see this combination stimulated, and it was for that reason mainly that they took the earliest opportunity of appealing to the House to seriously consider the case of Wales, and not to invite Wales to become in agricultural revolution a half-way house between Ireland and England.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, that hon. Members had talked of the land-hunger in Wales and of the extraordinary competition for land which prevailed there. But did hon. Gentlemen speak from experience or were they only echoing an old Irish cry? Mr. Doyle, in his excellent Report to the Royal Commission of 1882, said, that restricted competition for farms in Wales compelled owners in many cases to accept undesirable tenants—men without skill, enterprise, or capital. How, then, could hon. Members speak of land-hunger when persons who had inquired into the subject spoke of the want of competition? Mr. Doyle had shown that the almost exclusive use of the Welsh language gave Welshmen, especially in remote parts, almost an exclusive monopoly of land-holding, and that they entertained a great jealousy of strangers. But the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborn Morgan) complained that some of the landlords did not know Welsh; he must remind the House that the right hon. Gentleman himself could only communicate with his Welsh constituents through an interpreter. There were two sorts of farmers in Wales—farmers of land and farmers of the platform. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment was one of the farmers of the platform; he had never had anything to do with land; his occupation was of a very different character. The leaders of this Welsh agitation were persons connected with the Press. They had heard a good deal about politics and religion in this debate. A farmer did not make his farm pay by politics, nor yet by religion, but by a knowledge of agriculture. The landowners, who were the real friends of the farmers, had reason to complain that they got no assistance from politicians in anything they did to help the farmers. He did not wish to minimize the misfortunes of Wales, but the reason of their existence was a very simple one. They were due to bad seasons, high rates, foreign competition, and professional agitators. According to the Land Agents' Record, which had been frequently referred to, people were afraid to invest money in land. What was necessary was to restore confidence to all classes of the people, and that could never be done so long as some hon. Members encouraged violence and class hatred. The payment of rent was not the cause of the Welsh farmers' misfortunes. There were in Wales a large number of freeholders, some 50,000, and they were a great deal worse off than the tenants. The hon. Member for Merionethshire made a whole string of statements without producing any evidence to support them. He would, however, give a few figures in support of his case. In 1862 the profits of the farmers, as appeared from the returns under Schedule B of the Income Tax, in the 28th Report of the Inland Revenue, were £2,659,000; in 1876 £3,183,000; and in 1883-4 £3,214,000; so that in the course of those years there was a continuous increase. Again, from the local taxation returns 1884-5, it appeared that the rateable value of property had increased in every county but one, and the last Return of agricultural statistics for 1886-7 showed that the number of acres under corn and under green grass had increased, that the number of horses, sheep, and pigs had increased, and that the land under cultivation had increased. In fact, everything had increased but cattle, which had decreased to a small extent. This was an organized and factitious agitation. A year ago there was a great meeting held at Rhyl to inaugurate a Land League for Wales, and placards were issued headed "Farmers, awake!" and calling on farmers to attend. They, however, did not, and one Radical newspaper the next day had to lament that "Farmers were conspicuous by their absence," while another charged Welsh farmers with "cowardice and servility." The fact was that there was only a minority in each constituency in favour of this agitation, but this minority had to be satisfied, and so as to satisfy them hon. Members opposite were bound to make a hubbub in the House. But in so doing they did not represent the majority of the Welsh people. There was a split among the agitators themselves. In Denbighshire a counter association to the National Radical Federation had been started, in which the hon. Member for Merionethshire took a leading part.

MR. T. E. ELLIS said, he was not even a member of the counter association.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, at any rate, there was a counter association, and serious differences of opinion existed even amongst the Radical Members themselves on this subject.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to possess more wrong information on this subject than he could have believed possible; and between this inaccurate information and the tortuous windings of his speech had effectually concealed from the House the course of what he (Mr. Rowlands) supposed was intended for argument. He was sorry that the hon. Member had spoken of a factitious agitation and described the Welsh Members as agitators. He could not see the logic of the argument that their action was dictated by a desire to please their constituents, and that, nevertheless, they did not really represent their constituents in this matter. The hon. Member had made assertions without proving them. He had, it was true, quoted from the Report of Mr. Doyle; but, as had already been shown, the inquiry upon which that Report was founded was conducted by a person who knew nothing about Wales, and who obtained information from Poor Law clerks who were not competent to give it. The difficulties of the situation in Wales could not be settled by mere temporary reductions of rent. In order to inspire the tenants with that confidence which was essential for the successful practice of agriculture, rents must be permanently reduced or the land must be re-valued and security of tenure with freedom of sale assured to the cultivators of the soil.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): This has been an interesting debate to those who take any particular interest in the Principality of Wales; but I think it has been shorn of what might have been its most interesting feature, and reduced rather to the position of "Hamlet" with the principal figure in that play omitted. We are all aware that on the Front Bench opposite generally sits that eminent Member of this House best qualified to advise his own followers on the question of land tenure in Wales, and I think we must all regret that the "Squire of Hawarden" has not thought fit to give his followers that advice he might have given on this interesting subject. But in his absence we must do the best we can. I hope the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis), who brought on this Motion in a speech which, I think, was both moderate and circumspect, will understand that on this side of the House, and certainly with Her Majesty's Government, there is at least as full sympathy with all the trials and difficulties that have arisen out of the depression in agriculture as he or any of his Friends can claim to show. I should be sorry it should be supposed that, in opposing this Motion, the Government are acting with any want of sympathy with a class so entirely deserving of it as the farmers of Wales are, no less than those of England. The hon. Member's speech was both moderate and circumspect, extremely moderate in comparison with utterances of advocates of agricultural changes outside this House; and he was extremely circumspect in his instances, for he did not refer to any particular case in the course of his argument, with the exception of one anonymous landlord in Cardiganshire. But the House should not be left altogether ignorant of the sort of language used in connection with this subject by orators who speak with more freedom and less responsibility than Members when addressing this House. I dare say hon. Members on both sides may have seen a letter which appeared in The Times of the 18th of the present month, and signed by Mr. Gee, President of the Land League of Wales, or one of the Land Leagues of Wales, for I gather there are more than one. In this letter the writer defines the attitude of himself and his friends in language which deserves the attention of the House of Commons. Mr. Gee referred to an occasion when he was reported to have spoken about "rotten landlords," and as he was anxious to disclaim this soft impeachment, he wrote to The Times to say that he did not speak of "rotten landlords," but of "rotten land laws." That is a very easy mistake for a reporter to make; but as Mr. Gee goes on to point out that he addressed his audience in the Welsh tongue, it does not seem quite so easy to understand how the reporter fell into the error; and when he further goes on to clinch his argument, or, as I should say, judiciously forgets to clinch his argument, by any reference to the fact that some persons among his audience cried out "Shoot them!" he wisely disregards the consideration that persons who desire to shoot usually select something more tangible to shoot at than laws. However, Mr. Gee goes on to say what was the language he used, and these are the words he employs. He said—

Mr. Stanley Leighton.

"The changes advocated by the Welsh Land League will of necessity cause great disturbance among landlords and their families, but that no social revolution of the kind, however grave and unpleasant it might be, is sufficient reason why these reforms should not be effected."

He also stated, he says—

"That these changes should be effected by Constitutional means, but should these means fail, the responsibility will rest on our opponents if a revolution of another kind should take place, as it was impossible the country could continue subject to these oppressive laws for many years longer."

Well, I give this language, not only because it is well that Parliament should be made aware of the sort of propaganda going on in Wales, but to do credit to the very different tone of the hon. Member for Merionethshire, who, in introducing his Motion to-night, "roared as gently as any sucking dove." Mr. Gee goes on to say what is included in his programme. He wants a Land Court established, with a sliding scale of rents, fixity of tenure, compensation for improvements, State aid to tenants for the purchase of holdings by loans spread over 50 years, the abolition of primogeniture and entail, the enfranchisement of leaseholders, the transfer of royalties to the Crown—that has not been, I think, a very popular thing in Wales—the abolition of the Game Laws, the revaluation of tithe rent charges, free rivers, paid Members of Parliament—and, of course what seems to be most important of all, the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church. This is a large programme, and I will not now attempt to discuss the various items in it; but I mention them to show that when the hon. Member comes with an extremely innocent-looking Motion inviting the attention of the Government to legislation to meet the agricultural depression in Wales, a great many people who act with him, and whose spokesman in the House he is presumed to be, attach a great deal more meaning to the Motion than he has given in his colourless speech in introducing it. The hon. Gentleman went, first of all, to the Commission of 1879, and referred to the Report of Mr. Doyle. Now, I do not wish, at this hour, to detain the House by following the hon. Member on the various objections he took to that Report—and, indeed, we have been told by the hon. and learned Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. Bowen Rowlands), that the Report is only worthy of consideration when it expresses his view, not when it expresses the view of anybody else—but the hon. Member mentioned in connection with the Report that the late Lord Penrhyn—who we may accept as one of the best landlords that ever filled that position in Wales or any other country—the hon. Member himself did full credit to his memory—that the late Lord Penrhyn used the phrase "hereditary tenantry." What is the meaning of a phrase of this sort? It was taken up by the hon. Gentleman, who made a great deal of it. Does it point to bad relations between landlord and tenant? Does the fact that tenants occupied holdings on which their fathers were born and which their forefathers have occupied for centuries, does that point to the existence of so much bad blood, the absence of sympathy and want of cordial relations between landlord and tenant, with which, according to hon. Members, land tenure in Wales is cursed? I should say that, as regards the little hill farmers who hang on to their holdings with the most narrow means, with the greatest difficulty scraping together the means for their frugal existence, who cling to their position in times of the greatest difficulty for landlord and tenant, this long hereditary tenure of farms is as good testimony as we can possibly have of the friendly and cordial relations that from time immemorial have existed between landlord and tenant. Then a curious point came out in the speeches of the hon. Member and others who followed him. I always like to see a man's true nature appear through the artificial layer circumstances impose upon it. I believe the hon. Member believes himself to be a staunch Free Trader, yet he actually told us that one of his suggestions for improving the condition of Welsh farmers was that Englishmen should be prevented from competing for the purchase of land in the Principality! [Mr. T. E. ELLIS: Not at all.] Yes. Did he not say that tenants should have pre-emption? What is that but preventing the other side coming in? If you say that two parties may compete, but on the condition that one of them shall secure occupation, you rather neutralize the value of the competition on the other side. I do not think that anyone would care to engage in a competition if he knew that his opponent would be certain to get the lot when the auctioneer knocked it down. We have been told that it is a great hardship that a premium is put upon the purchase of an estate when it comes to the hammer because wealthy Englishmen bid. The hon. Member is a friend to the people of Wales; but he is actually prepared to exclude from residence in Wales, or from the rights of proprietorship and occupation there, the very men who fertilize its barren soil by bringing in English capital and English custom. Well, I never heard from any Gentleman who professed to be a popular Representative a more extraordinary panacea for the ills of his country than this proposal. We were told in one breath that tenants were so anxious to purchase that they were prepared to give fancy prices for property; but then the next moment we were told that the tenants were all, without exception, insolvent. We were told that these men, who were prepared to give for the land more than it was worth, were actually in a position of such universal bankruptcy that they were unable to meet their most ordinary engagements. I leave these arguments to meet each other. I do not see that he can maintain them both, and the hon. Member is welcome to the use of either to the exclusion of the other. We have been told, too, this is not simply an agricultural question, and, in fact, there has been very little said on the agricultural aspect of it. The hon. and gallant Member for West Denbighshire (Colonel Cornwallis West), it is true, did endeavour to treat it as an agricultural question; but although there have been casual allusions to it in the speeches of hon. Members, we have been constantly treated to the old story of the necessary separation of landlord and tenant by language, religion, and politics. Well, of course, I do not deny that it is matter of regret that landlords and tenants in Wales do little speak in the same language, and I make the admission frankly that landlords would do better if they did speak the Welsh language. I think it is extremely desirable that in an age when a greater sense of the responsibility of property is growing up that landlords should be in a position to talk to their tenants in the vernacular. More and more I think this will be done. So, also, as regards religion, it is unfortunate that landlords and tenants should be separated in attending places of worship. But I have always thought that in this there is much that is creditable to both parties. It is creditable to the independence of the tenants who, we are told, on the authority of Radical papers, are reduced to a condition so servile that they have not the courage of their opinions, that they never shrink from following that form of religion which is consonant with their conscientious convictions. Although, as a rule, landlord and tenants go to different places of worship, each deserves equal credit for going to the place which he believes is on the whole best suited to his own form of faith. And then as regards politics. The Welsh are, we know, a very impetuous race, and they take the keenest interest in the events of the day. They are extremely intelligent and quick to follow the political movements of the time. Nothing, then, is more likely than that differences of political opinion should arise. But admitting all these facts, what possible connection have they with agricultural tenure? What in the world is there to connect this question with acquiescence with the Thirty-Nine Articles, the expediency of Free Trade, or even with differences which prevail on the Irish policy; or what is there about the bilingual difficulty which should lead this House to make a new and separate agrarian law in regard to one integral part of the Kingdom? The conditions under which land is held are conditions that have grown out of old custom over a long time, and they are equal in Wales and England. There is a great deal of human nature in the Welshman, and he is not so unlike the Englishman as he is said to be, and I think you will find that there is no practical reason why, if you make a change in the relations of landlord and tenant in Wales, it should not equally apply to the relations between landlord and tenant in England. I believe the House would do very poor service to Wales if it made Wales the second subject of an experiment such as had been made in Ireland, if it were to extinguish what I believe to be the natural, friendly, and reasonable relations between landlord and tenant in Wales by attempting to legislate on lines which have already proved so disastrous in the Sister Island. We were told that until a few years ago rent was held to be as sacred by the tenant as by the landlord in Wales; and I will go further and say I think rent is at the present time as sacred in the eyes of the tenant as of the landlord. I think, in the enormous majority of cases in Wales, the Welsh tenant is quite prepared to pay his rent as far as he can. I think he is extremely honest in his relations with his landlord; and, on the other hand, I think there is an equal disposition to fairness on the part of the landlord, who has been ready and willing to make such abatements as appeared necessary in view of the depressed state of agriculture at the time. I cannot quite accept the speech of the hon. Member for the Rotherham Division of the West Riding of York (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland), who is also, I believe, Bursar of Balliol College, and who, I think, speaks of the relations between landlord and tenant from the point of view of a College Bursar—the most unfortunate phase of the relations that exist in any part of the Principality between landlord and tenant. The hon. Member, who has lived for some time in Wales, gave us with the greatest care the result of his own experience, and he drew a very painful picture of what he believed to be the relations between landlord and tenant. I am quite ready to admit that in the case of Corporations, necessarily an absentee proprietorship, it is impossible to cultivate those cordial and friendly relations that spring up between man and man in the position of landlord and tenant, and it is extremely probable that the Bursar of the College found there was not that spontaneous cordiality that meets any gentleman who acquires property there. I do not myself speak as a landlord in Wales;

but I live in Wales, and have lived there not quite so long, perhaps, as my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan), but very nearly. I know something of the Welsh people from the point of view even of a landlord on a small scale, and I can only say that I never found the slightest difficulty in dealing with my tenants on account of difference in language, politics, or religion. If I may do so without being open to a charge of egotism, I would relate an incident from my personal experience that will illustrate in some degree what are the relations between landlord and tenant, even when the landlord is what some hon. Members call an alien. A few years ago I had a tenant on a small farm, a widow, and she came to me in great trouble and was very anxious that I should put in a distress for the rent. I said—"Surely this is one of the most extraordinary requests ever made. I do not believe the rent is due." "Oh, yes; it is," she said—"it was due last week, and I have come to ask you to put in a distress." Then, when I came to inquire the reason, she told me that the village usurer—he happened also to be a popular Nonconformist preacher—had a bill against them. Years before they had borrowed £20 from him, and, though he had been paid twice over, yet still he made a claim for more than the original sum; "and he is sure," said she, "to put in an execution if you do not protect your tenant." Well, I did what I could. I went to the usurer, and, after listening to some bad language, got him not to press his claim. I only mention this to show the sort of relation that exists in my part of Wales, when a tenant of the poorest, feeblest class comes to the landlord as his natural protector and friend in any difficulty that may threaten him. I do not wish to detain the House further. I only wished to show that there is no want of sympathy on the part of the Government, and those who sit on this side, with the difficulties that are allowed to have arisen from agricultural depression; but we believe, at the same time, that nothing could be more fatal to the true interest of Wales, and especially of Welsh agriculturists, than for us to yield to an agitation got up by two or three incendiary newspapers, however mildly the case may be presented to the House.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) said, he would only make a very few observations on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes). The right hon. Gentleman admitted to the full the differences of race, language, politics, and religion that existed in the relations between landlord and tenant; but he asked what possible connection could there be between these matters and agriculture? The right hon. Gentleman could not have paid much attention to the speeches delivered, because that connection was shown in the clearest manner possible. The English land system was such that it could not be applied with success unless there was an entire community of feeling between landlord and tenant on these subjects; because the power given to the landlord was so omnipotent that it could be used, and was used, to the injury of the tenant where these antagonisms prevailed. This was the strong ground for land tenure reform in Wales rather than in England. The right hon. Gentleman said he never found any difficulty; but though he actually lived in Wales he was only just within the Welsh Border, where not a word of Welsh was spoken, and where the people were, practically speaking, English, though Welsh by descent, and geographically inhabitants of Wales. Such also was the case with the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Kenyon), who lived on the Border, where Welsh views, habits, and language did not exist.

MR. KENYON said, he begged to be allowed to correct the hon. Member. He had spoken not of his own locality, but also of the constituency he represented in the very heart of North Wales.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS said, he only spoke of where the hon. Gentleman resided. He only wished to say, from what he knew of the Welsh farmers, that they would be satisfied with a Bill of a very moderate character—a Bill that he was certain no reasonable landlord could take exception to. They did not want even complete fixity of tenure, but only reasonable protection against capricious evictions. They would require also fair rents, and this no landlord would object to. No landlord would confess he desired other than a fair rent.

A Bill conceding these two points would give complete satisfaction. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the language of orators out-of-doors; and if strong language was used by a few people, was it not a strong argument for doing something to meet the views of the Representatives of the people in the House, before agitation increased and the violent language of the few was generally adopted?

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 146 ; Noes 128 : Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 182.)

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he had given Notice to call attention to a most important subject, the Report of the Royal Commission which was appointed to inquire into Drainage, Harbours, and Railways in Ireland. It was a question of which he might say the Government had lived upon it for the last two years. There was a solemn promise from the noble Lord the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) that great things would be done for Ireland by this Commission, or, at any rate, if the Commission reported the possibility of doing great things, the Government would undertake them. This was 22 months ago, and it was a promise not of the noble Lord as Member for South Paddington, but as Chancellor of the Exchequer and Representative of the Cabinet. Of course, it was not possible at that hour to go into the subject properly; but he would point out that the Commissioners had made a valuable Report recommending that great changes should be made in the railway system; that the present system of guarantees was absolutely futile; that money offered at 2 per cent was not worth more than 1½ per cent; and they also made recommendations for deep sea harbours in connection with railways, and that drainage should form part of the scheme. Of the latter he need not say much, as the Government were going to introduce Bills on the subject. He was afraid they would be useless measures, for the Government were attempting the most difficult task in engineering to drain rivers and make them navigable at the same time. It might be easy to drain a river, not so easy to make it navigable, but to combine the two was one of the most difficult engineering feats in the world. Unless the Government would find a substantial part of the money, it was not likely to be a profitable undertaking for the Irish taxpayers. It was of no use attempting to explain this subject, which was of a somewhat technical character, to-night; but it was the duty of the Government to say at what time would they allow this Report of the Commission to be discussed; would they bring it forward themselves, or allow Irish Members to bring it forward in some fashion? He was afraid the Government were purposely leaving the question of arterial drainage to the end of the Session. Some £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 were to be transferred to the relief of local taxation in England, and what was presumed to be a proportionate amount was to be allocated to Ireland; but he was afraid that various Commissions would try to secure much of the money that ought to go to the relief of local rates as in England. He was afraid that at the end of the Session the Drainage Bills would be rushed through without proper discussion, the engineers' reports would not be properly considered, and this money would be diverted from its proper destination, the lightening of the rates, and turned to some such purpose as this drainage scheme. However, what he desired now was to elicit from the Government a statement of when they would allow this important Report to be discussed, and state what they proposed to do to redeem the pledges of the noble Lord when he held Office as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, he scarcely anticipated that the hon. and gallant Member would have raised a discussion on this question, and the time was not favourable to it. As the hon. and gallant Member was aware, he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) proposed to bring forward the Drainage Bills on Monday, and it would then be his duty to submit the Government proposals on this point. But he could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman now that the Government did not propose to allocate any part of the sum to be given for the relief of local taxation in Ireland to drainage purposes. As to the other matters dealt with in the Report of the Royal Commission, he must remind the hon. and gallant Member that in the present condition of Public Business it was not possible to deal with more than this portion of public works. If they succeeded in passing three Drainage Bills, that, he thought, was very well for one Session, and they could hardly be expected to do more.

COLONEL NOLAN: Oh, yes. Railways.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought that more could be done than passing three such Bills brought in in the month of July, he was of an extremely sanguine disposition. But he reminded the House that the Commissioners themselves had given some opinion as to the comparative importance of the various subjects on which they reported. Of the three subjects they treated—drainage, harbours, and railways—they were unanimous in placing drainage first. Under these circumstances, the Government did not think they would be justified in running counter to the opinion of the Commissioners, their advisers in the matter; and on that ground the Government had determined to deal with drainage before touching harbours and railways.

Mr. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, he appreciated the skill with which the right hon. Gentleman had talked on the matter for a few minutes, and really said nothing about it. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Commissioners made any such distinction in the subjects they referred to. Let the right hon. Gentleman read the Report with an Irish eye, and he would not find any such classification as he represented. True, drainage happened to be mentioned first, but not as first in importance. For his own part, he did not much believe in improvement of land by drainage for the Irish landlords, and he hoped some day to convince his hon. Friends that it amounted to taxing the general community for the benefit of a few individuals. But in the matter of increasing accommodation for the fishing industry, and bringing railways into connection with harbours, there was work that would be of great material benefit to the country. He hoped that the opportunity would come for a more adequate discussion of the subject. He had but inadequately expressed his own view but in that respect he had only imitated the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put till Monday next.

Death of His Imperial Majesty, Observations, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), Sir William Harcourt June 15, 257

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern and sorrow of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty Frederick William, German Emperor, King of Prussia, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion, and to pray Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to express to His Majesty, the present Emperor, the profound sympathy of this House with the Imperial and Royal Family, and with the Government and People of Germany. To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations, and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family. That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by such Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's Privy Council. That this House doth condole with Her Imperial Majesty Victoria, German Empress, Queen of Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland, on the great loss which she has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty. That a Message of Condolence be sent to Her Imperial Majesty, and that Mr. Speaker do communicate the said Message to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, with a request that he will attend the Empress Victoria for the purpose of conveying it to Her Imperial Majesty" (Mr. W. H. Smith) June 18, 457; after short debate, Address agreed to Chronology of Hansard's Debates.

THE PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY contains all that can be collected of the Legislative History of this country from the Conquest to the close of the XVIIIth Century (1803), 36 vols. The chief sources whence these Debates are derived are the Constitutional History, 24 vols.; Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal; Debates of the Commons in 1620 and 1621; Chandler and Timberland's Debates, 22 vols.; Grey's Debates of the Commons, from 1667 to 1694, 10 vols.; Almon's Debates, 24 vols.; Dobrett's Debates, 63 vols.; The Harlewick Papers; Debates in Parliament by Dr. Johnson, &c., &c.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES commence with the year 1803, and the contents are set forth in the following Chronological Table:—
